Dining with Don

Honore's suggestions for padding and stretching these basically fine dishes so that they will serve two or three more than originally intended.

Although all of Mrs. Ameche's recipes are excellent, we'll begin with Baked Lamb Loaf, a favorite Ameche recipe, and first in mention in our booklet. This particular meat loaf calls for ground lamb and makes it especially welcome for Spring menus. It can be served either hot or cold, with a Horseradish Sauce, which gives it that "certain something" in piquant flavor that lamb sometimes lacks. Of course, the recipe for the sauce also is given in the leaflet.

But just now, let's see what we can do with this dish to make it go farther. After all, you might think, if the loaf is already cooked when the company arrives, there isn't much one could do to stretch it out. But that's where you'd be mistaken, according to Honore. Bring it in as a loaf and it might look pretty slim, she admits; but slice the meat, arrange it on a platter, and garnish that platter to the hilt, and you'll have something really substantial-looking.

For garnishes, you can raid the refrigerator and the shelves of the pantry closets with amazing results, if you use a little ingenuity. Sliced tomatoes, hard-cooked eggs, quartered hearts of lettuce, pickles, olives, sprigs of watercress or parsley; canned baby beets, asparagus tips; baked or kidney beans used to stuff whole tomatoes; these are but a few of the countless possibilities that suggest themselves, offhand. Line them up as a general does his shock troops, and throw them into the breach to meet the onslaught of the hungry horde.

NEXT on our list is our vegetable dish, in this instance Corn Sauté. Since you can prepare this for the oven in five minutes, and let it cook for thirty minutes without watching, while you're setting the extra place at the table and serving the first course, it's a splendid meal-stretching recipe in itself. It also lends itself to some fine padding possibilities, so that the usual family serving of four portions can be made to take care of two "extras" without detracting from its appeal. With this recipe in your files, you can have a safe feeling at all times, when it comes to needing a last-minute vegetable dish. So, hereafter, when company arrives at the zero hour, forget the too-few string beans you intended having—they'll keep till tomorrow, anyway—and serve Honore Ameche's version of Corn Sauté.

Creamed Shrimps Catalina is another recipe of the Ameches which has infinite padding possibilities. In the first place, since the recipe calls for rice anyway, you can just cook up more rice. Make more sauce, also, which will give the "only can of shrimps in the house" elastic qualities you never before suspected. Add a little of this and that, which you may have on hand, the half-cup of cooked peas you were wondering how to use up; a stalk or two of celery, shredded very fine so that it will cook quickly; the mushroom stems you had vaguely thought of making into soup, etc. Best of all ideas, perhaps, is Honore's suggestion that you serve the shrimp mixture in patty cases and make a very little go a long way.

"Oh, yes," I seem to hear you snort indignantly, "and where do I get patty cases at the last minute?"

You don't get them, my loves, you make them out of bread. Just remove the crusts from a loaf of unsliced bread, slice into two-inch pieces, scoop the center out of each piece to make a good size depression, brush the "cases" with butter, generously, and place them in the oven to brown. Fill with the shrimp combination, garnish with parsley, and there you are! And your guests will praise you to the skies!

On many an occasion, the Ameches serve their own favorite spaghetti dish on short notice. This calls for a Meat Sauce which, unlike any I've ever heard about before, does not require hours of preparation and cooking. If you open a can of spaghetti and heat it in one pan, while you are preparing the sauce in another, the whole dish will be ready for the table in ten minutes. And that's par on any stove.

So if you have a sneaking suspicion that your relatives are going to forget about the time of day when they next pay you a visit, just have on hand the supplies called for on this particular card, in this month's recipe leaflet. Then, if they bring along cousin Jimmy, you can open up a second can of spaghetti and the meat sauce will stretch to meet the demands of this crucial moment.

The fruit salad can be a springtime sensation, or an all-year-'round favorite, according to whether you use fresh or canned black cherries. In both cases the cherries should be pitted, of course, and piled in a lettuce cup with a topping of mayonnaise to which whipped cream has been added. Surrounding the cherries should be cream cheese and nut balls, about the size of butter balls, and at least three to each serving. Or you can be really original and follow a suggestion rather hesitatingly made by Mrs. Ameche. She tried it recently with great success, but it's rather of a nuisance, she admitted to me, so don't say I didn't warn you. But it's such a cute idea that I wanted to tell you about it, regardless, for I know it would make a big hit with the bridge club.

When you have removed the pits from the largest black cherries you can buy, you place in the resulting cavities the tiniest of portions of cream cheese mixed with finely chopped nut meats. You close the cherries over these tasty "pits," and place them on the salad plates in such a way that no one suspects that the cherries have been stuffed. Not a suggestion for your last-minute-unexpected-guests, this one, but not to be overlooked either, if you like to surprise your girl friends. Let me remind you that cheeses of all sorts and descriptions, are marvelous salad-stretching aids. Crackers also add distinction, and more important still, filling qualities, to this popular course. So serve salad with cheese and crackers, by all means, if you want to stretch your meal.

ADDING a first course that you had not planned on having is one of the best ways to make slim pickings seem more generous, advises Honore Ameche. A can of rich cream soup, topped with whipped cream and sprinkled with crisp puffed cereal grains, will take care of the first onslaught of ravenous guests in fine fashion, and make them look less critically on the small meat servings that follow.

Well, there remains but to mention the cake recipe and to give you Mrs. Ameche's Fried Chicken specialty. I'll admit I never

From the very first day of his life a baby lives in a SPECIAL world. Everything he gets is made especially for him.

. . . SPECIAL soap and powder to keep him clean and comfortable.

. . . SPECIAL foods to keep a youngster thriving.

. . . SPECIAL dental care to keep young teeth sound and straight.

. . . SPECIAL toys to keep the mind growing.

. . . And a SPECIAL laxative to keep the body healthy . . . Fletcher's Castoria.

What a grand start a modern youngster gets!

EVERYTHING MADE ESPECIALLY FOR HIM . . . EVEN TO A SPECIAL LAXATIVE!

YES, even a special laxative.

After all, he is only a tot. His system isn't sturdy enough for the hurly-burly effects of an "adult" laxative . . . even when given in "smaller doses."

That is the reason why many doctors often suggest Fletcher's Castoria. For, as you know, Fletcher's Castoria is a child's laxative pure and simple—made especially and only for children.

It couldn't possibly harm the tiniest infant system because it contains no harsh "adult" drugs . . . no narcotics . . . nothing that could cause cramping pains.

It works chiefly on the lower bowel. It gently urges the muscular movement. It is SAFE . . . mild . . . yet thorough.

A famous baby specialist said he couldn't write a better prescription than Fletcher's Castoria.

It is also important to remember that a child should take a laxative willingly. Doctors say the revulsion a child feels when forced to take a medicine he hates can throw his entire nervous system out of order. That's why even the taste of Fletcher's Castoria is made especially for children. They love it.

More than five million mothers depend faithfully upon Fletcher's Castoria. Why not stay on the safe side and keep a bottle handy in your home? You can never tell when you'll need it.

You can buy Fletcher's Castoria at any drug store. Ask for the Family Size Bottle. It saves you money. The signature Chas. H. Fletcher appears on the red-bordered band on the box.

What Has Success Done to Robert Taylor?

was also self-effacing. He had a sense of humor, but it was subdued.

In short, he did not give the impression of being actor-ish. He was putting on no act. He was taking no bows. He was singularly unspoiled by the hullabaloo. He was as regular as the next fellow, three years out of college, doing work he liked, working hard and only hoping that he was doing all right.

One year ago!

No one could experience what he has experienced since then without being affected in some way. What has Life been doing to Robert Taylor?

I discovered, among other things, that there is a buoyancy about Bob now that was lacking then. He is more carefree, less subdued. He has shaken off the stiffness of self-consciousness, which still was noticeable a year ago. He was feeling his way then, a bit like a man venturing upon unpredictable ice. Now he has found that his footing is secure. He has more self-confidence. He handles himself more easily. He is having a better time. He is obeying his impulses more.

For instance, I found him on the rafters, of all places, on the set of "Personal Property." A year ago, he might have had the impulse to light out for the rafters between scenes, but he wouldn't have acted upon it. His fear of making himself conspicuous would have stopped him.

That is a fear that he has lost in this past year. Nothing that he could do would add to the conspicuousness that has been thrust upon him. And if he is going to be conspicuous, no matter what he does—well, he might as well unleash a few impulses, and enjoy himself.

THERE are few stars who have that attitude; few stars who can unbend to the extent of forgetting their professional poise. Clark Gable is one of those few. And, if you'll notice, Clark and Bob are cronies. They are constant luncheon companions; they and their girl friends go on picnics together. Technically, each may be the other's most dangerous screen rival. Actually, they have a great deal in common. Neither one of them can bother with posing. It would spoil too much fun.

When Bob came down from the rafters, where, it seemed, he had been chased by a prop man who had been a victim of one of his jokes, I asked him if he had to go aloft often.

"Say, I practically live up there," he told me. "I guess I didn't get in my quota of climbing when I was a kid. Or maybe it's an urge for exercise. God knows I need more exercise. There's a certain satisfaction in being able to see all over the place, getting a perspective on life's little ironies. The biggest set doesn't look so big from a cat-walk forty feet up. No player looks big. We're all just specks of humanity, to the fellow up on the cat-walks. That's a nice deflating thought. Something like the unimportance you feel in a plane.

"I guess this is about the first time anybody has known, though, that I hit for the rafters on occasion. And it isn't an urge for privacy that lures me upward. It's just an urge to keep moving, I guess.

"No, I haven't lost that urge for privacy. I still have it. But I don't have it on a movie set. I haven't gone temperamental yet. I like to move around, have some laughs, between scenes. This is one place where I don't feel as if I'm being watched."

I told him that I was there to find out how his life and he had changed since one year ago. He took the matter under consideration. He went through a detailed self-examination.

"Well, one thing I couldn't help noticing a year ago was that I had about as much privacy as an information clerk in a booth in the middle of Grand Central Station. I have more now than I had then. I stay at home more. Or at least I'm at somebody's home.

"After a year of it, I still get a big bang out of being recognized, and asked for my autograph. It still doesn't seem like something that ought to be happening to Arlington Brugh of Beatrice, Nebraska. I'd be a little cracked if I didn't get a bang out of it. Believe me, I'm grateful when fans do crowd around. But there's a tension about the bang, too. I still can't feel at ease, seeing people watching me eat. And, dancing in public, I don't feel like any Astaire.

"I used to try to kid myself into thinking I was having a good time at night clubs. But I've given up. Even if nobody was watching me, looking for material for a new romance rumor, dancing wouldn't be fun. You can't dance in one of these night clubs. You can't move more than an inch at a time. There isn't any room. That's another reason why I haven't danced in months.

"The romance rumors were getting me down a year ago. I'd pick up a morning paper and see that I was rumored in love with one girl, then read in an evening paper that I was rumored That Way about an entirely different girl. I couldn't be seen with any girl that somebody didn't try to make something of it. I used to wonder how I could ever hope to have any genuine friendships. Rumors would wreak havoc with a friendship before it could even get under way.

"This last year, I've learned how to let rumors roll off my back. I've learned how to laugh at them. That's possible, if a girl laughs at them, too. And Barbara (Stanwyck) does. They haven't affected our understanding in the least.

"It isn't what rumors do to you that's embarrassing. It's what they may do to someone else.

"Jean Harlow and I, for example, met for the first time just three weeks before we started this picture. Most people don't know that. And they don't know that Jean and I were assigned to make this picture together. They see that we get along swell—and they jump to conclusions. That's how rumors start.

THE first day of the picture, Jean received a big box of flowers, with no card enclosed. She wondered if I had sent them. I hadn't. But if she kept on receiving anonymous boxes of flowers, I had visions of a flock of rumors about the two of us. Which wouldn't bother me particularly, but they might bother Jean, not to mention Bill Powell.

"So I went to a publicity man and said, 'If anyone asks if I'm sending Jean flowers, tell him "No."' I wanted to head off rumors, if possible. Sure enough, a columnist did ask. The publicity man, instead of just answering 'No,' told him what I had said. The result was that the columnist gave his readers the impression that "It really began with this snapshot"

"I'D heard Sid mention his sister, but she meant nothing to me, naturally—until one day I picked up this snapshot on his desk.

"I asked him who the choice number was, and felt a little embarrassed when he said she was his sister Molly. But I guess he forgave the fresh remark, the way I began to treat him like a brother. I even loaned him money.

"He said he'd rather I'd take the snapshot than come mooning around his desk all the time, so that's how I became the owner. How I became the owner of the girl herself is another story—but it really began with this snapshot."

I was telling the world I wasn't sending Jean flowers!" Bob permitted himself an ironic grin.

"A year ago, I remember saying that I was impulsive about everything—except marriage. I can still say that. And I probably obey impulses more than I did then. I've shaken off some self-consciousness. But I still don't play my hunches in a big way. I've discovered that I'm not psychic. When I have a hunch, it's just a guess. And I'm not a good guesser.

"That's why I'm not making any long-distance plans for the future. I'll let events make my plans for me. Too much has happened to me, unexpectedly, for me to say, 'Well, next year, I guess I'll do this, and two years from now I'll do that.' Not that I'm so easygoing that I'm ambitionless. I'm not.

"My major ambition? Still what it was a year ago: To be an increasingly better actor. I've learned a lot this past year. I've had to learn a lot—to play opposite such stars as Loretta Young, Barbara Stanwyck, Greta Garbo, Jean Harlow. They know screen acting, all of them. But I know that I have plenty more to learn.

"A year ago, it looked as if I were on my way to being typed as a wealthy playboy on the screen. Since then, I've had a little variety—particularly in the costume parts in 'The Gorgeous Hussy' and 'Camille,' though I had my best time, making 'His Brother's Wife.' And I'm ambitious for plenty more variety. I don't want to get tired of my job, and I don't want audiences to get tired of me. I want to be an actor a long, long time.

"I had never been east of Michigan a year ago. I wanted to go. Well, I've been. Twice. Once to New York, once to Washington. I didn't see much of either. But I still have hopes of doing some traveling, seeing some of the world. I have a terrific yen for a trip on the Mediterranean. But if I can't get away long enough for that, I'll compromise on a trip to Hawaii. In fact, I've had my reservations three times for a trip to Honolulu. Once I was only three weeks away from leaving before I had to cancel, before I knew I couldn't get away, because of another picture coming up.

NO, I hadn't been really mobbed a year ago, I hadn't been to New York then. How do I like having my buttons ripped off? Well, it looks like part of the job." (He grinned.) "I get a laugh, though, out of some of the reports, like that one from New York that souvenir-hunters had taken my shoes. Boy, when they get me off my feet, they'll be going some!

"I've had some funny things happen to me because my screen name is 'Robert Taylor.' A Philadelphia women's club petitioned the studio to bill me under my own name, Arlington Brugh, because that was 'more unusual.' Then there was the woman who thought I was the son who deserted her. She wasn't kidding, either. I had to go to my lawyer to straighten that one out.

"And I never thought to live to see the day when billboards would scream, 'Garbo Loves Taylor, with "In Camille"' in small type beneath. Neither did Miss Garbo. After that, nothing in the type a columnist uses can look particularly startling to me.

"A year ago, I was living in a small house in Beverly Hills. A seven-room house is no mansion, especially in Beverly. I'm still in the same house; just signed a lease for another year, in fact—at an advanced rental. The story that my rent had been reduced because I was Robert Taylor was another laugh. I've given up my plans for building.

"My mother still lives where she did a year ago—four blocks away from me. My grandmother, a cousin and my secretary still live with her, still help me handle the largest part of my fan mail. I still see Mother every day, or call her.

"I still have just one servant—the same one I had last year; Joe Mondre. I have a little bigger car than I had then. I have a couple of riding horses—one that I bought, and one that was given me. I keep both of them in the Marwyck Stables." (Owned by Barbara Stanwyck and the Zeppo Marxes.) "I've given up tennis for horseback-riding, which permits more privacy. Those are the biggest changes in my mode of living. I still do pretty much the same things I was doing a year ago, except dancing and playing tennis; have the same interests. In fact, I feel like the same person.

"A year ago, I wasn't worrying about tax collectors. But this year they're going to get me—thank God." (A refreshing and unorthodox sentiment from a movie star.) "A year ago, I didn't have enough money to marry a Hollywood girl, even if I had been so inclined. Since then, the studio has torn up my contract twice, given me a couple of raises. But I still don't have much spare cash. The insurance companies are taking most of it. I'm investing in annuities.

"I was 'single'-minded a year ago—and I'm still 'single'-minded. Sometimes I think I probably always will be. If and when I do marry, the girl probably will be an actress. In my game, a fellow doesn't have much chance to get acquainted with any other girls. Not that I'm kicking; I'm not.

"But some interviewers must take me for a fall guy—trying to get me to describe my 'dream girl.'" (He grimaced at the phrase.) "I don't know as I have one. And if I have, I'm certainly not describing her. All I can say is that when I meet the girl, I'll know it—and I'll probably keep it to myself. Or is that just a hunch, too?

"I've developed one big weakness this past year—me, the ex-cello student—and that's swing music. When I get over to Barbara's house for dinner, the first thing I do is to put on a stack of swing records. She has one of those machines that changes records by itself. That's our dinner music. And we sit and scream at each other across the table, trying to make ourselves heard above Duke Ellington's band or Benny Goodman's."

Barbara, with whom he is about to make a second picture, still is his best girl friend. His best male friend, a year ago, was Don Miloe, a college chum who was then his stand-in. (His new stand-in is another college chum, Redmond Doms.) Today his best male friend is Clark Gable—with whom, by the way, he shares a hunting lodge, hidden away on an island near Santa Barbara, their favorite rest spot between pictures.

But Robert Taylor and his life have—as you have probably gathered—changed surprisingly little, one year after the furore started.

Love at Twenty

"When I marry," she said, "I probably will elope in a street dress. I just want to know, like every girl, how I might look in white bridal satin, with veil and train and lilies-of-the-valley."

People used to think of June as "passive." Her delicate, camera-perfect features were nearly always in repose. Her blue eyes were quiet. Her posture was relaxed. She talked very little. She was vaguely pretty, vaguely interesting, vaguely self-conscious. A bit difficult to remember as an individual.

Today, how the girl is changed! Her face is animated, alive with expression. Her eyes shine. She carries herself with the unconscious poise of a girl buoyant with happiness. She talks vivaciously. There is nothing vague about her, nothing difficult to remember.

Love has wrought the transformation.

Anyone who knew June before she admitted to herself the importance of Victor Orsatti in her life, and has seen her since, can testify to this.

Mr. Orsatti, in case he needs identification, is one of the better actors' agents.

June first met him three years ago, at a time when she was firmly convinced that she should, could and would not fall in love until she was at least twenty-five. She didn't intend to let anything get in the way of her career.

Because she was afraid of learning to like him too well, weeks, sometimes months, would pass between their dates. Finally, last summer, just before she was to go to New York on vacation, they had a misunderstanding about the infrequency of those dates. They parted—forever.

She flew to New York. She had hardly reached her hotel room there when she received a wire, "Please come home. All is forgiven. Love. Vic."

When she returned, she said, "For no reason at all we started going together." Their engagement soon followed. The wedding date was indefinite, but the engagement was very definite.

"THE first time I ever went out with Vic, I liked him. As we became better acquainted, that liking grew, until he meant more to me than any other boy had ever meant. And he seemed to like me more sincerely than anyone I had ever met. Perhaps we were in love from the very beginning. But I kept dodging the question.

"I was so ambitious for a career that I was afraid of love, afraid it would destroy the ambition that I had had ever since I was a little girl.

"It all started when I was just four. I had a little playmate who was very brunette; I was very fair. A dancing teacher dressed the little brunette as a boy, taught us a 'flirtation dance.' When the pupils of the school made a public appearance at a Minneapolis theatre, our dance 'stopped the show.' And my career began then and there.

"When I was six and a half, my family moved to California. My mother still sent me to dancing school. I loved dancing. I was positive that I wanted to go on the stage."

At fourteen, June—then June Vlasek—was dancing in a musical revue in Los Angeles' Mayan Theatre. A year later, she danced in another revue at the Orpheum. That led to a film test and a contract.

Then came the test of her earnestness. For months, she had nothing to do except pose for publicity portraits and study dramatics. She was undiscouraged. The dramatic coaching widened the horizons of her ambition. She might become more than a dancer; she might become an actress—if she tried hard enough, if she let nothing interfere.

After a time, she was given small roles, which were gradually growing larger—when there was a studio reorganization. Fox became 20th Century-Fox. Winfield Sheehan, production head, resigned. His less conspicuous "discoveries," and June was one of them, were automatically dropped from the contract list. For five months she was idle. Her career seemed over. Then Darryl Zanuck, new production head, happened to look over her old screen test. He rediscovered her, changed her name to June Lang.

Now, given a new chance, June was determined to let nothing swerve her from her ambition. Nothing. Not even love. Especially love.

In the past year, she has seen her career make great strides forward. She was chosen as model for the statue, "The Modern Venus." She was given the only feminine role in "The Road to Glory." She had the title role in "Nancy Steele Is Missing." Now she is playing Shirley Temple's very young mother in Rudyard Kipling's "Wee Willie Winkie." And these roles have only added new fuel to her ambition.

Yet today she looks upon love as something indispensable in her life. Why?

Very quietly, very simply, she said, "I've discovered something that every girl probably discovers somewhere around twenty, no matter how ambitious she is: a career isn't enough for happiness.

"You won't admit that in your teens. You think nothing could be more wonderful than a career. You feel this tremendous urge for self-expression—and you say you'll never be happy until you have made something of yourself. Perhaps you're right. But you're only partly right.

"Ambition excites you, obsesses you. Your whole life revolves around one idea: if you're ever going to amount to anything, you'll have to do it while you're young. And you do want to amount to something—passionately. You drive every other thought out of your mind.

"Some day, you suppose, you will fall in love. But you don't intend to fall in love now. You fight against the very possibility. Love can wait—indefinitely. But love can't wait indefinitely. Moreover, it won't."

A smile hesitated on June's lips. "But you're lucky if it does wait until you're twenty. Twenty is such a marvelous age for falling in love!"

The smile hesitated no longer. "You're young. Thrillingly young. Practically all of life is ahead of you. Yet you're not too young to appreciate love—as you were at seventeen or eighteen.

YOU were far more easily flattered then than you are now. You were always in danger of falling 'in love with love.' You were too young to know yourself completely. Too young to know men, except by intuition, which isn't the surest guide on earth.

"That is, you were in danger unless you were mad to have a career, and were concentrating on that idea, and nothing else seemed important."

June smiled again, as if to say, "I'm beyond that particular danger and I'm also beyond thinking that a career is the only important thing in a girl's life."

She did say, "It's funny. You strive for independence, and attain it—and then discover it isn't what you want at all. You work and work to fulfill your dreams, and discover that your dreams have been incomplete, because you haven't had anyone to share them.

"You try to avoid love, as a possible menace to the career you've wanted as long as you can remember, and discover that, instead, love is an impetus to that career."

There probably isn't another girl of June's age in Hollywood, or anywhere else, to whom a career has been so important for so long a time. And this was the girl who was saying, "My career isn't any less important to me than it ever was. It's more important, if anything. But in a different way. Love has given me new perspective.

"The urge for self-expression is a driving thing. It won't let you rest. And it won't be stifled—even by love. But love doesn't demand that it be stifled. Love reinspires it. That is the amazing thing.

"I have more responsibilities today than I've ever had before. And I've never felt so carefree. I can remember—it wasn't so long ago—when a day was just another day. Now, rain or shine, every day is a new adventure. I can remember when I used to take life pretty much for granted. Now it is something exciting, something to enjoy to the utmost.

"Love has defeated loneliness. And every girl who is absorbed in a career to the exclusion of everything else is lonely, whether she admits it to herself or not.

"You know the emptiness of seeing the sea at sundown, or hearing beautiful music, completely alone? My life has been like that—until now. There has never been anyone before who could share my emotions, or anyone whose emotions I could share. I have been a prisoner, locked within myself. I've never known until now the thrill of understanding someone else almost instinctively—or having someone understand me.

"Everything seems more worth the doing, because someone cares what I'm doing. Life is more worth living because I have someone else to live it for, besides myself.

"Acting isn't the only thing I want to do now. I want to read, travel, have a beautiful home, do a hundred and one different things, live more completely. I feel like a different person, a more interesting person—whether I am or not.

"Having a career still seems important. But being a woman first seems infinitely more important."

That's why June Lang says, "Love is important at twenty."

Do you agree?

A FEW days after giving this interview, June Lang dumfounded everyone who knows her—and especially this interviewer—by breaking her engagement to Victor Orsatti.

This had looked like one of Hollywood's real love matches. For three years, neither June nor Vic had registered interest in anyone else. And June's engagement ring had been no ordinary jeweled circlet. Even in Hollywood, a man would hardly buy a two-thousand-dollar engagement ring (as Vic did for June) unless he were convinced, "This is love."

Then, suddenly, the ring was missing from June's hand. She had returned it. Within the next few days, she was seen at a variety of Hollywood events with a variety of escorts. Among them were Alfred Vanderbilt, Jr., Douglas Fowley, Victor Orsatti. She explained that appearance with Vic, and subsequent appearances, by saying that they still were "good friends."

She would not explain the reason for the broken engagement. A columnist said the reason was "tribal interference." Friends hinted at maternal objections to the match.

Those same friends refuse to believe that the break is permanent. They believe that June and Vic were too much in love to fall out of love suddenly and completely.

Perhaps there was a major disagreement. Perhaps there were maternal objections. But there is one mystifying angle to the break. June Lang does not act like a girl who has broken an engagement. She shows not a sign of heartbreak or disillusionment. She has not lost an iota of that "girl-in-love glow."

Friends suspect that June and Vic impulsively decided to try a "separation test"—perhaps at the suggestion of June's mother; perhaps on their own initiative, after a quarrel. And that, in either case, they can't stay parted long. Their staunchest mutual friend says, "They're both as crazy about each other as they ever were."

Certainly, after seeing the still-glowing June, no one could suspect that she has changed her convictions about what love has done for her.

When she was asked if she has lost faith in love, her answer was a smile. A bit on the enigmatic side, but definitely a smile. And she shook her head.

thought of cake as a speedy filler-in, but these Orange Balls are both quick and easy. Mixed in 1-2-3 fashion, they should be cooked in the smallest of cup cake pans, for the shortest of baking periods. They are then shaken out of the pans onto a cloth which has been liberally sprinkled with powdered sugar. You pick up the four corners of the cloth, shake it gently, and the cakes are ready to be served. What more could one ask? Which reminds me to remind you to be sure and ask for these recipes. You don't have to mention them individually or by name, for the coupon brings them all to you.

Be sure to try the Fried Chicken recipe that follows, too. Never tasted anything I thought so good, and as you can well imagine, I've fried many a chicken, according to countless different recipes. Hereafter, however, this is IT! I'll mention before giving it to you, of course, that even Fried Chicken can be stretched. Here again bread plays a role, as it can in so many instances. For example, place each piece of chicken on a triangle of toast, and pour the gravy over the whole thing. Or place the chicken on a platter, and surround with toast triangles garnished with currant jelly, or any other jelly you particularly like to serve with chicken.

By the way, Mrs. Ameche suggested to me that instead of frying the backbone, neck, and tip of the wings, you boil those separately to make a broth. And right then and there I knew, as I had suspected all along, that hers was a practical, sensible way of catering—a fact which you will find amply demonstrated in her very own recipes which I am offering you this month.

Meanwhile, here's the Fried Chicken. You'll love it!

FRIED CHICKEN, HONORE

1 large frying chicken
salt and pepper
2 tablespoons butter or bacon drippings
1 tablespoon flour
1 cup cold milk

Have the chicken cut into pieces as follows: two second joints; two drumsticks; two wings; the breast cut into two pieces; the backbone cut into four pieces, and the neck. Singe each piece and wipe with wet piece of cheese cloth. (Don't wash the chicken ever!) Dust chicken with salt and pepper, dredge with flour. Put chicken into frying pan with butter or bacon drippings. Brown quickly over hot fire, turning pieces frequently so as to brown evenly on all sides. When thoroughly browned, reduce heat, add 2 tablespoons water, cover pan and fry chicken slowly, turning frequently. More water may have to be added; if so, add only 2 tablespoons at a time. When chicken is tender, remove from pan and place on hot platter.

Make Cream Gravy as follows: mix the tablespoons of flour with whatever fat is left in pan. When smooth and free of lumps, add milk slowly. Boil three minutes, stirring constantly. The gravy, which should have a rich creamy color, may be passed separately or poured over the chicken.

Sometimes the Ameches prefer not to have Cream Gravy and, in that case, they merely pour the gravy left in the pan after frying, over the chicken after it has been placed on the serving dish. This is the way it is being served at the luncheon during which our picture was taken.

Simone Simon Defends Herself—And How!

what I do not really mean. I do not make familiarities with strangers. Those are words you use to someone you dearly love. I did not like it. I acted like that."

"I am told," I said, "that on the first day of 'Seventh Heaven' you did not appear on the set. You probably know that all Hollywood was abuzz with that rumor. It was said that you were going to have the flu again! What did happen?"

"That, too, is simple," sighed Simone. "They had wanted me to wear a wig in 'Seventh Heaven.' They tried wigs and wigs and wigs. None suited. I suggest that I wear my own hair. They make a test of me with my own hair and I am right. But that means that I must take two hours for make-up instead of one hour, as we had thought. My own hair has to be washed and curled, every morning I work, so that it looks the same and does not get darker or oily for the same sequence. I was delayed under a drier, that was all.

"Why, I wanted to get on that set as quick as I could get there. I wanted to meet Jimmy Stewart. I was so happy to meet him and we had so much fun together. The first day I was on the set I send them out to get two chairs for us. I make them mark one chair with my name and one chair with his name so that we can draw them together and talk by ourselves. And that is what we did all through."

And I knew that Simone was speaking the uncompromising truth. I had been told that during the making of "Seventh Heaven," if Jimmy went up on his lines, the famed Simone impatience was muted. And she would stand, angelically sweet and silent, until Jimmy delivered. Jimmy, on the other hand, did the same for her.

NOT even Hollywood was able to cook up any hysteria over Simone during the making of that picture. She would greet Director Henry King each morning with a lavish hug and a luscious kiss. Director King's dignity was somewhat shaken when each luncheon hour, his waitress in the studio cafe produced a compact from her apron pocket, showed him his cheek which bore the red replica of Simone's kiss and, as unostentatiously as possible, removed it for him. Sunshine and storm, that is Simone. And during the making of "Seventh Heaven" the sun was shining.

One of her co-workers said, "She sure can give you a headache and a run-around, that Simone. But she also can give you a heartache and a flash of belief in the decency of human beings. Sounds kinda poetic," he added diffidently. "Well, she isn't exactly prosy, that one!"

And then he told me another tale, which shows the warm beats of Simone's heart. Lee Frederick was the script girl for "Girls' Dormitory." And again for "Seventh Heaven." During the making of "Seventh Heaven," she came down with flu and couldn't seem to recuperate. Simone went straight to Mr. Zanuck and asked him to send Lee to the desert at her (Simone's) expense. Lee was not to know, she explained, who had sent her. The girl was sent to the desert and kept there, unknowing. A week later, Simone went to bed with a case of flu. She had saved Lee Frederick. Herself she had not spared.

Simone had sent for tea and cakes. She said, still perched upon the wall, "I like to 'piece out' with tea and cakes many times a day. I am always hungry. That is why I swim, play tennis and build this badminton court. This summer my secretary and I will go to a house on the beach so that I can swim all the time. I also have plans to build a house here. I am nuts about this Hollywood. Even though this Hollywood," she grinned, "thinks I am nuts, too."

I resumed my third degree. "I am told that there is a scene in 'Seventh Heaven' which shows you getting into bed. And that you gave orders that the set was to be strictly closed, no visitors allowed during the making of that scene. How come? The Simone dissenters who heard about this sniffed, of course, 'More temperament!' "

"That's so silly," said Simone complacently, her mouth full of cake. "I do not like to make that kind of scene unless I am as alone as I can be. I would feel too public about a private scene. I could not do it well, that is all."

I said, "There was the occasion of an executive of your studio sending one of your pictures to you to be autographed for his personal use. You refused to autograph it. Isn't that biting the hand that feeds you?"

Simone giggled. She pulled the blue ribbon off her hair and shook out the bright mass in the sunshine. She said, "It would have been biting his hand if I had autographed that picture. I have told them I did not like that picture, that the lighting was wrong and ver' ugly. I have told them to destroy all the copies of that picture. They bring me down another and I sign it very nicely and with affection. That is reasonable."

"There was a black cat in 'Seventh Heaven.' Someone tells me that you refused to allow the poor little thing to cross the plank from one attic window to another during that particular scene. Isn't it being a little too particular to fuss about a cat?"

"I AM as superstitious as 'ell," laughed Simone. "There were seven alley cats in 'Seventh Heaven,' cats of all sizes and colors. I say that I will not have a black cat cross my path. That is too bad luck. Like I always step on a comb, when I drop one, and make a wish. A broken mirror would break my nerves, ummmm, like this!"

There is one thing sure—and that is that there is no false pride in the bewildering composite which is Simone. A member of the Press was interviewing her one day. Her mother's portrait was on a table in the living-room. And the gentleman said, half in fun, wholly, perhaps, in earnest, "You don't interest me particularly, Simone, but your mother—ah, there is a woman of charm and beauty." Simone embraced him, her eyes starred with grateful tears. For she adores her mother.

There was the occasion when she was seen entering the theatre where "Boy Meets Girl" was playing. It was a first night. She was with Jimmy Stewart. And Jimmy was heavily, unhandsomely bearded. There are girls who would have feared that people might not understand and that Jimmy had to be bearded for a sequence in "Seventh Heaven". Simone didn't care. She understood.

"I am temperamental, but certainly," declared Simone, stretching herself lengthwise along the sunny wall, "if what you mean by temperament is that I act how I feel at the moment. How else should I act? I can only act like me, not like Garbo, nor Mrs. Simpson, nor Mrs. Roosevelt, or others. I am me. I have to act like me.

"I do not understand those people who copy-cat others. I think they are just like children playing their 'Follow the Leader.' Why do they want me to be like every other one? I think that Garbo and Dietrich do very well and they are not like any other ones. Marlene gave me good advice when I first came here, and it was, a great deal to stay myself. I have tried to follow it.

"When people are dull, routine people, no one thinks they are intriguing. Non. Then say, 'Ahh, what a bore!' So why do they raise their eyebrows, shrug their shoulders and sigh like at a funeral, saying, 'That Simone Simon, she is so different!'?

"I act the way I feel the moment I feel it. That is the explanation of me. If I am hungry for my dinner at ten in the morning, I have my dinner then. If I am hungry for my breakfast at ten-thirty of the night, I eat my breakfast then. When I am sleepy, I sleep. I cannot be wide awake and gay when I am sleepy, can I?

"I do not go about slapping the faces of people unless they slap mine first, if not with their hands, then with their minds or their eyes, which can be so much worse.

"If I am not happy, I do not act it. I can act ways I do not feel when I am working, though it is then very hard work for me. But when I am not working, I am not an actress. I am me. Happiness is a real thing. You cannot fake it or it is not gold.

"But when I am happy, I shout, I sing, I say so. Like when they told me I was to play in 'Seventh Heaven'—and with Jimmy Stewart—I was excitingly happy. I knew it was what you call over here 'the chance of a lifetime.' So was Jimmy happy. Every day I sent for bottles of pop and cakes for him, for me and for all of us. I had visitors on the set whenever they came, except for that one scene. I was very good, they tell me, as if they were surprised. But it is easy, it is natural for one to be good when one is so happy.

"I have gone out with Jimmy and I have met his friends, John Swope and others. I have gone out with John a lot of some times. I am having a great lot of fun here in Hollywood and so I am crazee about this place. I like to have fun. The more serious things about love," said Simone, with sudden seriousness darkening her eyes, "are not quite yet or now. I do not talk about them.

"THERE is most of the hurt of life from not understanding, isn't that so? It was harder for me at first, but it comes easier now. I did not understand what people would mean, they would talk so fast and so loud! I did not understand the way people make their jokes over here. At home, when we make a joke, it is about some very funny thing and we laugh all the time we are making it. But here they say something seriously and it turns out to be a joke all the time. Like last Christmas, Mr. Westmore said, veree sadly, that he had got a lot of Christmas presents but the one thing he wanted the most he did not get—an electric train. I thought it was very funny for a grown-up man to want a toy train. But I thought it was also too bad he did not get what he most wanted. And men are like little boys, I always know. So I went downtown, shop around and buy him a train. And then everyone laughed very hard and said he was 'kneeding,' that he didn't really want one at all.

"I didn't understand how those people I didn't know could call me so many 'sweethearts' and 'darlings.' I could not call a person 'sweetheart' unless my lips were making an echo of my heart. It sounded to me like taking holy things in vain. Now I understand; I do not mind anymore but I still cannot say them myself.

"They tell stories with sharp fangs, stories about people they really like. They do not mean them. But if I say sharp-toothed things I do mean them. I am in a rage. I want to hurt or I do not say them.

"I am trying all the time to make my English and my understanding better. I have radios everywhere. In my bedroom, in my living-room, in my dining-room and studio dressing-room and in my car. I can listen all the time so that I can understand better the American idiom. I can learn to laugh at things the Americans laugh at.

"I have made many friends. I like to give little dinner parties at my house. But I just have to be like one and not like any other, that is all," sighed Simone.

Long Distance Marriage

Ann conceded. "Still, a band is a band, and it's there in welcome. It's the spirit of the thing that counts, don't you think?"

So it's as simple as all that, this being happy though separated? Just marry a bandleader who likes to pay bills, doesn't like to write letters and lives in Chicago.

Well, not quite, Ann admitted. There are a few little problems to iron out, a few little annoyances to put up with, if you want to make a howling success of it. Things like the radio and telephone bills and crank letters of advice and dirty cracks by columnists.

TAKE her radio problem. Roger is on a coast to coast hook-up twice a week and broadcasts from Chicago every night, but for the life of her, Ann can't tune him in on her radio in her Beverly Hills home. That's not an open invitation for radio salesmen to come calling; Ann has a very fine instrument. She's just hexed.

"Everybody in Hollywood can get him but me," she wailed. "And I'm the only one who really cares. It sounded so fishy to Roger the first time I admitted it, I've had to resort to being a radio boarder."

In other words, twice a week she whizzes over to Joan Bennett's house when Roger's program is due. Joan has exactly the same model radio as Ann, except for one thing. It will bring in Chicago and Roger. So willy-nilly, Joan has to listen to Roger to keep peace in the Pryor household.

"Even when he comes in over a San Diego station, I can't get him," Ann elaborated. "I have to get in my car and drive to Long Beach to pick him up."

Telephone bills of an average of $89 a month (that's only for her calls to him; heaven knows what Roger's are, since he calls three times to her one) are another little matter not easy to laugh off. Particularly when you have a hard-hearted business manager, as Ann and Roger have, who has the quaint idea that budgets should be budgets, not just a pretty row of figures under the heading, Out-Go.

It's a good thing that she and Roger have a sense of humor as well as common

THIS DEODORANT COMES OFF ON MY CLOTHES TERRIBLY!
WHAT YOU WANT IS THE NEW ODORONO ICE—IT DISAPPEARS INSTANTLY

New! Non-Greasy Odorono Ice goes on like a vanishing cream —checks perspiration instantly

FOR YEARS women have complained—"Why do cream deodorants have to be so greasy?"—"They stick to clothes and ruin them!"

The new Odorono Ice was created in answer to these complaints—on an entirely new principle. It vanishes completely! It can't leave a messy film of grease to come off on your clothes.

And, unlike other cream deodorants, it gently checks perspiration. You are completely protected from both odor and dampness for 1 to 3 days.

Try it! It is delightful, entirely different in texture. Light and fluffy. It pats on easily—you don't have to work at it!

And Odorono Ice never develops a musty odor of its own after it has been on a while. Its clean, fresh smell of pure alcohol evaporates completely the minute it is on.

Really, Odorono Ice is the perfect cream deodorant at last! 80% of the women who have tried it prefer it to any other deodorant they have ever used. Buy a jar of the new Odorono Ice tomorrow—35¢ at all Toilet-Goods Departments.

Smile on, Monsieur Gravet! Messieurs, the critics, find your first picture well titled. After "The King and the Chorus Girl," they're all hailing you as king among movie actors.

horse-sense about another little matter—her going out with men in Hollywood and he with girls in Chicago—or the columnists of the nation would have had them in the divorce courts long before now.

They made a pact, when time for the first separation came, that neither should curtail their social life or contacts just because a minister had made them one and their respective jobs of necessity made them two again. That's why Ann is seen dancing now and then with a tall, dark, and handsome, and Roger with a cute, cuddly and blonde. It's all perfectly proper and approved by all concerned. And it doesn't mean that there's a rift in the Sothern-Pryor menage. Just modern marriage.

SPEAKING of warnings! What her fans haven't predicted for Ann! She was ruining her marriage. She was wrecking her career. She should stop this nonsense, settle down and have babies. She should let nothing stand in the way of success. She was the courageous leader of a new crusade. She was violating the basic principles of wedlock. She should be more strict with Roger. Roger should be more strict with her. So on and so on, far into the night. One went so far as to suggest since Ann wasn't using her wedding ring in the orthodox manner, she send it to the writer as a souvenir, and another sent helpful hints about keeping her wedding veil in camphor balls.

"I finally figured out what to do with all the suggestions," Ann said. "I take the day's letters, curl up in front of the fire, and make a tit-tat-toe pattern on a piece of paper. I play the Pro idea against the Antis. When I get three in a row in the tit-tat-toe, I decide it's time to put out the cat, wind the clock and dash into bed.

Seriously, though, Ann said she had discovered the essential requisites for keeping happy when circumstances force one to be separated from the person to whom he or she is married.

"First, you must have complete confidence in the integrity and honesty of the other person, so that idle gossip, of which there is bound to be plenty, cannot touch you," she said. "To me, that is just part of love. But if necessary, discipline yourself to this attitude.

NEXT, keep busy. Develop your small talents. Cultivate a sincere interest in hobbies. For instance, I have been studying the operas and taking harmony lessons. Keep physically fit by whatever sports appeal to you. Go out to parties, even if you're the 'fifth wheel,' and go with the idea firmly in your mind that you're going to have a good time, not an oh-well-I-might as-well-go complex.

"And whatever you do, avoid as the plague any self-sympathy of 'poor little me' ideas. If you start feeling sorry for yourself, you're sunk!"

For all her brave front, and sensible attitude, Ann isn't any happier in her strange situation than you would be. She's just marking time and making the best of things. It's obvious from the way she rattles around in her charming English house that it's much too big for one slender girl. It shows in her lovely eyes when she speaks of Roger and the "someday" (maybe next summer) they'll be together "for keeps," not just hectic weeks sandwiched in between more hectic work. It echoes hollowly behind her gay words and bantering sure-I'm-happy manner.

In fact, just to watch her excitement when the baggageman came for her three trunks the night before she left for her last visit with Roger (she was like a ten-year-old going to a Fourth of July picnic) was the dead give-away.

This how to be happy though separated was a swell story—and she was stuck with it!

What I'll Tell My Son

forth that you didn't suppose she would have. Oh, you'll believe you can't wait, my son. I've felt that impulsiveness. You'll think you must seize love when it's all wonderful ecstasy, that if you hesitate you'll lose that marvelous mutual glow. Well, you won't. For real love doesn't fade in a year; if the passion you feel will cool so speedily, then you're well out of the whole affair.

"I don't," vowed Joan, "intend to expect too much of my son. I shall do what I can to steer him to the right kind of girl. But I consider it wrong of parents to interfere with a boy in love. I'll never threaten to cut off his allowance, or yank him away. Subtly I'd try to make him realize himself, by comparison, that he had chosen the wrong girl—if he did. But I wouldn't be cruel. Because I can recall what it means, that first love.

"It brings a joy that one never experiences again. There's nothing grander! And if you've guessed incorrectly you emerge less selfish, more understanding, more prepared—in fact—for life as it is. You are grateful for a little gayety in your heart; you say to yourself, 'This is a happy hour and I must appreciate it!' You enter marriage, then, with eyes open to what you must do to preserve a perfect companionship.

"Supposing my son is hurt when he learns she isn't quite the ideal creature he anticipated. He'll survive. And he won't have that resentment, that sense of having lost something, that he'd always have in the back of his mind if I opposed him.

"I hope he'll be so well-balanced that he won't fly off on any such tangents. But when you are naturally emotional you often can't help reacting strongly. It's awfully hard to be discerning when you are very young. Norman may—I hope not, but he still may—just see that she's a sweet young thing. He may not see that she hasn't a brain cell working. That she doesn't know how to cook, that she'll never fit in with his friends, his ambitions. He may be so desperately smitten that he won't wonder what they'll talk about after they're tired of kissing, and how he'll support her if he loses his job.

NEVERTHELESS, I shan't lift a finger to stop him once he's determined he can't live without her. I won't be heart-broken, because it won't be my privilege. He has his own life to lead and I'm not under the delusion that I can share it with him; I'll be grateful for whatever time he has to spend on me. If she isn't the great love of his life, she'll have taught him to be more discriminating, to be a better husband for the woman he eventually senses is right for him. He'll have to realize, sometime, not to expect the impossible. A good philosophy comes only through experience. If he falls for a girl who, in the eyes of the world, has made mistakes, then it's entirely up to him to decide whether she's worth his devotion.

"I'll tell him that quiet girls given to drooping their eyes aren't always trustworthy, that a laugh indicates far more character than a titter. I'll praise girls who radiate health, who are refined, who walk erectly. If she shakes hands as though she meant it, she's more likely to be a square-shooter. I'll suggest that he note whether the whites of her eyes are clear, if her hair has a soft texture, and if the inside of her pocketbook is always

Wrong Shade Powder Can Hide Half Your Beauty . . . Try My Enchanting New Face Powder . . . FREE

Dear Madam:

Do you look years older than you need to—just because you are using the wrong shade of face powder? Don't be fooled with the outlandish old notion that you are a "type" who is condemned to use only a certain "name-shade" of powder. This is a "skin game" where you are bound to lose. For when all "Brunette" face powders are different in color, how can they all possibly suit YOU if YOU are a brunette? The same is just as true of "Rachel" shade face powders—all are different in color—and so on, with other "type" shades.

You are more than a mere "type"—you are an individual. Regardless of face powder names or shades, you should rid yourself of all this confusion. Here is how: Mail this coupon to me — NOW. Get my five new shades of LOVELY LADY Face Powder — absolutely free. Cosmeticians agree that these five exquisite shades cover every complexion color need — because BALMITE, the glorious new soft blend base, blends LOVELY LADY'S subtle color tones more flatteringly with the delicate, natural tones of your skin.

Send for these five shades and make the test that really PROVES which one face powder shade you should use, which makes you youngest, loveliest. Mail the coupon. I'll supply you with generous vanity size samplers of all five new shades, free. Just send the Coupon—NOW!

orderly. That may save him from a sloppy wife.

"If she cries, 'Oh, I think babies are too sweet!' she may be ga-ga. If she is going to be a real mother, she'll betray the fact by understanding children. If she should be near an accident and he senses that she is saying a little prayer, instead of merely being curious, he'll know she's got a spiritual quality. And he ought to look for this quality, as well as for sincere compassion and capableness—later on they count so much.

"To test a girl, entertain her inexpensively. Give her an opportunity to nag, and to be jealous. Oh, you want her to be flatteringly jealous. But not unreasonably so! Maneuver her into the situations she'll have to meet as a wife.

"Don't propose until you have a steady salary and good prospects for the future. It isn't fair to the girl.

"A woman with a career, or a major hobby of some sort, will make a better wife than one who has nothing to do in her spare time but go to bridge parties. If she's at all clever she'll arrange her work so that it'll be through by dinner, and it'll save her from becoming a bore.

"When you've quarreled, be regular about making up. Don't hang onto grudges. Women don't want to be made miserable, any more than men do.

"I won't be a 'dear mama.' It isn't such an extraordinary event to be a mother. I'll tell him that in-laws shouldn't be allowed in a home except by specific invitation. They ought to have intuition enough to stay away until their company is requested. I'll be a guest, and not a fixture, in my son's home, and I'll advise him to speak frankly about his wife's in-laws before marrying, if they promise to be pests.

"If he ever wants suggestions from me, I'll tell him to come to me privately. It would be so bad to drag me into an argument between himself and his wife. It would be a sign he didn't understand women.

WHAT I haven't told you yet is that I never shall sit my son down and lecture him like this! I trust I'll never deliver that stock line, 'Son, Mother knows best!' All these admonitions are to be inserted, casually, into everyday conversation. Never talk to a man obviously to improve him. Men hate to feel bossed.

"Every day I make a point of recognizing that this is my time with Norman. Now he's my playmate, my doll. I expect to have him for my own until he's twelve; that's the deadline I've set. Then I'll have to step gracefully aside; it'll be a tremendous effort, but when a boy gets into his 'teens he no longer wants to be tied to apron strings. I want to stay young as long as possible, but I shan't be so kittenish that Norman will be burdened with the task of sustaining poor mama's spirits. I shan't try to be as gay as his girl friends. Youth's place is with youth; I'll have my own life to lead.

"I'm anxious to make life happy, not easy, for him. So I shan't hover over him, attempt to hide the realities. Neither a mother nor money can protect anyone from the slaps Fate gives us all. I'll tell him to be grateful and considerate, never to take anything for granted. I shall not count on him being any nobler than I am able to be myself. Why should I? I'll say, 'Don't be obsessed by material ambitions. Be sentimental, too; be colorful in your appearance and speech.'"

But Mrs. Dick Powell was skipping something.

"Your tips on how your son will be attractive plus," I said. "What'll they be?"

"Ho!" she exclaimed. "Now that's a giant offhand order. Still, I'm already sure of a few tips. When a girl is lighting a cigarette, Son, take the match from her hand and do the lighting. That never fails to thrill. When you're introducing her make it an honor to be able to show her off, and to top it off as an event, you can go so far as to add a dash of a bow. Discover her little mannerisms and label them cute. Pay her unanticipated compliments. And when you're dancing, hold her so her dress is just right and doesn't hike up in the back. Be on time for your dates; she'll detest waiting when she's all dressed up and her nose is well powdered. However, you'd better horrify her by being an hour late once in a dog's age. It'll provoke her imagination. Suspense, in small doses, is an antidote for stuffiness.

"Girls are fussy. They like a man to have clean fingernails and a well-scrubbed look.

"I'll emphasize this to him: Charm in a man means poise, seasoned with politeness. So I'll tell him that when he takes her dining and doesn't like the steak, he shouldn't complain and scream at the waiter. When he's driving and someone cuts in on him, he shouldn't holler at the other fellow. Women admire men who are above petty rudeness."

Dick Powell strolled into the room then. "I threw my first beau over because—" Joan stopped short and winked at me. "But that," she murmured demurely, "is a tale reserved for my husband!"

Dr. R. E. Lee, well-known physician, says: "STICK TO IT, and Fleischmann's Yeast will help to correct ADOLESCENT PIMPLES."

● Important glands develop after the start of adolescence—from about 13 to 25 years of age—and final growth takes place. This disturbs the entire system. The skin gets extra sensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin, and unsightly pimples break out.

Fleischmann's fresh Yeast helps to free your skin from pimples by clearing these skin irritants out of the blood. Eat 3 cakes every day—a cake about ½ hour before meals—plain, or in a little water.

curious to know how the requests are distributed among the next ten stars, just send in your name and address, and I'll keep you informed for the next six months, at no cost to yourself.

SONJA HENIE (First printing; total number of requests 259.) How completely the movie public has taken to Norway's charming little ballerina of the ice is evidenced by the large group of anticipatory fans that she gathered unto herself well in advance of the release date of her first picture. And believe you me, this being a movie star before you've appeared in a single picture is quite a stunt—though, in Sonja Henie's life story, merely one among other miracles. Miracle, by the way, is just the word you need to describe Sonja's achievements. Achievements such as qualifying for her first Olympics at the age of eleven, placing second in the world's championship matches at thirteen, and winning the Olympic gold medal two years later. Of course, Sonja is quick to tell you that there was absolutely nothing miraculous about any of this. Just plain hard work. That's her story.

At three, when most little shavers are still a trifle too top-heavy to be graceful, Sonja was giving Pavlowa heavy competition right in her own nursery. At four, Mama Selma Nilsen Henie (sound Norwegian enough?) enrolled her gifted daughter in a ballet school. Sonja plugged at ballet four years before ever strapping on a pair of skates. After she had pirouetted to her first Olympic laurels in 1928, Sonja became Norwegian ambassador without portfolio, her credentials being her skill and her smile. She appeared at command performances before most of the crowned and "uncrowned" heads of Europe. She still cherishes a diamond stick-pin presented her by the ex-crown prince of the German Empire. There came a time, however, when Sonja tired of her knock-about career of winning medals and decided she wanted something more substantial. That's when Darryl Zanuck signed her. No little miracle itself! Sonja had already been turned down by two other film companies.

And now, to forget for a moment the girl's achievements, let me tell you a wee bit about the girl herself. True to type, she has deep blue eyes and sunny blonde hair. Her favorite color is white (probably because it's so gay), and she likes everything about her to be white—except her very dark-haired, dark-eyed boy friend, Tyrone Power. She's temperamental, but no more than she should be, and is always ready to listen to reason. Her next picture is "Thin Ice."

GRACE PETERKIN, Boston, Mass.: Sorry, Grace! I'd like to tell you that the twenty-eight postcard requests you and your girl friends sent in for Bob Taylor break an all-time record. Unfortunately, a staunch circle of Lew Ayres' well-wishers still holds the honors. They mobbed up on your poor Information Desk Man with thirty-six postcards. I'm sure of that figure, too—counted 'em twice. But, record or no record, you can be certain every last one of your requests will count and help Bob to catch up with that fast-riding Autry gent in our Barometer rating.

JANET GAYNOR (Last printed June 1936. Total number of requests since then 268.) Fate has danced a mad Apache dance with Janet Gaynor. Born Laura Gainer, in 1906, the daughter of a simple house painter, by 1926 the swirl of events had tossed her on top of the cinematic heap as Janet Gaynor, the idol of millions. In the twenty years that intervened between house paint and grease paint, Fate's cruelties were preparing her for the bounty that Fate had in store for her. Hardships moulded the soft, ultra-feminine Laura Gainer into that fascinating combination of girl and woman which is the secret of her appeal. Poverty; wrangling parents, who finally divorced each other; a second father; a gypsy life from town to town in search of a livelihood; all those wrenching uprootings, from which the adolescent child should be shielded, were the lot of Laura Gainer. And that is the reason that she is today a great actress, whose emotional depth and richness keep her eternally young and wistful.

The story of how she became an actress is the sort of tale that makes you believe that we mortals have no control over our own destinies, that success is purely a matter of good or bad fortune. Janet Gaynor never dreamed of becoming an actress. "Jonesy," her doting foster-father had seen his girl do little impersonations, and had sensed rather than understood her greatness. It was the serene faith of this good man that gave Janet the strength to carry on during two hopeless years as an extra. Then, in a day, without warning, success came. Through her friend, Marian Nixon, she was assigned a part in the Fox epic, "The Johnstown Flood." It was then that Fox saw in her what "Jonesy" had sensed. She was cast in "Seventh Heaven," opposite Charlie Farrell, and the nation saw what Fox had seen. Success did not offer a solution to Janet's life problems. The very emotional fire that was the basis of her screen appeal was the evil genius of her private life, and later involved her in serious difficulties with her studio. When she married Lydell Peck, she wounded deeply the thousands of her followers who had so fondly expected her to wed Charlie Farrell. Somehow, the disappointment of the fans threw a pall over her marriage. It ended in divorce. When Fox reorganized, and her friend, Winfield Sheehan, was dropped from the staff, she suddenly resigned from the cast of "Way Down East." Her decision cost Fox a quarter of a million dollars. She retired for a short time to Honolulu, until called back by M-G-M to do "Small Town Girl," with Bob Taylor. Since then she has made several pictures. She is appearing currently in "A Star is Born," with Fredric March.

MILLIE PARETO, Atlanta, Georgia: Your information is absolutely correct. In his next picture Gene Autry will sing a song composed by a lifer in the Oklahoma State Penitentiary. You'll never know the composer's name, though. He'll be identified solely by his penal number. It seems there's an Oklahoma law prohibiting the exploitation of any state prisoner's name.

NINO MARTINI (First printing; total number of requests 378.) Nino Martini was born in Verona. He's the second Verona home town boy to make good. The first was Romeo. Nino should know more about love than Clark Gable and Casanova put together—and no doubt does. His father was caretaker of the very tomb in which Romeo and Juliet have lain these many centuries. Nino might have been a caretaker himself, reminiscing to tourists on the glory that was Verona, puffing abstractedly on his pipe. The trouble was that his voice was so beautiful, and none of the good people of Verona would let him smoke a pipe. That's what decided him against the caretaking business. When Nino's father died, the boy was adopted by a Signor and Signora Zenatello, both of them singing teachers. That started him off on the right track. Up every morning at six, plenty of scales, arpeggios, and spaghetti, and no red wine. By the time Nino was twenty, he was Italy's operatic white hope. He had already sung the role of the Duke in "Rigoletto," and was engaged to do the lead in "I Puritani." The funny thing about this role was that, prior to Nino's performance, the opera had been shelved for some seventy years, the reason being that no tenor had been found in all that time who could reach all the high notes in one of the arias. You can imagine the skeptical sort of audience Nino faced on the opening night. Especially the critics, who were just a bit peeved at the young man's sudden prominence. But Nino disappointed the critics, satisfied the male audience, and simply panicked all the ladies.

Before long, people were drinking champagne toasts to Nino in every European language, not to mention the dialects. It was in Paris that Jesse Lasky heard him and signed him to work for Paramount. Nino came to America, but couldn't "spika so good de Inglish;" so, after appearing in a few inconspicuous shorts, he sailed back to learn more about our language. America decided then and there that Nino could learn all the English he might need right here. Back he came, sang with the Philadelphia Opera, then over the Columbia network, then with the Metropolitan Opera. And now RKO-Radio has a lien on the young man of Verona, and will hold on to him, if they know what's good. He's to do "Born to Sing."

SHARON MULDOON, Hopkinsville, Kentucky: Though Jean Harlow has a very musical speaking voice, she doesn't sing. However, you weren't seeing pink elephants when you thought you heard her sing in "Reckless." She was going through all the motions, while Virginia Verrill, of radio fame, did the actual vocalizing.

GINGER ROGERS (Last printed November 1936. Total number of requests since then 289.) It was a strange game that Ginger Rogers' father and mother played with their baby daughter. Something like football. Ginger was the ball. The idea was to gain possession of the baby and then run. Gains were measured in miles, and time was kept in months. The game started shortly before Ginger was born, July 16, 1911, when Lela McMath ran away from her husband, Eddins, so that she might give birth to her child alone. After the birth, she rejoined Eddins to let Ginger have the benefit of a father. But the old friction persisted, and one fine morning Lela marched out of Eddins' life for good, taking Ginger with her. Working in a hotel as a public stenographer, she kept Ginger alongside her desk in a clothes basket. From this basket the child was stolen. Whereupon Lela stole her right back, later scoring heavily at the divorce proceedings, when she was granted custody of Ginger for every day of the week except Sunday. The rules of this Eddins vs. Lela game were lax, and on a certain Sunday, McMath failed to return Ginger to her mother. This time McMath was tackled not far from the goal line. He was on the point of entering Ginger in a convent, when Lela's detectives caught up with him. Then, ever so suddenly, the game ended. McMath died. Meanwhile, Lela had married John Rogers, Fort Worth newspaper man. She herself entered the field of journalism, becoming dramatic editor of the Fort Worth paper.

Ginger used to tail her mother on her various assignments, thus laying the foundation for her later association with the stage. At fourteen, a Charleston contest which Ginger won made the association permanent. She was awarded a four weeks' tour as part of her prize. Sacrificing her own work, Mrs. Rogers traveled with her daughter as combination manager, chaperone, and spiritual adviser. She stayed on in this triple capacity, guiding Ginger's dancing steps unerringly to Hollywood. On her way up the ladder, Ginger married, a hasty affair, just as hastily dissolved. Her first Hollywood romance was with Director Mervy Le Roy. For two years gossips predicted a wedding, but Fate and Lew Ayres decreed otherwise. Ginger's marriage to Lew was based on a great love, and the fire of that love has left glowing embers. Though the two were poorly suited to each other, their separation has left both of them with regrets. Since leaving Lew, Ginger has tried to forget, by working harder than ever before. Her current picture is, "Shall We Dance?"

MARIAN KRANTZ, Springfield, Ohio: Thanks for your Mickey Mouse request. Mickey has quite a biography, but so far you're the only person that seems to care. You'll be gratified to know that you've got a real sympathizer in Dowager Queen Mary of Great Britain. She's made the request that whenever she attends the cinema, the program be extended to include one of Mickey's films.

CONNIE BAKER, Davenport, Iowa: Yes, sir, Lew Pollack's and Sidney Mitchell's dedication of their song, "Five Little Peas in a Pod" to the Dionnes has caused quite a delightful flurry among the chubby little tots. And leave it to those wide-awake quints to do the ladylike thing in return. To the nice messieurs, each of Mamma Dionne's five movie queens has presented an elegant, autographed picture of herself.

Man-About-Town

in his dressing-room on the set of "Toast of New York," which stars Edward Arnold and Frances Farmer.

One has the conviction when talking with Cary Grant that his habitual attitude of extreme nonchalance conceals a steel-like strength, potentially tigerish; that his casualness conceals a stern, satiric mind. His flippancy, it is easy to believe, is the scar tissue protecting some well-hidden hurt. One feels in him a bitter contempt for all that is phony, shallow and false, and a rich, hot reverence for that which is honest and sound.

He had been, as he said, "around." His paternal grandfather, Percival Leach, later Sir Percival Leach, was a well-known English stage actor. His father was in the clothing business, and felt that his son should carry on in it. But Archie Leach would have none of it.

"They asked me to change my name when I came to Hollywood, even though I had used my own name on the New York stage. I changed it. After all, can you blame them?"

WHEN the young, dark Archie was twelve he invented a new theatrical lighting effect. He took it to the manager of the Princess Theatre in Bristol, England, his birthplace. The management gave him permission to install it. He did. He came into contact with stage people and realized that these were his own people and that he was, at last, at home.

He wanted to go on the stage then and there. His father objected. Young Cary ran away and joined Bob Pender's acrobatic troupe. He did eccentric dancing, clown routines, stilt acts and acrobatics. He liked the show business.

Finally, his father took him home, but when he was fifteen he ran away again to join the same troupe. He was homesick for the people he'd grown fond of. This time his father conceded the battle to heredity. For a year Cary appeared with the "knock-about" comedians, as they were known in England. His career had begun and he knew it. He had ups and downs. He went to America with the Pender troupe and played the Hippodrome in New York for two years. He returned to England and spent two years in stock and developed his voice. He returned to New York to appear in "Golden Dawn." He had the lead in "Wonderful Night" and played opposite Queenie Smith in "Street Singer." In the summer of 1931, he joined the St. Louis Repertoire Company and had the lead in twelve operettas. He returned to Broadway and made "Nikki," with Fay Wray and Kent Douglass, playing the part Richard Barthelmess is the secret of radiant beauty

BEAUTY authorities agree that thorough cleansing is the most important step in complexion care. A simple step, too, since Daggett & Ramsdell created the new Golden Cleansing Cream—a more efficient skin cleanser could not be obtained.

New kind of cleansing

Golden Cleansing Cream contains a remarkable new ingredient, colloidal gold, with an amazing power to rid skin pores of dirt, make-up and other impurities. You can't see or feel this colloidal gold, any more than you can see the iron in spinach. But its special action makes Golden Cleansing Cream more thorough than ordinary cleansers, and tones and invigorates skin tissues meanwhile.

Make this simple test

Apply your usual skin cleanser. Wipe it off with tissue. Then cleanse with Golden Cleansing Cream. On the tissue you will find more dirt—brought from pore depths by this more effective cleansing.

Try it tonight. See for yourself how fresh and clean Golden Cleansing Cream leaves your skin. You'll find this new cream at your drug or department store for just $1.00.

Then he took a tramp automobile trip to Hollywood. He was tuning up the motor to drive back when he met an executive from Paramount, took a screen test, and the blood of Sir Percival had come into its own.

There were interims when he waited on table, was broke, went hungry, sold magazine subscriptions. There were times, here in Hollywood, when he felt discouraged and disheartened, ready to chuck it all and go back to New York. He didn't go.

"I'll tell you what I really care about," Cary said, suddenly, sitting fully erect for the first time, eyes coal-black in the lean tan of his face. "I care about my work. I love acting. I'm proud of being an actor. I'm proud when I can say 'we actors.' They're the grandest people in the world. They're colorful. They're loyal. They're exciting.

"We play doctors, priests, explorers, fools, old men, young men. We know the pulse beats of comedy, tragedy, buffoonery. We play down-and-outers, adventurers, scientists, men of all nations, times and tempers.

"Yeah, actors are glamorous and vital and grand. They make mistakes, but they're darn human mistakes. It is the ballooned publicity of Hollywood, however, which makes it appear next-door to criminal.

"I love Hollywood. I know what critics say of us. That we talk too much about ourselves, that we talk about our work to the exclusion of everything else. We have no other interests. No? Well, I don't need any other. If you love what you're doing, you want to talk about it. I am bored stiff if I have to be with people who don't know anything about Hollywood or the movies. I'd even rather play at casting 'Gone With the Wind' for the ninetieth time than not talk pictures at all."

"To what," I said, "do you attribute the fact that you've had such an upgrade in your career in the past couple of years?"

"I'M wavering past youth," grinned Cary. "That's the answer. I've passed the juvenile stage. The hardest and most thankless work on stage or screen is that of the juvenile who always 'gets the girl.' When you play a character part, you can sport a scar on your kisser or you can make faces. If you play a definite, though peculiar, character you can make up any kind of a walk, strut, or swagger. But there's nothing the poor paper doll of a juvenile can be but himself. And the most embarrassing role to play is—yourself. You have neither character make-up nor clever lines to help you. All you can hope is that there may be some new intonation to put into the words, 'I love you.' When you play a character you are without consciousness of self, and you get lines to speak. You've got to be able to forget yourself. Juveniles can only pose. Characters can act.

"I got my first break as the slick cockney rogue in 'Sylvia Scarlett.' I'd been pretty low about it all before that.

"Yeah," grinned Cary, while the smoke from his cigarette played shadows on his mobile face, "I'm wavering past youth and glad of it. As I fumbled through that youth, I lived and learned. I'm a lot more tolerant now than I used to be. I used to condemn, get sore, harbor grudges. But no more."

Man-about-town is too frivolous a title for Cary Grant. Tall, dark and handsome—yes; matrimonially unattached—yes; once burned, twice shy—quite likely; rumored to be beauing Ginger Rogers—why not? seen at this party and that—quite likely; debonair, casual, sleek and nonchalant—oh yes; but more than these things he is a man with a passionate purpose, a love for his work and his fellow workers, which is the stuff of which all leaders are made.

hair and backs, both neglected portions of the beauty anatomy. And there are elbows, too. Just give them a good allowance of cold cream now and then to keep them smooth and white. And rub your arms, clear up to your shoulders, with your hand lotion occasionally, to keep them smooth and white, too.

And—er—oh, yes—remember that other people can see behind your ears, even if you can't. I'm not implying that you forget to wash behind your ears as you did when you were little girls. But I am saying that the skin behind the ears is soft and tender, and often there's quite a bit of oily secretion in that part of the skin, so it wouldn't hurt a particle to do behind the ears with a spot of astringent now and then to ward off the blackhead menace. And (no, I ain't finished yit!) as we gals get older, the skin at the base of the throat is inclined to get red and weather-beaten. Right where that bone is. There isn't much fatty tissue beneath the skin at this point, you see, so we must supply the fat from without, by way of plenty of cold cream. When one gets a facial at the snooty beauty parlors, the beauty operator always cold creams her customer clear down to the chest. 'Twould be a swell idea if you'd give yourself a home facial and be as thorough about it.

Now I'm going to head off on another tack, gals. I want to talk about what we do with our faces and our bodies that makes us more or less beautiful. On pages 44 and 45 there are some pictures of Hollywood ladies. One of them—Madeleine Carroll—is a real beauty. The others are charming, piquant, attractive and you can add half a dozen more desirable adjectives, too, but they don't fall into the authentic beauty class as does Miss Carroll. Never mind; all four serve us with the examples we need.

The example we get from Madeleine is that she does not consider beauty sufficient. How many times have you run up against an exceedingly pretty or even downright beautiful girl who apparently assumed that she needn't bother to be smart or sweet or charming or amusing—that her beauty was enough? The most beautiful girls who ever wandered out Hollywood way have almost without exception become "also-rans," while less strictly beautiful folks like Shearer and Harlow and Loy have taken one part good looks and one part charm and intelligence and fixed up a recipe for success. Madeleine Carroll seems to be an exception to this rule. You've seen informal snapshots of Madeleine, haven't you? And she's always beautifully groomed, isn't she? And usually very conservatively dressed, too, isn't she? That is to say, she sticks to simple lines, good materials, and despises the gadget and the gew-gaw. A good rule for everybody, but a particularly good rule for pretty girls, and especially pretty, blonde girls, who can so easily look flashy and overdressed.

And then there is Deanna Durbin, who looks really pretty when she sings, and so serves us with another example. I've seen her in a broadcasting studio, where there is no chance to "dub in" the voice separately, so I know what I'm talking about. You may not be able to sing a note, but wait, there are other difficult physical activities which this example will serve to point up, too. How do you look when you talk? How do you look when you eat? And how do you suppose singers learn to sing, in the first place, without making funny faces? They practice in front of a mirror, that's what they do. You practice talking and, yes, even eating in front of a mirror once in a while, even if you do feel sorta silly, and see if you can't correct any unpleasant or un-charming facial mannerisms you may have.

I've picked Sonja Henie and Barbara Stanwyck for examples of body grace. The one a dancer on ice—and superlatively graceful—and the other not a dancer, but remarkable for the way she manages difficult costumes and difficult situations in her pictures. Of course, I want you all to have the best-looking figures you possibly can acquire. But, while you're waiting for diet and exercise to reduce you or build you up, you can, meantime, be learning to handle your body to its best advantage.

HOW'S your posture? Can you walk across the room with a couple of good-sized books on your head and keep the books from falling off? Add that to your exercises; nothing else I know about makes for greater balance and grace in walking. If you're sitting down reading this article, as I presume you are, see if your head is ducked forward in ungainly fashion. And how about the stomach; is it poked out in a lump? Lots of us can hold the middle in well enough when we're standing up, but when we sit down—oof! We forget about it and undo a lot of good work. Sit back so that your rear end touches the back of your chair. Hold your magazine up to you—don't you slump down to meet the magazine. And now get up again for a minute and walk across the room. See if you use all of your foot and the muscles in your legs. Do you put all of your foot down at once? That's wrong. Come down on your heel and then bend onto the ball of your foot. And put your leg muscles into play, too. I can't tell you, on paper, how to do that, but you'll feel it all right yourself and it's easy enough to correct wrong walking habits with a bit of concentration. Point your toes straight ahead, or toe out a little. Swing from your hips, but don't swing your hips themselves. There's a difference, and the latter method ain't refined and ladylike. Pull the tum in as flat as you can, and pull the rear in as tight as you can, as if you were going to be spanked. If you'll keep your chin up and your shoulders back, the bustline will automatically lift itself, and that never hurt anybody's figure.

As I said before, you can't be expected to think about yourself every minute of the time. Nobody, least of all your friend M. M., would wish it. But you can, when you're walking alone or sitting alone give a little attention to good posture habits and after a while they'll become as unconscious as breathing.

And, again, don't assume that if you look okay front view—and usually from the shoulders up—that everything's dandy. A full length mirror is an invaluable aid to good grooming and the difficult beauty angles. You can buy inexpensive long mirrors which can be attached to the back of a door. You could do some of your exercises in front of it and see how you're progressing. You could turn yourself sidewise and see if that dress, which looks so chic up top, doesn't maybe cling a bit too tightly about the hips or beneath the sitting down place, as dresses are apt to do after a trip to the cleaner. You may or may not know that a good cleaner can stretch a dress enough for practical purposes in the exact spot where you want it stretched. He can also shrink a dress in the same spot. I'm the first one to admit that it takes a little trouble to see to these things, yes, but it is worth it.

Now, children, mama has a small present for you. How'd yuh like to get in on the ground floor on a new face powder—five swell shades to experiment with and no cost? This powder contains a new ingredient which the manufacturers call, with pardonable pride, balmite. It's a soft base which makes the powder go on soft as anything and does away with that powdery look. Paris still screams that faces should have a dull finish—what they call a "masque" finish. This powder achieves it, and the shades really are swell. The powder is uniformly colored, too—no whitish particles mixed in with the rachel, or whatever. I'll send you a sample of each of the five shades if you are interested. And if you are interested, everybody, address your request for these powder samples to Beauty Department, MODERN SCREEN Magazine, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Naughty But Nice producer considered her too sweet.

WHEN testing for the production of the famous Broadway stage play "Children's Hour" began, Bonita was but one among hundreds of children who had been called in to try out for the role. William Wyler, the director, and Mr. Goldwyn, remembering her performance as the younger sister of Eric Linden, in "Ah, Wilderness," thought her much too sweet for such a vengeful role.

Then Lillian Hellman saw Bonita's try-out and hesitated before dismissing her as unsuitable. Lillian Hellman was the authoress of "Children's Hour," retitled "These Three" for the screen, and she had in her mind's eye just the child for that part.

Mr. Goldwyn called Bonita in to her office, interviewed her at length, and still not convinced that she was suitable for the role, asked her, "Do you think you could enact the role of such a mean person?"

Bonita expressed the certainty that she could and then added that she would do her best. She tells the story in her own words, "I might have been passed by if it hadn't been for Miss Hellman. She seemed to think that I could do the part. Mr. Wyler and Mr. Goldwyn both thought I was too sweet. But, finally, Miss Hellman was so convinced that she persuaded Mr. Goldwyn to give me the script to take home and study.

"I read the part that night and knew right then and there that the part of Mary Tilford was one that I wanted very badly. I studied the script hard. I returned several days later and read through the part for Mr. Goldwyn and Mr. Wyler.

"Then Mr. Goldwyn said to me, 'Bonita, will you please leave the office? We want to discuss you.'

"Of course, I was very nervous and excited and couldn't stand still until they called me back. Then Mr. Goldwyn asked for me. As I walked into his office he got up from his chair and handed the script back to me. He said, 'Here, Bonita, the part is yours.' That was about the happiest moment of my life."

Receiving honorable mention in the Academy Awards last March for her work in "These Three" was a signal honor for little Bonita.

Bonita herself likes "meanie" roles. She thinks that they furnish a greater acting opportunity than the roles of goody-goodies. But she wants her public to know that she can play nice parts, too.

In her own words she says, "I like meanie roles very much. But I do not want to be typed. I want to do all sorts of roles."

SHE began her screen career because of marked resemblance to Ann Harding. She appeared in "Westward Passage" in 1931 and in "The Life of Vergie Winters," three years later. In both pictures she was Ann Harding's daughter.

In 1932 she had a part in "Silver Dollar," and in the following year played the part of Diana Wynyard and Clive Brook's daughter in "Cavalcade." Then she got a part as Eric Linden's pesky kid sister in "Ah, Wilderness," her biggest role up to that time.

Some time ago when Bonita was lunching in the RKO-Radio Commissary, where many of the stars eat, with her mother and a friend, Katharine Hepburn saw her.

She left her table and walked over to Bonita. She took one long look and then said, "Aren't you the little girl who played in These Three?"

Bonita answered in the affirmative.

Miss Hepburn looked at Bonita for a long time and then uttered in a surprised voice, "I didn't think you were so sweet, Bonita."

The next moment she ran out of the Commissary and left Bonita completely bewildered and dumbstruck.

And so overcome with the child's sweetness, gleaned from a moment's look, was Katharine Hepburn, that she arranged to have Bonita play a part in "Quality Street."

Bonita has found it difficult to convince not only her fans and her friends of her good temperament, but directors and producers as well. The story which she tells about how she had to convince one producer that she could be effectively nasty and ill-mannered in spite of her pleasing off-stage personality, is paralleled with another incident that she tells of how she convinced another one she could play the role of a nice girl, too.

Several months ago, when RKO-Radio started casting for "Make Way for a Lady," the name of Bonita Granville was presented to Producer Zion Myers as a possibility. There was one child role, a younger sister of Anne Shirley.

MR. MYERS, it is reported, gave Bonita a great deal of thought, and then said to the casting director, "She'll never do. Do you mean to tell me that that brat can act the role of a nice child? Why, in 'These Three' she was nothing but meanness. She'll never do."

The studio continued looking about for a child star for the part. Finally Vivian Cosby, a writer-friend of Mrs. Granville, who knew Mr. Myers very well, decided to try her luck at convincing the producer of Bonita's versatility.

The authoress and the little star called on Mr. Myers. Nothing about the part for "Make Way for a Lady" was discussed. Miss Cosby had decided beforehand that Mr. Myers would have to make the decision on the basis of what he saw, when he saw Bonita personally.

The three talked about everything under the sun except the picture scheduled to go into production shortly.

Bonita must have had an idea of how she had impressed Mr. Myers because after cordial greetings had been exchanged, as the writer and her young friend were about to leave, she turned about suddenly and asked, "Now, honestly, Mr. Myers, don't you think I'm a nice girl?"

Mr. Myers was a little nonplussed for a moment, but he did feel that Bonita was very sweet and attractive. So he answered in all honesty, "Yes, Bonita, I think you are a very nice girl."

The next question broke the air like a bombshell.

"Well, then, Mr. Myers, why can't I have the part of Anne Shirley's younger sister, if you really think I'm sweet?"

Mr. Myers was too taken back to do much of anything except laugh. He paused for a moment and then answered, "Well Bonita, maybe you can do the part. It's yours."

Rehearsals had hardly begun before Bonita was called to Paramount, according to the stipulations of a previous contract, to appear in "Maid of Salem." In this picture she enacts the role of a highstrung, neurotic child who always feels that she is bewitched. Bonita always got a "nice girl" part when "Maid of Salem" called her into the "meanie" class again.

But there was to be a splendid consolation for Bonita at RKO-Radio. She was given a fine role in "Plough and the Stars," starring Barbara Stanwyck and Preston Foster.

And whereas she throws fits and sees ghosts in "Maid of Salem," Bonita plays the kind of role for which she had been striving so long in "Call It a Day," a light comedy about the life of a small, average family on the first day of Spring. Bonita, as an artistically-inclined youngster, tucks the picture under her arm and steals everything from Olivia de Havilland, Ian Hunter, and Alice Brady.

Daye Shade Gives You Glowing, Dramatic Color During the Day
Nihte Shade Gives You Soft, Romantic Loveliness at Night

LADY ESTHER ANNOUNCES TWO, NEW MAGICAL SHADES OF FACE POWDER!

Two Amazing New Shades That Are Literally Transforming in the Beauty They Give You Under the Most Searching Sunlight or the Unkindest Artificial Light!

By Lady Esther

Two new shades of face powder, the like of which you have never before seen!

Two new shades that give face powder a magic that has never before been known!

To look at these shades in the box you would just think them two new strange shades of face powder. You would never imagine them to have any marvelous effect.

But they are literally transforming! They do things for you that face powder has never been known or dreamed to do. (I do not merely claim this, I have proved it on the skins of more than 10,000 women.)

These shades impart the full magic of color. They do not confine themselves to your skin or your face. They extend themselves to your whole personality. They definitely flatter. They definitely "glamor-ize." They create a new "YOU"!

They are striking examples of the power of color!

A Dramatic Shade for Day

Daye and Nihte I call these new shades of mine.

Daye is primarily for daytime wear. It is a luscious golden tone, magical in its effect. It is a dramatic shade. It is young and exciting. It gives you the freshness of a Spring morn, the glow of the heart of a rose. It creates a gay beauty that is preserved under the most glaring sunlight.

A Romantic Shade for Night

Nihte is primarily for night-time wear. It is a romantic shade, suggestive of moonlit waters and soft music. It casts a pearly radiance about you. It gives your skin a transparent look, as if the moon shone through it. It creates a soft ethereal beauty that can challenge the most unsympathetic artificial light.

At My Expense

These new face powder shades and their effect can no more be described than can a radiant dawn or a glorious sunset. They have to be seen to be appreciated. That's why I offer to send a liberal trial supply to every woman in America.

Just send me your name and address and by return mail you will receive generous packets of both Daye and Nihte shades. Try on each shade, Daye during the day and Nihte at night. See what each does! Step up your appearance, your whole appeal. You will be more than surprised and delighted with what your mirror shows you and your friends tell you.

Mail coupon today for your free packets of my new Daye and Nihte shades of face powder.

(You can paste this on a penny postcard) (34) FREE

To Wear Right Now!

The navy blue wool coat is the short, flared style which is very popular this spring. Almost any pattern for a short swagger could be used to duplicate this, giving the finishing touches of collar and front detail, which makes Madge's so attractive.

Accessories for this ensemble are, of course, navy blue. Madge's hat is navy blue fabric and resembles a gob hat with its shallow crown and turned-back brim. Very gay.

THEN there's a good afternoon dress of printed silk foulard. Instead of navy, the predominating blue of this is on the royal blue cast with the gay, small figures in maroon and white. Although it is a one-piece style, a flare peplum gives it a two-piece effect. The neckline is arranged like a scarf, coming very high and close to the throat. A bright red belt gives the only trimming detail. It's one of those simple dresses that appears rather complicated through the draping and cut of the fabric. Madge told me that this goes into every bag she packs for a weekend trip, because it doesn't show wrinkles and can fill in wherever a sports dress wouldn't be quite right.

Another grand weekender is the apple green woolen jacket dress trimmed with white pique. The short jacket has collar and cuffs of pique and tops a tailored dress which buttons from neck to hemline. The buttons, belt, gloves, shoes and hat are all in white. Without its jacket, the green woolen dress makes a perfect active sports dress, and that is just how Madge uses it when week-ending. It's a great space-saver when you have to plan a few costumes to see you through a long weekend visit. With the jacket, it travels to your destination and brown or navy accessories make it practical en route, using the white after you reach the country.

The fourth selection from the Evans' bountiful closet is a two-piece light-weight woolen suit. Madge wears this almost like a uniform because it's both comfortable and practical for her busy Hollywood life. Beige is the color with the crispest of white pique for trimming. And just so that her favorite blue isn't entirely out of the set-up, it shows up beside the beige stripe in that giddy, white grosgrain lid she's wearing.

As you will notice, in studying these last two costumes, Madge has selected two light shades which can have either navy blue or white accessories. She never lets her color scheme get out of hand, and it is the most practical tip I could give to you who have to budget closely.

THAT good-looking white strap slipper pictured, is a very moderately priced shoe being featured in shops and stores all over the country. I think the cut-out detail is unusually well done. It's the sort of shoe you will find indispensable for summer wear because it will tie up so beautifully with cottons, silks and woolens. This particular shoe is in white buck. If you would like to know the price and where it can be bought, just write in for my June Shopping Bulletin. The coupon is at the end of this article.

Two of the designers at Madge's studio have some interesting fashion theories which are worth passing on to you. Adrian, with whom you are all familiar, believes that white is the most romantic color a woman can wear for evening. He says, "A woman always looks more helpless in white than she does in a color, and it is that helpless air which makes men propose. White is a color that suggests both fragility and desirability."

And I always thought that pink was supposed to be the color that made the gents fall like ten pins. Amplifying on the color theme, Adrian added, "Wine is one of the best shades women can wear and purple is one of the worst, because it is aging. In the summer, there is nothing like a pink linen frock to induce romance."

Dolly Tree, who designs most of Madge's screen wardrobe, believes that the real secret of being well-dressed is a minute attention to detail.

"It is the crisp, white handkerchief in the coat pocket, the spotless blouse, the well-pressed skirt, the well-shined shoes that make the difference between 'getting by' and 'being smart,'" she thinks. "Most of the girls appearing on the screen, are definitely detail-conscious. They have been made that way, not only by seeing themselves on the screen, but also by the attention paid to this point by those employed to do just that thing.

"Through the screen," she continued, "women in audiences all over the country are rapidly coming to realize that the effect of an entire ensemble may be ruined by overlooking one tiny detail. They are recognizing the fact that smartness is just another way of saying 'neatness.'"

HAVE you any idea what care goes into keeping a screen costume looking fresh and new during the taking of a picture? Dolly Tree went on to say that when a costume is not being worn in a scene, it is put away with loving care in the studio wardrobe. For instance, she mentioned a beige woolen suit, banded in sable, which was never hung back in the wardrobe without being given a thorough going over. It was examined for infinitesimal seam rips. The fur was brushed, the garment pressed and great care was taken when it was placed on the hanger to see that the shoulder seams fell exactly where they should.

"If women in everyday life would take such care of their clothes," she remarked, "they would find that garments would keep their freshness and smartness very much longer."

This same beige woolen suit had a matching sable muff which carried a small artificial corsage. And during the day's filming, it would become mussed, so whether the damage was slight or small, the flowers were replaced with an exact duplicate each time the costume was worn. Of course, only the eagle eye of the camera would make such super care necessary, and yet it proves how much thought and interest must go into the upkeep of anything you wear, if you would wish to be as well-groomed as your favorite star.

According to Dolly Tree, neatness is nine-tenths of the effect of a costume worn on the screen. And she can't see any reason why anyone, regardless of what her clothes cost, cannot cultivate the type of neatness which classifies itself as smart. It may take an hour in the morning, or even staying up a little later at night for the business woman, but it is a definite step toward the trim good looks which men admire and for which all of you yearn.

Don't forget that all the information about the white buck shoes is contained in the June Shopping Bulletin, besides other summertime fashion tips that are very useful.

Skin's So Dry Powder won't Stay
ONE MINUTE WITH POND'S VANISHING CREAM
POND'S V
Then Powder's Swell ...Stays on for Hours

MELT Flakiness Away—in One Application

DULL and dead looking, or tight and shiny . . . Dry skin needs the flattery of powder! Yet powder just won't stick to it!

Try softening that dry, "tight" skin with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream). Then see how beautifully your skin takes powder!

A distinguished dermatologist explains this instant softening: "A keratolytic cream has the ability to melt away dried-out, dead surface cells. Then the smooth, underlying cells appear, moist and young. The skin takes on a fresh, softened appearance instantly. Vanishing Cream regularly applied also preserves the softness of the skin."

Use Pond's Vanishing Cream for more than just holding your powder. You'll find it does wonders for your skin, too.

For overnight—Apply after cleansing. Not greasy. It won't smear.

For protection—Apply before long hours out of doors. Your skin won't rough up!

For flakiness—A film of Pond's Vanishing Cream smooths flakiness away. Make-up goes on perfectly. Stays.

Hollywood Snob Story

Year's, you could rent a nice bunk for sixteen dollars a day, and that a room with your own tub and hot and cold water set you back forty dollars every twenty-four hours; that is, if you could get in at all—which most people couldn't.

They say that you can acquire a lovely sun tan at Sun Valley, while skating. But Ralph Bellamy, who owns half interest in the Tennis Club at Palm Springs, points out that you can acquire just as becoming a tan at Palm Springs—and you don't have to skate!

Joan and Franchot Tone added considerable luster to Hollywood and to themselves, a few months ago, by knowing Leopold Stokowski well enough to entertain at a large party for him. What is more, they had a gate-crasher at their shindig who had a bona fide title! Yep! Recently they have been adding more laurels to their wreaths by entertaining members of the Ballet Russe. It's very exciting. You never know, these days, whom Joan and Tone will be knowing next.

But you can be Somebody in Hollywood even if you don't know Somebody outside. And it entitles you to all sorts of special and pleasant privileges. I rode one evening with some visiting friends, in their car, to a preview. Just as the chauffeur was about to make an impressive sweep to the front of the theatre, a cop waved him back. "Just a minute, Buddy!" he admonished. "Gotta let this other car through!" The other car swept through and the cop came back, looking pompous. "That was Ginger Rogers' car," he explained. "You can see how it was!"

Our driver, who was Irish, couldn't see at all how it was when he had had the right of way. I think I had better not quote his remarks.

Then there was the actress upon whom I happened to be calling when she instructed her secretary to call a smart dress shop and ask it to keep open for an hour or so after its regular closing so that she might come in and select a few things. The secretary reported that the management regretted that it could not oblige the lady.

Whoooosh! What a storm arose! "They do it for Marion Davies, don't they?" she shrieked. "I hear that they kept open for her on a rush night, too. The biggest beauty shop in town will stay open all day Sunday for Jean Harlow! What are they trying to do, insult me?"

In vain did the secretary attempt to convince her employer that the shop was willing to send truck loads of its stock to her home at her convenience, with a corps of salespeople in charge. In still more vain did she indicate, with what tact she could muster, that the luminaries for whom shops were kept open bought in enormous quantities and that they usually gave presents or tips to any employees who remained overtime to oblige them. But the tantrum continued.

At last the harassed secretary sighed to me, "If they'll keep a shop open for you after hours, it proves that you're important. You could probably rent the City Hall for a party if you had a name!"

She looked awfully tired, so I went home and ruminated on the story of Carole Lombard, who called to make reservations on an airplane for herself and some friends. "I trust," Miss Lombard is reported to have remarked, "I trust that you will not make reservations for any outsiders on the same plane."

To which, I am told, the airplane reservation maker retorted, "I don't know what an 'outsider' is, madame. But I trust that we shall have some more reservations on the plane or we won't make a dime on the trip."

Of course it is a rule that the moment you become Somebody, you instantly install eighteen telephones in your house. But it is even more of a rule than you must never, never answer the phone yourself. You would lose caste at once. You must be "busy."

A friend of Boris Karloff who "knew him when"—and Boris had about twenty years of "when"—phoned one evening with the idea of doing him a favor. He was told that Mr. Karloff was at dinner and could not be disturbed.

"All right," said the friend, good-humoredly. "Ask him to call me when he is at liberty, please."

Four weeks later the friend encountered Boris. "I left word for you to call," he protested, mildly, "and you didn't."

"I've been very busy," said Mr. Karloff. And that, one supposes, proved something or other.

There is another funny thing. It used to make you seem to be Somebody if you had met Dorothy Parker. But, since Dottie has been living and working in Hollywood, one hears very little of her. When the Earl of Warwick first arrived in our midst there was a great twitter. But after he signed a picture contract, he sort of disappeared. Wonder what would happen if "dear Al" should sign a movie contract.

course, there are dozens of other things planned, all explained in the elaborate folder—the trip to Universal Studios, where that smash hit musical, "Top of the Town," was made, to see the stars and have lunch, a trip to NBC Studios to meet such radio stars as Bing Crosby, Bob Burns, Lum and Abner, Marion Talley.

"Finally I landed in 'Strike Me Pink,' the Broadway musical hit. That was encouraging. Next I lined up another role in 'Growing Pains'." After that he was in an artistic flop. He could secure nothing, so he returned to Hollywood to sing and dance in a show entitled "Take A Chance." Although he scored, he didn't win his movie contract for another year. During that discouraging interval he worked in all the little theatre presentations he could get into. There was no money in them, but maybe rediscovery.

You might suppose a twenty-year-old who was rediscovered, and who'd never paused to be carefree, would begin to frolic when he at last became a featured screen player. But not this Johnny. He concentrated for nine months before he ventured to have a date. In six months they took up his option, so he knew he was past the first hurdle. He waited another three months before he bought his first car. Then he asked Cecilia Parker out.

That initial adventure demanded more. "A fellow can't very well have much of a date until he has a car," he amplifies. He is enjoying parties at homes, the movies, the moonlight, and dancing. On Friday evenings it's college night in the Cocoanut Grove, and Johnny generally is happily present.

His rumored romance with Eleanore Whitney is hardly likely to have a serious denouement. But it isn't a publicity attachment. A number of people thought it was, inasmuch as the two have been teamed three or four times.

"Eleanore and I seem to fight!" Johnny exclaims, in endeavoring to analyze their friendship. The day we had lunch I asked him about her. He lowered his voice to reply. "She was out with Lew Ayres last night." Lew was at the adjoining table. But later, when Johnny was laid low with the flu, Eleanore tiptoed into a publicity woman's office and shyly queried, "Do you think it would be all right if I sent some gags over to Johnny?" The reply being in the affirmative, Eleanore hastened up to a dime store on the Boulevard and collected all the nonsensical games and books in sight. A huge chocolate heart was tucked in with them.

"I keep a diary," Johnny admitted to me. "Two diaries, in fact. In one I just jot down what I've done during the day, whom I've met and what was talked about. In the other I record my very personal reactions. "Oh," he grinned, "what I write in this one's okay. But Mary Carlisle was over to dinner and I happened to mention my diaries. Funny, I haven't heard a word from her since!"

We were interrupted by a note, handed him by a waiter. Johnny chuckled. "See those folks in there?" He pointed to a merry table in the main room. "I suppose we're ritzy, having lunch out here on the veranda." He passed me the piece of paper on which was scribbled "Dear Johnny Lombard—Just because you're going to buy a lot you needn't get so elegant already!"

His brown eyes twinkled. "They call me Johnny Lombard because I tried to kid them. I walked over to where they were working, on Carole Lombard's set. When they wondered why I was there I said on the spur of the moment, 'Oh, Carole and I are old pals!' I've never met her. They were awed for the time being, until they checked up. They told Miss Lombard, who promptly had a photograph of herself delivered to me autographed, 'With kindest wishes to Johnny Lombard'."

He makes no pretense to a flashy, surface sophistication. Altogether, Johnny's just right to have around.

★★★ Waikiki Wedding

Romance against an Hawaiian setting gives Bing Crosby a swell opportunity to practice his pleasant vocalizing and his easy-going comedy. For his new picture, script writers have fashioned a story which contains more bright lines than is customary in the Crosby epics, and the result is a most entertaining farce with music.

As press agent for a pineapple company, Bing finds himself romantically involved with Shirley Ross, a young lady from Iowa who has won a contest entitling her to be known as "The Pineapple Girl." Their romance, of course, offers an excellent excuse for several song numbers, most notable of which is "Blue Hawaii." Other good songs are "In a Little Hula Heaven" and "Sweet Is the Word for You."

In the comedy department, Bob Burns and Martha Raye can almost be described as terrific. Miss Raye, under the influence of a director who must have told her she could be funny without yelling at the top of her lungs, comes through with a grand performance, and sings a catchy comedy number called "Okolehao." Leif Erikson tops the supporting cast with his portrayal of Shirley Ross' indignant fiancé, and there are well-rounded performances by Grady Sutton, George Barbier, Anthony Quinn and Granville Ross. Directed by Frank Tuttle.—Paramount.

★★★ Quality Street

If you are in the mood for "Quality Street," you will undoubtedly find it one of the most delightful pictures you have seen in some time. But you will have to be in a frame of mind which will not find its quiet charm too full of dull moments. For Sir James Barrie's play has been brought to the screen without a Hollywood touch.

It is the unenlivened tale of those ladies in the anything but gay 1840's who sat behind their lace curtains and watched what little of the world went by on Quality Street. The only excitement on the street was when a Man came calling on Phoebe Throssel, nee Katharine Hepburn, who lived quietly and hopefully with her elder sister, Fay Bainter, and their faithful cook, Cora Witherspoon. This Man is Franchot Tone, the gallant and dashing Dr. Brown, on whom Katharine has pinned all her girlish hopes. But Dr. Brown takes off to the Napoleonic Wars and leaves Phoebe to become an old maid and a school-marm. She does both so thoroughly that when the doctor comes back after several years he doesn't even recognize his Phoebe. But the old gals had spirit even in those days, and how Phoebe finally wins him to an actual proposal affords many hilarious moments.

Katharine Hepburn has here found a role that is well suited to her talents, but the one who walks away with the picture is Fay Bainter, who gives one of the year's finest performances. Cora Witherspoon, Franchot Tone, Estelle Winwood and Eric Blore also are admirable in their roles. Directed by George Stevens.—RKO-Radio.

★★ A Family Affair

This is pleasant, heart-warming screen-fare, brightened by a good script and a brace of first-rate performances. In the first place there's Lionel Barrymore, who manages to go through the entire picture without once resorting to his familiar routine of tricks. He portrays a small-town judge and head of a family whose difficulties need a judicial hand to guide them. In a completely un-Barrymore performance, Barrymore steals the show. Almost as effective is Mickey Rooney, the young son of the family. Young Rooney, who is probably the ablest actor in Hollywood's younger set, adds another to his string of stand-out performances.

Cecilia Parker and Eric Linden play the young lovers with a freshness which belies the fact that they've been playing young lovers together for lo, these many seasons. Spring Byington is warmly human as Barrymore's wife, and Julie Haydon is lovely and capable as their elder daughter. Charley Grapewin plays the villain of the piece with his customary finesse, and a little lady named Margaret Marquis, who portrays Mickey Rooney's girl, makes her scenes with her adolescent gentleman friend highly amusing. You can bring the family to "A Family Affair." Directed by George B. Seitz.—M-G-M.

★★ When Love Is Young

ment. And if you are an admirer of Virginia Bruce you will be pleased to hear that the young lady exhibits the best performing she's ever done in pictures. Opposite her is Kent Taylor, who is surprisingly effective in the difficult role of a fast-talking Broadway press agent. Plot has to do with a small-town ugly duckling who goes to New York, scores a hit in musical comedy and returns to discover the guy she idolized in high school isn't the guy she thought he was.

Miss Bruce, if you can overlook the fact that she's a bit mature for a high-school girl, is lovely to gaze upon and sings several song numbers with considerable skill. Greta Meyer and Christian Rub furnish plenty of laughs as her parents, and Walter Brennan is excellent as her uncle who accompanies her to New York. Jack Smart handles the role of a Broadway producer effectively, and William Tannen is properly menacing as the high-school hero. The only dull sequence is one of those cellophane and tinsel production numbers which producers seem to feel must be inserted in every picture with music.—Universal.

★★ Nancy Steele Is Missing

In "Nancy Steele Is Missing," the producers faced a problem. The main ingredient of the story is a kidnapping, which authorities in the Hays office frown upon. To make things more difficult, it was necessary to show the kidnapper as a sympathetic character. In view of the obstacles, the script writers and the director have managed to concoct an interesting and sometimes exciting mystery melodrama. Victor McLaglen portrays the kidnaper and Walter Connolly, a wealthy munitions maker, the victim. McLaglen steals Connolly's daughter, but not for ransom. His motive, the plot makers explain, is hatred for war, hence his vengeance on Connolly. When he's sent to prison for twenty years, for another offense, he leaves the kidnapped child with a friend. In prison he meets Peter Lorre, a sinister character who learns McLaglen's secret and attempts to obtain ransom money from Connolly by fraud.

"Nancy Steele Is Missing" suffers from a lack of humor. A few light touches would have lifted its sombre mood. Best performance is Peter Lorre's, who makes the role of the soft-spoken killer outstanding. McLaglen and Connolly turn in their usual first-rate performances, and June Lang, as the kidnapped heiress, is showing improvement in her acting. Directed by George Marshall.—20th Century-Fox.

Virginia Bruce casts a pert glance at William Tannen. They're co-starred in "When Love Is Young."

★Jim Hanvey, Detective

You are probably already familiar with Octavus Roy Cohen's detective, Jim Hanvey. And Guy Kibbee's characterization of the small-town snooper who outwits the big-city sleuths at every turn won't disappoint you. Kibbee does well by the genial old gentleman and if the same could be said about the rest of the cast, this would be a picture which you shouldn't miss. But unfortunately, such is not the case. However, the fact that most of the other characterizations fall short cannot be blamed so much on the players as on the script, which drags sadly in parts, due to too many of those complications to which so many mystery stories are addicted.

Also, the "scintillating" repartee falls pretty flat in many instances, with the exception of the lines delivered by Kibbee and Catharine Doucet, who gives another of those inimitable pictures of fluttery femininity. She is the mother of Lucie Kaye, a very personable young thing who is madly in love with Tom Brown, accused of murder in the case. There are also some stolen emeralds involved. Detective Hanvey, of course, clears everything up in great style and complete nonchalance. Deserving of notice are Edward S. Brophy and Edward Gargan as a couple of thugs and Helen Jerome Eddy, whose sincerity is outstanding in the role of the murdered man's wife. Directed by Phil Rosen.—Republic.

★★Her Husband Lies

Gail Patrick is the lovely lady who has to put up with the situation in the title role and Ricardo Cortez is her unfaithful spouse. He divides his devotion between Gail and the gambling tables. And the problem is a real one, for his wife finally decides to leave him to his poker. Of course, Ricardo doesn't like to have his plans upset in this fashion, but he finally decides to give up his racket and settle down to thorough domestication. But it's not so easy, between a ruthless gang at his heels and a kid brother, Tom Brown, who, it suddenly develops, is ruining his life with gambling and wrecking the happiness of his wife, June Martel. So Ricardo tells another story to his wife, joins in a game with the kid brother and some of the pals, and intentionally is caught cheating in order to sicken Tom of the whole business. This results in Ric being wiped completely out of the picture, it being a fast rule, evidently, that crooks shouldn't be crooked.

The story, as you see, will not make you sit up and take notice, but the picture is worth while due to the good acting of the majority of the cast, which manages to lend conviction even to the most illogical sequences. Akim Tamiroff is the biggest and best meanie you've seen in some time, while Tom Brown, June Martel and Dorothy Peterson are entirely satisfactory. Directed by Edward Ludwig.—Paramount.

★ Midnight Taxi

You'll find this picture better than any tonic, if Spring has left you with the blood pressure at low ebb. It starts out with a hair-raising scene of a diabolical murder and keeps right on in that vein to the final fade-out. The story concerns the doings of those old excitement stirrer-uppers, the G-Men, with Brian Donlevy as the most fearless and foolhardy celluloid one to date.

In order to round up an uncannily clever gang of counterfeiters, Brian takes to driving a cab, and finally gets the low-down on them under this disguise. It sounds simple enough, but you can't appreciate what the stalwart Mr. Donlevy goes through until you see for yourself all those black eyes and bullet holes which adorn his person from the moment his campaign gets underway. Besides Donlevy's, good performances are turned in by Alan Dinehart, as another of those cultured crooks; Gilbert Roland as his right-hand man, and Harold Huber as a tool of the gang. Frances Drake provides a smattering of romance to the picture in a satisfactory manner. Directed by Eugene Ford.—20th Century-Fox.

★ Song of the City

Chief recommendation for this picture is the good photography and the exceptional music, which pops up just when you think you might as well be leaving. The story is laid principally in Little Italy, a fishing community on the Pacific Coast, and the shots of the fishing boats and the lusty singing of the crews are outstandingly good.

As for the story, it concerns the doings of a ne'er-do-well young man, Jeffrey Dean, who thinks life is pretty futile due, principally, to the fact that he can't get away from a young lady, Marla Shelton, who only has three million dollars to her name. So he takes a quart of liquor and a boat trip to get away from it all, but falls overboard and is fished out by a couple of Italians, Charles Judels and his son, Nat Pendleton. They take him home and romance blooms between the daughter of the house, Margaret Lindsay, and our young man. But poor Jeffrey has a time, for he realizes that now he's going to interfere with Margaret's career as an opera singer, a career to which J. Carrol Naish, an ardent suitor, is staking her. Of course, Marla's still on his trail and the complications come thick and fast. All turns out beautifully in the end, but you become a little worried wondering if the end will ever come. The best characterizations in the picture are given by those in minor roles, notably Judels, Inez Palange, as his wife, and J. Carrol Naish. Directed by Errol Taggart.—M-G-M.

Remember the once-popular team of Sally Eilers and Jimmy Dunn? Well, they're back together again. of Mischa Auer, who is rapidly becoming one of the funniest of the screen's funny men.

The story centers around an ocean liner whose passengers include a vacationing school teacher (Sally Eilers), a detective (Jimmy Dunn), and a gang of crooks (David Niven, Thurston Hall, Marjorie Gateson and Warren Hymer). The gang conceals $100,000 in currency in Miss Eilers' trunk, and when the troupe arrives at Monte Carlo, Jimmy Dunn enlists the aid of a French detective (Mischa Auer). Most audiences will agree that this is Auer's most hilarious screen performance, and he manages to lift the entire picture to a high pitch of fun and excitement. Jimmy Dunn and Sally Eilers handle their romance nicely, and Warren Hymer gets laughs as a thug whose hobby is taking baths. David Niven is a suave English crook. Directed by Alfred Werker.—Universal.

★ That Man's Here Again

This is a melodrama which turns into a farce, but it does its turning too late to lift it out of mediocrity. Those who see it will probably go because of Hugh Herbert, whose highly individual comedy is the only bright light in the rather sordid proceedings. Herbert's mere presence on the screen brought shouts from the preview audience—they were that glad to have him around.

The story is laid in a large apartment building, and the plot begins rolling when Tom Brown, one of the elevator boys, discovers Mary Maguire, an unemployed and destitute young lady, hiding in the basement. He gets her a job as maid and they fall in love. One of the tenants is Hugh Herbert, whose main concern in life is to establish the identity of his two Ming vases. One is worth $10,000, and the other is a $6 New Jersey imitation. Herbert and his pair of Mings walk away with the show. With such a funny guy on their hands, it is to be hoped that his producers will see the light and put him in better surroundings. Tom Brown is pleasing as the elevator boy, and Mary Maguire, an Australian importation, has little chance to prove anything about herself. In the supporting cast, Teddy Hart and Joseph King are outstanding. Directed by Louis King.—Warner Bros.

★★ Git Along Little Dogies

Despite the title, you'll find nothing quaint in this picture, unless you count the delicious crooning Gene Autry throws in to steady your nerves.

To begin with, Gene's sore at Judith Allen for backing an oil well that'll spoil grazing for local cows. To spite Gene, Judith gets tied up with Weldon Heyburn. Judith's dad is town banker and that's what attracts Heyburn. It's Mr. H.'s diabolical plan to get all dad's money, make believe the well is dry, until the bank's lease expires, then buy it up for himself. Gene's agin' Heyburn from the start.

Nevertheless, when he learns that the well will bring a railroad to town, his local patriotism gets the better of his animosity for Heyburn, and he helps sell stock in the well. Heyburn now spreads the rumor that the well is dry, and the enraged cowhands who've bought stock come after Gene with enough rope to hang his horse.

Poor Gene has an all-around hard time. Finally, after eluding a posse of cowmen, and knocking the spots out of Heyburn, he blows up the well, the oil sky-rockets, and Judith gets an oil-stained kiss. Western fans will get all that's coming to them, and then some, and Autry fans will agree this is Gene's best to date.—Republic.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...
Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

that the Aherne is a fine technician. But there was something amiss, for Mr. Aherne still isn't in any sense a matinee idol even in New York.

Oddly enough, the very quality missing in Aherne crowned Errol Flynn a film idol in his first picture. This dashing young Irishman possesses an abundance of warmth and appeal. The same type as Aherne, they are as different as day is from night. Errol is what is known to the trade as a "natural," meaning limitless possibilities as to personal appeal.

Turning his back on Fate, Flynn does not even wish to be an actor. In fact he says, "This acting stuff is all right, but I really want to write. You know, I've just had my first novel published. Now, there's something I'm really proud of!"

This may sound strange coming from one who has so suddenly reached the top. If you talk to this Flynn guy for a few minutes you realize that he is very serious and knows what he's after. He really doesn't give a hang for this matinee idol business and would swap it all for a good trip to the jungles to hunt a few rough cats.

However, again it's the case of the idol not having much to say about all this. The public has claimed him and so Flynn's hunting trip must be postponed until he loses that certain something the fans clamor for—and losing "sax" appeal is about as difficult as shaking off the landlord if you're back in your rent.

ANOTHER hunter sharing top popularity honors is Clark Gable. Not that he has a yen to chase a roaring lion about, but he does enjoy shooting just for the sport of it.

Gable was fortunate in quite a different way from some actors. He tried, and for some time, to click on the stage, but never quite made the grade. There were years of struggle and a few good parts, but none good enough to make his name ring out on good ole Broadway. No one seemed to remember him once the curtain descended on the last act. So Clark deserted and went West for jobs in stock where there was at least steady employment. In the West he played the small towns and bided his time. Along came the eleventh hour, and, true to fiction, his big chance popped up. Clark Gable received an offer from the movies.

What Clark couldn't do on Broadway, he accomplished in Hollywood practically overnight. But he wants to remain the rugged he-man of the great open spaces and isn't at all pleased with drawing-room roles.

In drawing-room or jungle, Gable remains one of the most popular idols of the films. Nor can he, nor does he try, to explain it all. He just accepts it, taking it all in stride. Could it be that Gable came in when virility was on the wane and gave it to his public with a capital V? And if this is the case, will the tide turn and leave this idol stranded on the sands? No! Because Clark has that elusive charm which makes for great personal popularity.

While we are keeping abreast of the times, let's have a look at Francis Lederer. His career represents the antithesis of the aforementioned Gable struggle for recognition.

Lederer was an importation from the European stage and came to New York comparatively unknown. He was a handsome guy, according to the rules of male pulchritude, of the distinctly Latin type. His appearance lent a romantic air to his altogether charming personality, and might in some small measure be responsible for his spontaneous success on the American stage.

With the opening of his first play, "Autumn Crocus," the first-nighters acclaimed him the idol of New York. He had warmth, appeal, charm and intelligence all wrapped up in a magnetic personality, and Broadway resounded with his praises.

Immediately, the movies claimed him for their own and off he went to Hollywood with proffers of good old California gelt, and bigger and better fame. Promises are sometimes like pie crust—easily broken—and there are none who know this quite as well as Mr. Lederer.

As a movie star, he proved a disappointment—that is, in view of the idolatry he received on his stage debut in New York. That same quality that endeared him to his first American audiences was completely lost before the camera. Try as he might, he couldn't seem to become an idol of the fickle films.

Like some of our other actors who, according to histrionics, are the tops, but according to the rules for the tops in film idols—well there is just something missing. He lacks that spark on the screen which enabled him to click so forcefully on the stage.

OF the newcomers, Tyrone Power is destined to become a very popular star. He certainly possesses everything that it takes to place him in the front ranks of the personalities. With only two important roles to his credit thus far, and more to come, he has made the ladies of the land sit up and take notice. He has, you see, that which Gene Raymond, a very competent actor who has played many good parts on the stage and in the movies, lacks—warmth, appeal and a subtle bid for your sympathy.

Whenever you see a large crowd of people surrounding some star, then you can be sure he is one of the lucky few—a real matinee idol. For there are stars and stars—the difference being that all stars are not idols. Box office records prove this in no uncertain terms.

There's no telling why some idols catch on and others, just as competent, fail to. However, my guess is that its neither luck nor an accident of birth. Personally, it seems logical that it's a combination of both. Some are born with that certain something and others arrive with nothing but a few lusty screams. It seems these lucky few that possess warmth of appeal are the idols for both reasons—stars born and lucky enough in birth to be gifted with that illusive something that crowns them the "men of the moment."

..and so easy to Safely Tint
GRAY HAIR

Now, without any risk, you can tint those streaks or patches of gray or faded hair to lustrous shades of blonde, brown or black. A small brush and Brownatone does it. Prove it—by applying a little of this famous tint to a lock of your own hair.

Used and approved—for over twenty-four years by thousands of women. BROWNATONE is safe. Guaranteed harmless for tinting gray hair. Active coloring agent is purely vegetable. Cannot affect waving of hair. Is economical and lasting—will not wash out. Simply retouch as the new gray appears. Imparts rich, beautiful color with amazing speed. Just brush or comb it in. Shades: "Blonde to Medium Brown" and "Dark Brown to Black" cover every need.

BROWNATONE is only 50c—at all drug and toilet counters—always on a money-back guarantee.

SEE THE DIFFERENCE WHEN SKINNY PEOPLE GAIN NEW POUNDS

Why Thousands Have Gained 10 to 25 Lbs. —QUICK!

Well-Known Artist Shows by Dramatic Comparison How Extra Pounds Can Transform a Skinny, Unattractive Figure to Normal Alluring Feminine Loveliness

GIL CREIGHTON
One of New York's best-known Poster Artists and Art Consultants

IF you look like the picture on the left—skinny, rundown, unattractive to the other sex—don't think for a moment that your case is hopeless. Thousands of men and women who never could put on an ounce before have gained 10 to 25 pounds of good, solid flesh in a few weeks with these wonderful new Ironized Yeast tablets.

In addition to their new normal attractive curves and feminine allure, they can also boast of naturally clear skin and lovely color, new pep, new popularity and joy in life that they never knew before.

Scientists recently discovered that thousands of people are thin and rundown for the single reason that they do not get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Now one of the richest known sources of Vitamin B is cultured ale yeast. By a new process the finest imported cultured ale yeast is now concentrated 7 times, making it 7 times more powerful. Then it is combined with 3 kinds of iron, pasteurized whole yeast and other valuable ingredients in little tablets known as Ironized Yeast tablets.

If you, too, need these vital elements to aid in building you up, get these new "7-power" Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist today. Note how quickly they increase your appetite and help you get more benefit from the body-building foods that are essential. Then, day after day, watch flat chest develop and skinny limbs round out to natural attractiveness. See your skin clear to natural beauty. Note new pep and energy. Soon you feel like a different person, with new charm, new personality.

Money-back guarantee

No matter how skinny and rundown you may be from lack of sufficient Vitamin B and iron, try these new Ironized Yeast tablets just a short time. See if they don't aid in building you up in just a few weeks, as they have helped thousands. If not delighted with the benefits of the very first package, money back instantly.

Only be sure you get the original Ironized Yeast tablets. Don't accept any substitute. Insist on Ironized Yeast.

Special FREE offer!

To start thousands building up their health right away, we make this FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out seal on box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Ironized Yeast Co., Inc., Dept. 36 Atlanta, Ga.

"There's the girl I left behind me"

"It was so simple—so quick and easy to use Marchand's that I was astonished at the difference it made in my entire personality."

"There she is, sitting at home alone—the girl I left behind me forever when I discovered Marchand's Golden Hair Wash," says lovely Louise A.* "I used to be a Cinderella, but now my friends say Marchand's brought out my true personality—I'm fascinating."

Let Marchand's bring you fresh popularity and a new, youthful beauty to your hair. If you are BLONDE, it will restore and keep that radiant, sunny freshness everyone admires. If you are BRUNETTE, you can rinse lovely, glowing highlights in your hair. With Marchand's you can lighten any color hair to any flattering shade you desire. Both Blondes and Brunettes use Marchand's to make excess hair on arms and legs unnoticeable. Because it is not a depilatory, it cannot leave unpleasant stubble.

Marchand's Golden Hair Wash is quick and easy to use. Colorless. Stainless. Odorless. Effective. Perfect results.

FREE—Discover your true self—and how to bring out and accent your appearance and personality. ROBERT of Fifth Avenue, famous as the man who "makes you beautiful" has written an amazing brochure for Marchand's, which tells you what type you are, what to wear, how to makeup, new hair styles and other valuable advice. It's FREE to you—just send your name and a three-cent stamp to cover postage. Use coupon below.

Name on request*

"Night after night I used to sit home alone—worried about my lack of popularity—

"then one night mother brought home a bottle of Marchand's and insisted that I try it—

"now I'm the happiest girl in the world since Marchand's restored the natural beauty of my hair."

HOLLYWOOD IN THE CANDID SPOTLIGHT

Did you ever see—
Robert Taylor earning his bread and butter?
Loretta Young looking weary?
Bette Davis applying make-up?
Carole Lombard taking a singing lesson?
Winchell fighting Bernie?
Sylvia Sidney blowing her lovely nose?

These things, and many more, you will see in FOTO, America's smartest and biggest new picture magazine, which contains a special section of "off-guard" Hollywood candid snaps. In FOTO you will see your favorite stars as you have never seen them before.

But FOTO is not exclusively a movie magazine—far from it. In this first great June issue you will find exciting celluloid shots from all over the world—over 300 pictures; more than any other picture magazine! Sixty-four thrilling pages for a dime!

Special features include: "Roosevelt Romances"—why psychologists claim the President's family is endowed with a "happy virility"; "War is Hell—don't let it Happen"—a pictorial sermon of vital importance to all Americans; "Royal Playboy—the romantic photo-history of the Duke of Kent"; two pages of baby pictures; a pictorial explanation of "Why is a Woman Afraid of a Mouse?" and many others.

Society Note: Invitations from Scarlett Varden and Rhett Oakie for a "Come With the Wind" party, to celebrate a wedding anniversary in the Oakie menage, sent all their pals scurrying to the closet for costumes in keeping with the atmosphere and tradition of the South. No one knows yet just what the South had to do with the party, except that Colonel Oakie's hospitality was extremely Southern. All we know is that it's no fun drinking scotch and soda through a false beard. You can get the same effect by tossing off a beaker of mucilage.

Fashion Dept., for Men Only: In his forthcoming picture, "Saratoga," Clark Gable will display no less than twelve changes of ensemble, for the edification of he-man fashion addicts in the audience. Personally, we say it's a fine thing. For too many years guys have sat through epics watching Kay Francis change her garments. We've seen Myrna Loy slip into a new creation with her every mood. It's high time Man threw off the shackles of the double standard and asserted his equality. Are you listening, Adrian?

When you see "Kid Galahad," Edward G. Robinson's new picture, watch for a prizefight scene. One of the extras, cheering the battlers on, is Admiral Byrd. The Admiral, who has explored the earth's poles, but who will probably be remembered as the guy who popularized the penguin, was visiting the "Kid Galahad" set the day the prizefight scene was shot. They invited him to play an extra role, and he accepted.

Gals who patronize the beauty shop at the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel sometimes get a slight shock when they look at the manicurist. At first glance, the customer thinks she's having her nails done by Miriam Hopkins. Of course, as the saying goes, she ain't. The little lady is Miriam's stand-in, and between pictures she files nails and startles people.

When Producer Harry Cohn of Columbia announced a Press preview of "Lost Horizon," he really meant it, much to the embarrassment of several members of the cast who wanted to get in and see themselves in action. It didn't matter much to Ronald Colman, who never goes to his own previews anyhow, but it was slightly uncomfortable for H. B. Warner, who found himself confronted at the door by a very determined Mr. Cohn. Isabel Jewell, who had been planning for a week ahead to see the preview, acquired cold feet at the last moment and saved herself the embarrassment. Mr. C. made it up to everyone a few days later, however, when he took the cast to San Francisco by special train, for the picture's premiere.

Tony Martin doesn't trust his friends any more, and it's all on account of his ambition to raise flowers. Recently he bought packages of seeds and planted them around his house. After several weeks of tender care, he discovered the stuff he was nursing along was onions. He suspects Alice Faye, but he can't prove anything.

Many Never Suspect Cause Of Backaches

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning shows there may be something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

An excess of acids or poisons in your blood, when due to functional kidney disorders, may be the cause of nagging backache, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

item about him you might like to hear. A couple of months ago, a cigarette company invaded Hollywood to secure testimonials from the stars for an advertising campaign. And they did right well, signing up practically everybody who is anybody. But when they offered Autry $5,000 for a testimonial, he turned them down, using the most novel reason we've ever heard. He simply told them he doesn't smoke.

Is Nothing Sacred? Dept.: The flashy new roadster which Joan Blondell gave to Dick Powell last year as a wedding present is now being driven around town by Preston Foster. Dick sold it to Preston and bought a larger car. Mr. P. must be something of a diplomat, because the deal hasn't affected the Powell-Blondell happiness in the least.

Luise Rainer, it seems, took the Academy Award right in stride. The statuette was nice, and all that, but it didn't change Miss R.'s routine in the least. Day after the award, she was seen on the boulevard doing her daily marketing. If the Academy could see her going over a row of cabbages to pick out the choicest of the lot, they'd know definitely they had handed the award to the right gal. Her performance was, in a word, magnificent. And, inveterate cabbage-fanciers will tell you she always gets the best one.

On the set where they're making "Venus Makes Trouble," Venus really did make trouble. Seems the Hays office wouldn't let the statue appear without something more modest in the way of apparel. So Pat Ellis fixed it up with a few necessary articles of feminine raiment—which left poor Venus in a worse state than before.

Now that Carole Lombard is playing the distressed lady in "Damsel in Distress," she has the distinction of being the second leading lady Fred Astaire has had since he started in pictures several years ago. Carole's contract allows her to make one outside picture a year, so she was grabbed for Freddie's dancing film. Incidentally, the Lombard-Astaire combination is the most expensive co-starring team in pictures. Fred is rumored to receive $250,000 per picture, and RKO is paying Carole $200,000. So if you're ever thinking of borrowing Carole Lombard, we thought you'd like to know.

Joel McCrea has decided to stop getting friendly with strangers. Recently, on a trip to Arizona with Frances Dee, he stopped by a roadside and inquired directions of an Indian. The redskin recognized Joel and invited him in for coffee. When they left, the McCreas asked their host to look them up if he ever came to Hollywood. A week later, Joe Little Hawk arrived with Mrs. Little Hawk and six littler Hawks.

Herbert Marshall's moved into Buddy Rogers' new Beverly Hills home, which quashes all rumors that America's Sweetheart and America's B. F. will make their honeymoon cottage there. It won't be at Pickfair, either, since there isn't room there for Buddy's polo ponies. So there're plans underfoot for building in the San Fernando valley when they return from England.

The romance between Owen Davis, Jr. and Anne Shirley still goes strong, in spite of all those nasty, nasty rumors. Owen appeared at the studio the other day with a miniature of Anne on ivory, in his wrist-watch case, from which the watch had been removed. "Gives me more time to think of her," he said. Cute, eh?

Ronald Colman's life isn't his own anymore; it's his dietitian's. For, while he's working in "Prisoner of Zenda," the gain or loss of a single ounce will be fatal to his expensive costumes—all skin-tight and tailored within an inch of their lives. The only meal he's allowed to have on his own is breakfast; grapefruit, toast and coffee. Lunch and dinner are provided by the studio, and there aren't many steaks on the menu.

and gave another customer a terrific punch in the jaw. Reason: the man was staring at him, and Barton affirmed that wasn't his night to be stared at. The girl he had with him was Irene Coleman, who the next day announced her engagement to Conrad Nagel. "It may not last," she said, "but at least he isn't the rough type."

Marlene Dietrich is having no less than thirty-two costume changes for "Angel," her next at Paramount. But the difference is that not one of them is to be photographed or breathed about, until the pic is shown. Travis Banton has them all under lock and key and says the picture's release will rock the feminine world. Marlene, we understand, isn't so sure.

When Robert Young and Melvyn Douglas returned from location at Ketchum, Idaho, where they did the snow scenes for "I Met Him In Paris," they were full of tales of their prowess at skiing. They caught right on, they assured everyone at the studio, and their scenes in the picture were practically all first "takes." Then Claudette Colbert fixed things up when she threw a party for studio people which featured the premiere of the home movies she had taken at Ketchum. There were several excellent shots of Messrs. Young and Douglas, stuck head-first in a snow drift.

We've finally run down those rumors about Mae West. There is a new Mae. Proof that satisfied us was that she no longer will ask the lads to come up and see her sometime. For she's given up that sixth-story apartment in Hollywood, and moved into a Beverly Hills bungalow. And instead of lolling on white bear rugs in her leisure moments, Mae now devotes herself to raising vegetables in the back yard. It's all sort of beautiful.

Gail Patrick has just put her signature on a very fancy new contract. The document calls for twice her former salary and runs for two years without options. She will do five pictures a year, two of which must be "A" productions. An "A" production, in case you don't know, is a picture on which a producer spends more than the average amount of money and for which, naturally, he has more than the average amount of hope. In addition, all the Patrick personal expenses are paid by her husband —although she doesn't have a contract with him—which means that her entire salary is plunked into the bank.

On the "King of Gamblers" set recently we noticed two extras whose faces looked familiar. Discovered they were Louise Brooks and Evelyn Brent, both of whom were queens of the silent days. When they had fame and fortune they were generous with their money, and now they're glad to get the $7.50 per day which is the extra's stipend. And the picture's title lent an ironic note to the scene.

Sonja Henie is a lovely and ethereal creature on skates, but when she takes them off, she's one of the shrewdest business women in Hollywood. After touring the country in a highly profitable skating exhibition, she returned to her studio to make "Thin Ice," for which she's getting $85,000. But before the cameras started little Miss H. demanded a half-day's pay, which she claimed was due her from "One In A Million."

Spied Frances Farmer and Hubby Leif Erikson, morning after the "Waikiki Wedding" preview, looking over the nice reviews of the Erikson performance with their coffee. Afterwards, they climbed into the family car—and it wasn't the low-slung, diamond-studded roadster you might expect a successful young movie couple to own. It was an aged job, vintage about 1929. Of course, '29 was a very good year.

In "Cafe Metropole," Loretta Young plays an heiress. Even though she may not look like an heiress, she eats like one, according to the studio budget. For a scene in the picture, she had to eat caviar at a cafe table. "Just nibble," instructed Director Edward Griffith. "No use wearing yourself out actually trying to eat it for the entire scene." But Loretta never nibbles, in spite of that famous figger. She tied into the caviar for every shot, and the bill at the end of four days' shooting was $67.

So the ladies affected pants way back in Napoleon's days! Katharine Hepburn looks real wistful in this scene from "Quality Street."

Victor McLaglen was exhibiting his fifty-three chest expansion the other day, on the "Wee Willie Winkie" set, for the amazement of the cast. Shirley Temple stood by for a long time taking in all fifty-three inches. Then she said, "Mr. McLaglen, is this the way you really look, or are you in disguise?"

Marlene Dietrich won't let photographers snap her with daughter, Maria Seiber, anymore. It's not because Marlene doesn't love her offspring, but it seems Maria has grown so rapidly of late that right now she's as tall as her mother. And glamor queens simply don't have grown daughters.

Katherine De Mille, in her extreme youth, used to write reams of poetry. A few weeks ago she felt the Muse beckoning her once more, so she went through an old trunk or two to look over the stuff of her childhood. She was highly encouraged when she came across a sonnet which surprised her with its quality. It was really a De Mille epic. The thing pleased her so that she picked up a volume of Shakespeare, just to see how the other poets were doing. And, unfortunately, she discovered her sonnet. It was just as good when Shakespeare wrote it as it was a few centuries later, when Katherine had copied it.

It may not be news to report that Garbo has a new fan, but it helps the announcement when you add that the new admirer is Charles Boyer, who is co-starring with her in "Marie Walewska." It's Boyer's first picture with the Great One, and he's more than impressed. In fact, he's a press agent's dream, for he comes to the studio on days when he isn't working, just to watch the Garbo emote.

You wouldn't guess it to look at either of them, but Martha Raye and Leopold Stokowski are the best of friends. The Philadelphia Symphony conductor first noticed Martha when he discovered she was a collector of phonograph records, with a leaning toward modern classics. And Martha discovered the maestro when he told her swing music fascinated him, more as a phenomenon than a study, you understand. Anyway, he has presented Martha with several sets of records, and she has taught him a chorus of a popular swing number. There's talk around that it's "Mr. Ghost Goes to Town," but chances are the Philadelphia Orchestra won't include it in its repertoire this season.

Bumped into Jimmy Stewart after the "Seventh Heaven" preview. Between gulps of coffee, he explained he was the victim of the jitters, which overcome him every time he sees himself in a new screen role. "Every time I see myself pull a boner, I lose a couple of pounds," said Jimmy. "On the stage, a poor scene can be done over the next night, but this is different. It's like writing a check in indelible ink; there's nothing you can do about it."

Casting "Gone With the Wind" is still Hollywood's favorite pastime. Everyone in town is busy picking candidates for parts. Just when producers were agreed that Clark Gable was the logical actor to step into the shoes of the swashbuckling character, Rhett Butler, a little matter of contract turned up to give them more headaches. Clark, it appears, is much in demand in his own barnyard and his studio won't release him. Miriam Hopkins is the probable choice for the part of Scarlett O'Hara, but there's informal talk in some quarters of Norma Shearer returning to pictures in the role. The usual rumors are afloat that an unknown may finally be picked for this prize plum, but at the present writing, it's anybody's guess.

The latest society-film romance to culminate in wedding bells is that of Lyle Talbot, popular movie star, and Marguerite Cramer, New York socialite. The pair met shortly before Christmas and didn't seem to waste much time in making up their minds. A quiet wedding took place in the Davis home, during Easter season, before a fireplace banked with lilies. These society belles are making heavy inroads on Hollywood's desirable males and are giving the local girls plenty to worry about.

Janet Gaynor says:

"Leading artists of the screen prefer Luckies

"I live at the beach most of the year and there is hardly a weekend that a number of friends don't drop in. Naturally, I keep several brands of cigarettes on hand, but the Luckies are always the first to disappear. I suppose it's just natural that Luckies would be the favorite brand because picture work certainly places a severe tax on the throat. Leading artists of the screen prefer Luckies because they are a light smoke that sympathizes with tender throats."

LUCKY STRIKE

An independent survey was made recently among professional men and women—lawyers, doctors, scientists, etc. Of those who said they smoke cigarettes, over 87% stated they personally prefer a light smoke.

Miss Gaynor verifies the wisdom of this preference, and so do other leading artists of the radio, stage, screen and opera. Their voices are their fortunes. That's why so many of them smoke Luckies. You, too, can have the throat protection of Luckies—a light smoke, free of certain harsh irritants removed by the exclusive process "It's Toasted". Luckies are gentle on the throat.

IRRESISTIBLE LIP LURE—THE NEW GLOWING VIBRANT LIPSTICK

Pretty lips cost her a pretty penny but never a second for her tender gums

—ANOTHER "DENTAL CRIPPLE" IN THE MAKING

How often such neglect leads to real dental tragedies . . . give your gums the benefit of Ipana and Massage.

LET her study herself in the mirror—while she outlines that classic mouth, powders that pretty nose. Let her favorite creams and cosmetics add to her charm. Then let her smile—smile that dull, dingy, shadowed smile of hers—and see how quickly her beauty vanishes.

A minor tragedy? Yet this girl might possess a radiant, appealing smile—but not until she lavishes a fraction of the care she gives her lips on her dingy teeth, her tender, ailing gums—not until she knows the meaning of that tinge of "pink" upon her tooth brush.

Don't Overlook "Pink Tooth Brush"

When that warning tinge appears on your tooth brush—go at once to your dentist. Probably no serious trouble is in store for you. No doubt, he'll lay the blame at the door of modern menus. Too-soft foods—foods that deprive your gums of necessary work and stimulation—have made the gum walls lazy, flabby. Usually he will suggest harder, "chewier" foods—and often the stimulating help of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage.

For nearly always, Ipana and massage is a wise precaution against the warning of "pink tooth brush." Begin today to help the health of your teeth and gums. Massage a little Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. Watch those lazy tissues grow gradually firmer, sounder, healthier.

Start today the faithful use of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage. Let your smile do justice to your charm.

When Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond are "at home" to their pals, here's how they'll treat 'em

By Marjorie Deen

There'll be nothing hit or miss about the buffet suppers served by the future Mrs. Gene Raymond. She will serve her informal meals from a comfortable table with plenty of candlelight, if you please!

A SIT-DOWN SUPPER

WHEN THE hit tune of the week is Mendelssohn's Wedding March; when the churches are bedecked with flowers, ferns and white satin ribbons; when the society magazines and newspaper columns are filled with photographs of young lovelies in trailing gowns and diaphanous lace and tulle veils, then we know it's summertime, the bride's season.

This year's most famous summer bride, of course, is Jeanette MacDonald. And certainly she will also be the loveliest we shall see for months to come! As I write this, her marriage to Gene Raymond, on the seventeenth of June, is only a little way off, and it is, of course, Hollywood's favorite topic of conversation. For everyone out here loves a wedding, particularly when the bride is beautiful, the groom handsome, and both are as unmistakably in love as are Jeanette and Gene.

I don't feel that I'm exaggerating one little bit when I declare that it's in the nature of a real scoop to be able to offer you, at this particular time, recipes and suggestions for informal entertaining given by the bride-to-be.

Yes, the future Mrs. Raymond was delighted to give Modern Screen readers directions for making some of her favorite dishes and also described at some length her idea of a perfectly grand way to give a supper party—one, that is, that will not be too taxing on the hostess yet a huge success in the eyes of the guests.

As usual I'm going to give you some of the recipes here and the others in the little leaflet that the coupon brings you free of charge. Of course, I shall also discuss these leaflet recipes with you later on so that you will know what you'll be getting if you go to the trouble of writing in for your copy. A small enough task, isn't it, when you consider that by writing in you can learn how to prepare the special dishes that have appeared most frequently when Jeanette entertained in her Hancock Park colonial house and that will continue to be featured when the Raymonds move into their new San Fernando home.

But I do want to reserve a major part of the space for the really worthwhile suggestions given by Miss MacDonald for Sit-Down Suppers.

"What!" you might well exclaim, "has the sit-down craze spread into the home?"

To which Jeanette would cheerfully reply, "If it hasn't already, then in my opinion it's high time it did!"

For fear that you might think of her as some militant feminist, which she most certainly is not, I asked her to explain in detail for my readers the stand she takes on Sit-Down Suppers.

"Well, you see," Jeanette assured me, green eyes sparkling with amusement, "I'm fully convinced from personal observation at recent Buffet Suppers we've attended, that few women and practically no men really enjoy giving an imitation of a circus juggler. You've seen them, too, I suppose, trying to find a corner to settle down in while balancing a well-filled plate, an overflowing glass and silverware!

SMALL TOWN BOY

This domestic scene will probably wind up in a cozy spot in the good old family album. Here are Stu and June Erwin with little Billy and Judy.

By Robert H. McIlwaine

SUCCESS WITHOUT glamor may seem like next to nothing to you, but to the thousands of Stuart Erwin fans it means a heck of a lot. True, if prizes were being given out to those who fill the bill for that certain glamorous something, Stuart probably wouldn't be in the running—that is, unless they were giving out a consolation prize!

For, according to the rules of male pulchritude, Stuart just doesn't get into the race. But when it comes to doing a bang-up job of personality plus entertainment, he steps right up to the head of the class. Not that he cares to be in on the class, because he already has what he wants from life—a home, his family and a darn good job.

"This acting is a business to me," Stu began, "and that's the way I handle it. It's no different than if I worked in a bank. Then I'd probably work from nine to five and catch the five-twenty home. As it is, I work all day and drive home instead. Just a home body, that's me—a small town boy."

After one look around, we thoroughly understand why Stu hurries home each night. There's a Mrs. Erwin, who is even more attractive than when she was June Collyer, once Hollywood's most promising ingenue. Though this would seem almost enough, there are two other darn good reasons for Stu to stick to the fireside—Stuart Jr., and little Judy.

June Collyer gave up the screen and her career to devote herself to making a marital success. This she has done in no uncertain way and is naturally as pleased as punch about it all.

"You see, after Stu and I were married," Mrs. Erwin explained, "I decided there needn't be more than one career in the family, at least one professional career. So I quit pictures and have made Stu's career mine. It's so much safer and ever so much more fun this way."

Looking in on the Erwins, we could easily understand why it was fun for them both, and why in topsy-turvy Hollywood, where most marriages seem destined to go on the rocks, their life together is slated to survive. You see, the Erwins are an institution, and they are the only stockholders. They don't give advice and, what's more important, they don't take it.

As to Erwin's histrionics, we can safely predict a long and prosperous future for him. Gifted with a sympathy-inducing physiognomy (face, to us) and a self-deprecative style of acting, he is the typical small-town character in search of an author. There is a real homespun quality about Stu and, in a modest but highly efficient manner, he carries on much in the Will Rogers manner, which is traditonal for portraying "just folks" on the screen.

Though youthful, Stuart Erwin seems the logical successor to the late Will Rogers and can fill his shoes as well as anyone could ever hope to do.

One thing above all else is true of Stuart Erwin. No matter what he does, he always does it well. Indeed, Stu does what he does better than anyone else. This is applicable to any and all exigencies confronting our hero, from movie acting to mixing a mean Martini! To be sure, his prowess at this last mentioned talent was aided and abetted by a little professional instruction and Mr. Erwin wasn't one bit reluctant to give credit where credit was due!

There have been a couple of (Continued on page 14)

Stuart Erwin "makes good" in the movies—and at home, too

"WATCH YOUR STEP" He said—

—SHE'S A WILDCAT!

WHAT a penalty people pay for being mean and nasty-tempered! They forfeit friends and romance! They're their own worst enemies!

Still, they're not always to blame. You know, yourself, that you can't escape being nervous, irritable, crabby, if your system is clogged with poisonous wastes. So if you really want to be light-hearted . . . popular, fresh-looking . . . be sure that your bowels move regularly. And whenever Nature needs help—take Ex-Lax.

Ex-Lax works by the "GENTLE NUDGE" system

The "gentle nudge" system is a simple, easy, effective method of giving you a thorough cleaning-out. Ex-Lax just gives your intestines a gentle nudge at the point where constipation exists. Evacuation is easy, comfortable—and complete. You'll feel clean. You'll feel more alive. And you'll be grateful for the absence of the strain and nausea that make the action of a harsh purgative so unpleasant.

Another thing—Ex-Lax tastes just like delicious chocolate. Children actually enjoy taking it, and Ex-Lax is just as good for them as it is for you. Available at all drug stores in 10c and 25c sizes.

instances, however, when Mr. Erwin has not been able to come through with such flying colors. Notably among them was the business of that theatrical producer, years back, not letting him act in his plays.

"You know, that guy would let me stage manage all his shows, handle the money and the business, ferry the company up and down between Los Angeles and San Francisco, but he wouldn't let me play in them," Stu explained. "Nope, he said he didn't like my type of work and I should be kept behind the scenery and not in front where the cash customers could get a load of me. He stuck to his guns, too, and he never did let me play a single role the whole time I was with him!

"The funny part of it came when June and I ran into him some years later. It was at the preview of one of my pictures. He came over to us afterwards and said, 'Stu, I didn't think you had it in you. I want to apologize and take my hat off to you. You certainly did a fine job and I'm proud of you. If you ever want a job, let me know.'

"Well, we had a good laugh and we're great pals to this day. The real joke of it is that sometime I might take him up on it."

Having been under contract to one of the big studios for years, we were naturally interested to learn the reason for Stu's departure, for Erwin has certainly done nobly by all the roles he has been given to portray.

WELL, it may be like the other case of the producer who was my pal but just wouldn't let me act in his plays," Stu explained. "There's a producer at the studio who doesn't seem to like my work. He's a good friend, but every time I thought I was set in a role, I found I wasn't. So I went to the studio and we agreed quite amicably to disagree about signing another contract with them."

Stuart Erwin wasn't stepping around long, for he was lately nailed to a nice contract at Grand National. Now he is on the same lot as his old friend, Jim Cagney, and is looking forward to some of the better breaks he is entitled to. Under his old contract, Stu was not allowed to make personal appearances nor do radio broadcasts, but under the new banner he has the privilege of doing both.

Suddenly there were some lusty shouts from another quarter of the Erwin apartment and, just as suddenly, the reasons for all the shoutin' appeared. Bill and Judy—the Erwin young hopefuls!

Bill was enthralled with New York, having just completed a tour of most of the park and all of the zoo.

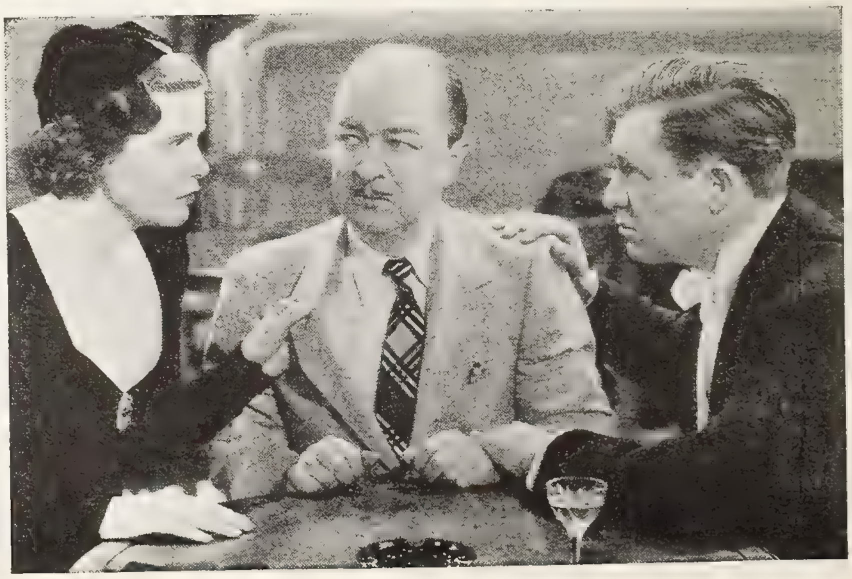
In fact, he was so pleased with our city that at a word from us he was all for staying right here. When reminded that his mother and father were going back he said, "Oh, that's all right. I'll write to 'em on picture postals. And we can play policeman all the time. You know, I'm going to be police-on-a-horse when I grow up."

WE WERE all very properly impressed when we learned that Bill's hero was the cop on the corner who was mounted on a sleek horse which immediately took Stuart Jr., for a loss and captivated his fancy. It seems as though it was his first meeting with law on horseback, and now his mind is made up as to what the future holds for him in the way of a career.

However, Mr. and Mrs. Erwin informed us that they were going to let the children pick their own vocations and if they followed in the footsteps of their father there would be no parental objections.

If there is one person Mrs. Erwin is proud of, it is her hubby and now that he is playing his first star role in "Small Town Boy," she is more pleased than ever.

And for us movie-goers, it means that our pet comedian, the homespun hero, can visit us again in bigger and better roles and who knows—maybe glamor will set in, too!



Slow talkin' Stuart Erwin, right, with Jean Muir and Chester Clute in "Dance, Charlie, Dance."

ALL ABOARD FOR HOLLYWOOD!

By Jack Smalley

Last call for Modern Screen vacationers to see the stars

WILL YOU be sharing in the last-minute bustle and scurry, the frantic waving to friends down to wish you bon voyage? Will your heart beat faster to the conductor's "All aboard"?

The whush of steam, the barely perceptible start, the quick scanning of faces about you and the hasty glance at the printed list of passengers to see who the pretty girl in the next seat is—that's just the start of Modern Screen's tours to movieland.

Will you be part of this exciting picture?

THE BIG special trains are ready; reservations for hotels at the various stops en route have been made, the final touch given to the elaborate plans for your reception in the film capital, and soon we'll shove off across thousands of miles of entrancing country to see the stars, visit studios, enjoy parties at the homes of the celebrities, and be living that vacation to top all vacations, a visit to glamorous movieland.

This is your last call to join in the fun. Only a few reservations are open for the three big tours which will leave Chicago July 11, August 1, and August 15. And for the astonishingly low costs of the trip, you simply can't afford to miss the train.

Previous issues of Modern Screen have fully described the plans made for your enjoyment. We've told how we'll go by special train to Seattle, down the coast to Los Angeles and back through Salt Lake City, all in two weeks, with a shorter trip of eleven days for those who are in a hurry.

AND THEN those carefree, exciting days in Hollywood! Leo Carrillo's Spanish fiesta, Glenda Farrell's Gold Diggers Party, the garden fete at Dick Arlen's; lunching and seeing pictures in the making at the new Universal Studios; dropping in at NBC Studios for a view of radioland, meeting the stars of your favorite air program. All this is just a birds-eye view of the round of activities in the cinema city.

Every detail of these house parties of ours is covered in the beautifully illustrated booklet which is yours for the asking. In it you'll find photos of the hosts and hostesses, scenes at the studios, pictures of the parks where stop-overs will be made, and the complete itinerary as well as full schedule of costs. Send for your booklet today.

Here's one real-life movie in which you can play a part. All you need do is make up your mind that this year you owe it to yourself to enjoy the finest vacation that anyone could devise, and cast yourself for a leading role in the picture.

THE first trip out finds Leo Carrillo as host. And there is a man after your own heart. Leo has a gorgeous ranch near the ocean at Santa Monica, and we'll all drive down there for an old-fashioned Spanish barbecue and fiesta, with Leo to welcome us and with many of his pals in the movie colony to help make this a grand occasion.

Right now Leo Carrillo is making "Hotel Haywire" at Paramount, but he's not going to let that interfere with your having the time of your life at his party. As a matter of fact, the novel angle of your party has temperamental Leo steamed up full pressure. And that means plenty of fun ahead for all of you.

Glenda Farrell postcards from England, where she's seeing the Coronation and making a movie, that she'll be home in ample time to greet the tour leaving August 1, and Dick Arlen is counting the days till his Melting Pot Party, in honor of the shorter trip which leaves Chicago August 15. You can imagine that Glenda, ordinarily such an intriguing person, will be an out-and-out social lion with all the tall stories she'll be telling you about coronation goings-on.

No matter where you live you can easily join the house parties, either at Chicago or en route to Hollywood. Because we're traveling in groups by special trains, a trip that would be very expensive for a private enterprise becomes astonishingly inexpensive; as low as $169.00 for the two-weeks' tour, or $139.50 for the shorter trip.

If you wish to be sure of a reservation, enclose $10.00 as deposit for each person in your party. If you are unable to make the trip, your deposit will be returned.

So it's all aboard for Hollywood. This is the last call. Are you with us?

Dear Madam:

Tell me — honestly, now — what is your real opinion about all the many face powders you have tried? Have you ever truly found that one heaven-sent face powder which brings to life all the vivid, glowing, natural skin charm and loveliness that you have every right to expect?

You aren't to blame, really, if your search has failed. We have all had the same trying experience. Testing—choosing—never quite sure we were the lovely person we longed to be.

You—are the very problem modern cosmeticians studied year after year before LOVELY LADY was created. Millions of women go on switching face powders, grinding hard-base, sharp-flake powders into the skin, finally spoiling their natural skin beauty.

Now,—BALMITE the exquisite new soft-blend base—chosen for my LOVELY LADY Face Powder ends harsh over-powdered look caused by hard-base, sharp-flake powders. . . . Because of BALMITE all five exquisite new shades of LOVELY LADY blend out to cover your every seasonal variation of complexion color. Smooths away horrid lines that have made you look years older, brings out the flattering loveliness of your natural skin tone beauty.

Don't punish your complexion any longer! Sit down before your mirror—try all five new shades of my Face Powder. You'll see then, and only then, if you have been using the wrong face powder. You'll see instantly which one shade of LOVELY LADY makes you look youngest, loveliest. ★★★★ A Star Is Born

Here is the most true-to-life story of Hollywood ever to reach the screen—a drama which combines all the humor and all the heartbreak of this fabulous village. In telling the tale of a small-town girl who makes good in pictures, "A Star Is Born" is comedy and tragedy rolled into one, and certainly one of the season's finest films.

Janet Gaynor is the young lady in quest of fame, and although she is befriended by a good-natured assistant director (Andy Devine), fortune never crosses her path until she meets a bibulous screen idol (Fredric March), who promptly makes her his leading lady. They fall in love and marry, and she skyrockets to fame while he slips slowly into oblivion. It's a story which has been lived over and over again in Hollywood, and there must have been more than one actor squirming in his seat at the preview.

Technicolor, which improves with each new film, is employed most effectively. Incidentally, it definitely enhances the beauty of Janet Gaynor, whose performance in the picture is a revelation. Fredric March is splendid as the alcoholic star; Adolphe Menjou is, as usual, faultless in the role of the producer; May Robson does a fine portrayal of Miss Gaynor's grandmother, and there is a swell performance of a cynical press-agent by Lionel Stander. Directed by William Wellman. —Selznick-International.

★★★ Night Must Fall

In England two years ago Robert Montgomery saw a play in which the central character was a psychopathic case, a combination of good-natured buffoon and cold-blooded killer. Bob, tired of portraying insipid playboys, persuaded M-G-M to purchase "Night Must Fall" for him. The result is a picture which will chill you with its brutality as easily as it amuses you with its cockney English humor. To steal a line of dialogue from one of the characters, "there's only one word for it—'grisly.'"

Shortly after the murder of a woman hotel guest, Montgomery, page boy at the place, is hired as a servant in the home of a crotchety old woman (Dame May Whitty) and her thrill-seeking niece (Rosalind Russell). Miss Russell realizes that Montgomery is the murderer, yet she is strangely drawn to him. Out of this situation emerges what will probably be recorded as the year's strangest drama.

It is a triumph for Montgomery, proving he is a skilled and sensitive performer. Rosalind Russell turns in a very believable portrayal of the inhibited young woman, and Dame May Whitty is superb. Alan Marshal does nicely as Miss Russell's intended groom. Directed by Richard Thorpe.—M-G-M.

★★★★ Shall We Dance?

Possessing all the chromium-plated virtues of its predecessors, this new Astaire-Rogers musical romp is a delightful affair which gives its two stars ample opportunity to display their well-known and highly specialized talents. The new dances continue to have that breath-taking quality about them which sets the Astaire-Rogers combination in a class by itself. The musical score by the Gershwins is excellent. Best numbers are "Shall We Dance?", "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off" and "They Can't Take That Away from Me." Astaire is magnificent in a solo dance number done in the engine room of an ocean liner, to the accompaniment of the ship's machinery. Perhaps the most ingratiating of the dance numbers is a novelty on roller skates in which the two stars wind up on their respective faces.

"Shall We Dance?" is tops in the comedy department, with Astaire especially effective in the role of a phoney Russian ballet dancer. Miss Rogers, playing a musical comedy star, manages to look fancier than ever. Jerome Cowan supplies sophisticated comedy as Ginger's manager, and Edward Everett Horton is his customary self as Astaire's business department. Best comedy in the picture is furnished by Eric Blore as a hotel keeper. Harriet Hoctor scores beautifully in a ballet number, and Ketti Gallian is sinister as the villainess. Directed by Mark Sandrich.—RKO.

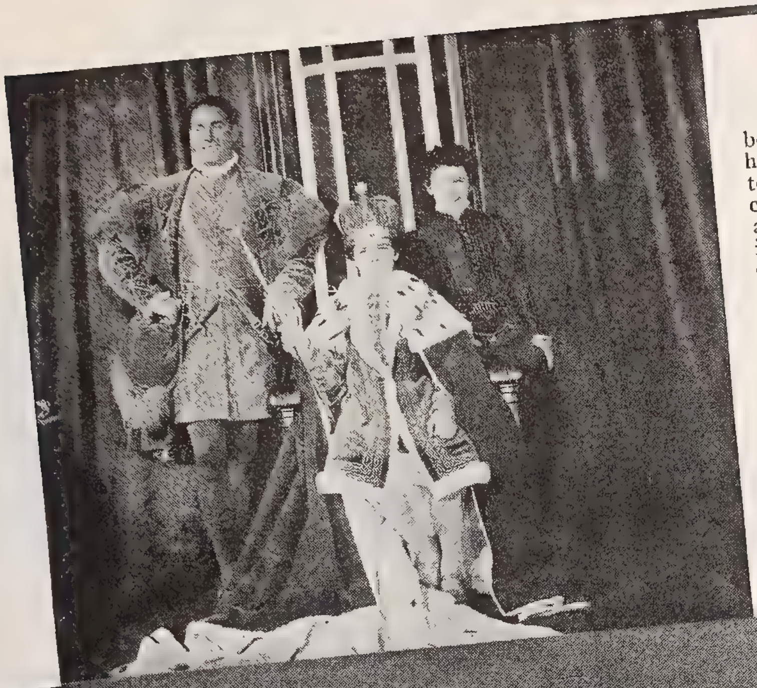
OF TODAY'S TALKIES



★★★ The Prince and the Pauper

When Mark Twain wrote his delightful fantasy of the pauper boy who suddenly found himself a prince, he probably had never heard of the Warner Brothers. However, if he were up and about today, he'd be grateful to them for translating his work into a completely enjoyable screen satire. He would also, no doubt, hand a palm to another set of brothers, the Mauch twins, who are so identical that even Henry VIII, father of one of them in the film, couldn't tell them apart.

Story tells of a son of the poor who inadvertently gets into the palace of Henry VIII. He meets young Prince Edward, and the two of them, in a spirit of fun, change clothes. When the prince wanders out into the courtyard, he is ejected by the guards and so, when Henry dies, the pauper finds himself about to be crowned king.

Montagu Love is a competent Henry, and Claude Rains is excellent as a scheming lord protector. Errol Flynn is properly swashbuckling as a soldier of fortune who aids in the cause of the young prince, and Henry Stephenson is fine as the Duke of Norfolk, and Barton MacLane does a good job as the thieving father of the young pauper. Directed by William Keighley.—Warner Bros.

★★★ Wake Up and Live

When 1937's musicals reach their judgment day, critics and audiences alike will probably agree that "Wake Up and Live" is the brightest and most enjoyable of the lot. If you're a reader of the public prints you no doubt know by now that it features Walter Winchell and Ben Bernie. Producer Darryl Zanuck's sagacity in capitalizing on their much-publicized "feud" is matched by his shrewdness in casting the pair in the roles they play every day.

Ben Bernie makes an admirable orchestra leader, and Winchell plays a newspaperman who looks and acts like newspapermen actually look and act. He doesn't wear his hat when he's working, he doesn't show up at the office drunk, nor does he win the most beautiful girl in the world in the last reel. Despite the novelty offered by the presence of Winchell and Bernie, the real stars of the picture are Jack Haley and Alice Faye. It is a pleasure to report that Haley's is one of the most hilarious performances we've seen on the screen. Alice Faye is both swell and elegant as the heroine of the piece. Ned Sparks and Patsy Kelly do a grand job with their comedy romance. Walter Catlett is excellent as a phoney agent, and Joan Davis is surprisingly funny in an adagio number. The best tunes are "Wake Up and Live" and "Never in a Million Years." Directed by Sidney Lanfield.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Woman Chases Man

Never let it be said that Samuel Goldwyn isn't thorough. When he makes a social document he generally makes it the most penetrating social document of the year, and when he decides on slapstick he goes the whole route and leaves no pie unthrown. Which is to say that "Woman Chases Man" is no social document. It has no message, and you'll probably forget what it was about a week after you've seen it. But while you're looking at it, you'll have a swell time.

Just to give you an idea, the story concerns a ne'er-do-well father (Charles Winninger) who is trying to blast a loan of $100,000 from his conservative son (Joel McCrea). Miriam Hopkins gets into the picture on the old gent's side, and together they give poor Joel the works.

Miss Hopkins is swell in a grand-comedy role, and Charles Winninger is an able foil for her antics as the conniving father. Joel McCrea turns in a fine portrayal of their unfortunate victim, and there are good performances by Leona Maricle, as the "other woman" in the case, and Erik Rhodes, as Miss Maricle's lover. Broderick Crawford shows a grand-comedy flair as a phoney butler, and Ella Logan, as a maid, makes her small role outstanding. Directed by John Blystone.—Samuel Goldwyn.

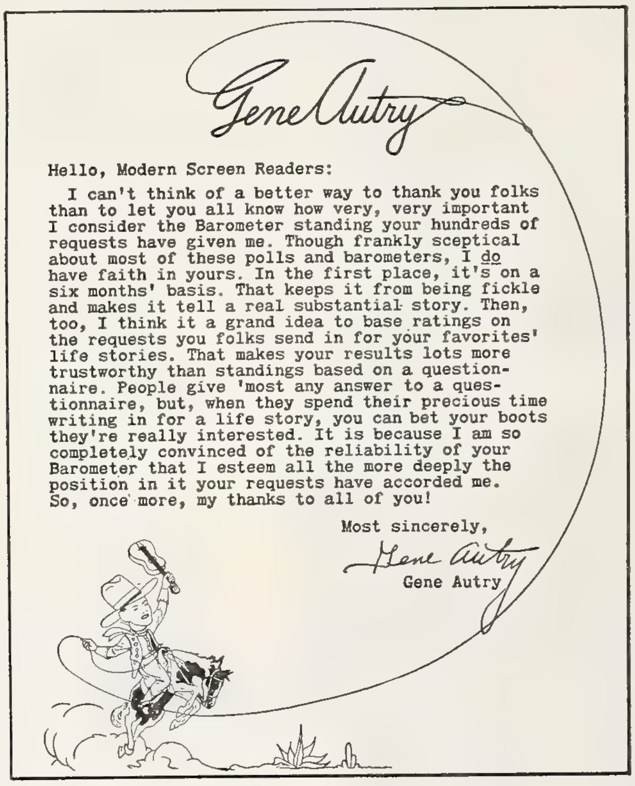
"BAROMETER BEST POPULARITY CHECK"—Gene Autry



Gene Autry

Hello, Modern Screen Readers:

I can't think of a better way to thank you folks than to let you all know how very, very important I consider the Barometer standing your hundreds of requests have given me. Though frankly sceptical about most of these polls and barometers, I do have faith in yours. In the first place, it's on a six months' basis. That keeps it from being fickle and makes it tell a real substantial story. Then, too, I think it a grand idea to base ratings on the requests you folks send in for your favorites' life stories. That makes your results lots more trustworthy than standings based on a questionnaire. People give 'most any answer to a questionnaire, but, when they spend their precious time writing in for a life story, you can bet your boots they're really interested. It is because I am so completely convinced of the reliability of your Barometer that I esteem all the more deeply the position in it your requests have accorded me. So, once more, my thanks to all of you!

Most sincerely,
Gene Autry
Gene Autry

If you'd like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, and, incidentally, help boost his or her standing in our Barometer, fill in and send us the coupon on Page 21, or, if that seems too much trouble, just write. Your request will be recorded whether you bother with the coupon or not. Try to save yourself 2c by using postcards whenever possible. We answer general questions, too, either here or by mail. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, New York.

GENE AUTRY (Last printed March, 1937. Total number of requests since then 1050.) Unglamorous is the word for Gene Autry. In fact, so unglamorous that in the history of Hollywood he has had but one serious rival. That was Will Rogers. And Will was the only other chap so utterly likeable. Pretty hard, though to pin down just what it is that makes you an Autry fan. You couldn't mistake Gene's face for Bob Taylor's or his voice for Lawrence Tibbett's. He has, however, one salient virtue which he shares with no one else on the screen. When he sings, he does his level best to put his song over and not himself. There is no eyebrow "magic"; he doesn't try to "make" the women in the audience. He sings as a cowboy should—to no audience other than the plains, the stars, and the cattle.

Born in Tioga, Texas, Sept. 29, 1907, Gene was trained to two careers almost before graduating from rompers. His grandfather was pastor of a Baptist church, his father a rancher. In the church Gene sang hymns, on the ranch he rode. But when the boy had turned sixteen, it was neither to singing nor riding that he strayed. In typical idealistic Autry fashion, he longed to try his hand at something novel, something that would speak to his imagination. He took up Morse code and for four years clicked out messages from one of Oklahoma's most deserted way-stations. It was in the lone railroad shanty, with its ancient, spattered coal stove, that Gene's voice was discovered. His talent scouts were the simple cowhands who gathered 'round the stove in the dead of winter to listen to the homely strains of Gene's own compositions.

It took these cowmen four years to convince Gene that he might be talented. He left for New York. To Nat Shilkret he sang one of Nat's own compositions, "Jenine, I Dream Too Much." Nat, flattered and amused by the youngster's politic selection, took him under his wing. He advised him to spend another year in Oklahoma, getting experience on local broadcasts and in local roadshows. It was a sound bit of advice. When Gene came back East, he was asked to make records for almost every existing record company, and soon after, he joined the National Barn Dance program over a nation-wide hook-up.

When, in 1931, the Barn Dance went on the road, the gang stopped a night in a sleepy little Missouri college town. Gene met a pretty girl. A year later the Barn Dance followed the same itinerary. The girl, still in college, cut a few classes, became Mrs. Ina Mae Autry.

Meanwhile, Tex Ritter and Dick Foran were setting the style for singin' cowboys. To Republic officials, Gene Autry seemed the likely man to contend for the box-office laurels Tex and Dick had been dividing between them. Gene was hired, mounted on that noble horse, Champion (who, by the way, had been bred by the same trainer who had raised all Ken Maynard's horses). In the three years that have elapsed since the signing of his contract, Gene and Champion have left all the other cowboys trailing behind in their dust. "Git Along Little Dogies" is their newest screen venture.

BARBARA RUSSELL, Duluth, Minnesota: You can't see why it is that the girls in your sorority are all agreed that the Information Desk Barometer is a much better gauge of popularity than the poll your college paper runs? If you will give Gene Autry's letter to our readers a careful once-over, I think you'll find yourself on the same side of the fence as your sorority sisters. Coming from Gene, the arguments presented in the letter are doubly effective. Gene's been in pictures long enough to have a pretty good idea of what's what in this matter of popularity. When he singles out the Barometer for extra-special praise, I think all your friends who have helped build it up with their requests can consider themselves flattered.

GARY COOPER (Last printed June, 1936. Total number of requests since then 388.) People have stopped trying to talk sense to Gary Cooper. Back in the days of Clara Bow, when he was a movie extra, they told Gary there was no future in the extra racket. You might as well beat your head against a brick wall as to try and emerge from the ranks. But Gary didn't want advice. He preferred to run his head against a brick wall —and become a star.

Gary's mother is the first to admit that her son is a bit of a ne'er-do-well. She often wonders whether he has ever recovered from the quart of beer that Turkish laborers on his dad's Montana ranch tempted him with when he was a little tot of eight. Possibly to protect their adventurous child from friendly Turks, or possibly because Mrs. C. had relatives in England, the Coopers migrated to that country in 1914, when Gary was twelve, and remained there for three years. When Gary came back to Helena, Montana, his old pals were amused by his knee pants and Eton collar, charmed by his accent. They took him out behind the barn and thrashed him soundly—because you can't talk sense to that Cooper guy.

It was around this time that the U. S. A. declared war, and when Gary's brother enlisted, young Cooper was left with the job of delivering a thousand head of cattle to the Minneapolis stock yards. Acting as tour conductor for a thousand yawping steers proved less of a problem to Gary than getting through college. After a pessimistic three years' trial, and Gary confesses that what he was really trying for was not so much a degree as the consent of one of the co-eds to marry him, he gave it all up with a bang and took to drink. When he had quite drowned his sorrows and had tired of his cartoonist job on the Helena paper, he left for Hollywood.

After prancing through several extra roles on horseback—now a Texas bad man,

To Simone's Defense

In these times of hard-boiled sophistication and cynical disregard for human personality, I suppose it is too much to expect people to display anything but crude ridicule or some eyebrow-lifting toward anyone of foreign origin whose ways are not parallel with ours, who cannot seem to fit into any of the pigeonholes of character which we have so neatly set up in our American "culture." No, such a person is temperamental, unjustifiable and just doesn't belong with us!

You see, I have recently seen "Seventh Heaven," and I felt that both the leading roles were well done. I didn't know anything about the personality of Simone Simon, except that she's French. Then, I happened to read the screen reviews—casual remarks about the "play-acting of the unpredictable Simon," "the baby-carriage French accent," and in MODERN SCREEN a comment about the "redundant French gal" doing a good turn for her stand-in (evidently a very surprising thing to some people) and letters bemoaning the existence of "Sea-moan" in screenland. And many more quips directed at the French girl, all giving the impression that here indeed was an impossible creature.

Now, may I ask all of these people just what kind of persons would they be if they were to be set down in some foreign country to carry on as best they could in competition with the best natives of their own profession? I pay tribute to little Simone for her pluck in keeping at it in spite of the bumps. Temperamental? Exasperating? Perhaps. But they are the only weapons she has found effective against a hostile environment—Herbert G. Kelly, Chicago, Ill.

Adorable Shirley

May I come in? I'd like to tell the world through your column how much I love and adore my favorite movie star, Shirley Temple. I guess it's really something more than just admiring her on the screen, 'cause I have a choking feeling around my heart when I see her. I love her like one little girl can love and adore another. You see I'm not really like other little girls my age, 'cause I have never walked or talked and I'm most ten years old. But when the lights go out in the theatre and Shirley dances and sings her way across the silver screen, I forget that I can't walk or talk. I dread to think of the day when Mother will no longer be able to carry me into the theatre to see my beloved Shirley.—Josephine O'Brien, Flint, Mich.

My Favorites

The finest stars upon the screen,
The ones that I like best, I mean—
The grandest pair that I've seen yet,
Are Nelson Eddy and Jeanette.

He's so handsome, tall and fair;
She's lovely, with her red-gold hair.
Their voices are so clear and sweet,
To hear them is a thrilling treat.

"Naughty Marietta" was so nice
That I just had to see it twice.
Sweet Mystery of Life, sung by Jeanette
And Nelson, too, was a grand duet.

The next I saw was "Rose Marie,"
The loveliest picture one could see.
The Indian Love Call I would fain
Hear sung by those song-birds again.

The picture that I now await,
Among the highest it will rate.
Is "Maytime!" And it's clear to see
How wonderful 'twill surely be.

The fourth success, if I'm not wrong,
They're blending next with beauteous song,
Jeanette and Nelson at their best,
In Metro's "Girl of the Golden West."—
Margaret Faller, Verona, N. J.

In Rebellious Mood

I am a movie fan; there is no getting around that statement. I can sit open-mouthed through "Romeo and Juliet" and heartily enjoy Mickey Mouse. I even saw "The Great O'Malley." That proves how good I am. But I have a kick coming.

I can put it down to something or other when Simone Simon's hair has that glorious sheen in "Seventh Heaven." It bespeaks the best of care, although she is next door to a beggar maid. That sort of thing I can understand, but why do all Indians have to say "Um" and "Heap big?" Why do the majority of European noblemen have to be fortune hunters and cads? I have never met a titled person and never expect to, but my intelligence rebels at the same old story.

May I commend the powers-that-be for the wonderful pictures we have been having lately—"The Good Earth," "Camille," "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney?"—Billie Stuart, Newark, N. J.

Smileless Dietrich

Well, I went to see "The Garden of Allah" and the color is perfectly beautiful. It doesn't come up and poke its fingers in your eyes, as earlier color films did.

But—Marlene Dietrich! Her sequences seemed to be a series of rapidly changing still photographs. She shows as much animation as a turtle. I understand that off-screen Miss Dietrich seldom smiles or laughs because of the lines it causes about the mouth and eyes. But does she have to carry this pose before the cameras, too? She is very lovely and is an excellent color subject, but gazing at a mask does get rather tiring. If she would let herself go and really emote instead of posing for camera portraits, it might put life into her voice, too. Just close your eyes and listen to her for a let-down. Or is she too subtle for me?—Julia Kurta, Royal Oak, Mich.

TRIP TO . . .

To enter this contest, fill in the chart with full names of your movie favorites, the first or last name beginning with the letters appearing on each line of the chart. The names selected can have fewer letters than squares, but cannot have more. Do not use the same name twice. Then, fill in the coupon beneath the chart, suggesting a name for this "Luxury Liner," which will carry our winners to Hollywood. For example, "Hollywood Cruiser," "Luxury Express."

RULES

1. Contestant must fill in the chart on Page 24, with the full names of the moving picture stars or featured players whose first or last names begin with the letters in the words, NATIONAL TRAILWAYS. For example, the letter "N" may represent either Norma Shearer or Nolan, Doris. The names you select can have less letters than squares provided for in the chart; they should not have more. Leave one space between first and last names or last and first names. Don't use the same name twice.
2. In the space at the bottom of the chart, suggest a name for the special bus which will carry the winners to Hollywood.
3. The 20 trips will be awarded to the persons who submit the most complete chart and who, in the judges' opinion, give the best name for the bus.
4. If more than one entry is submitted, each must be presented on a separate chart.
5. Neatness and accuracy will count; elaborate entries will not receive preference in awarding the prizes.
6. The decision of the judges shall be final, and in case of ties, additional trips will be awarded.
7. Mail your entries to Modern Screen-National Trailways Contest, in care of Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. Entries must be postmarked no later than midnight of June 30, 1937.

Janet Gaynor as she appears in "A Star is Born"

"It Could Happen to YOU!"

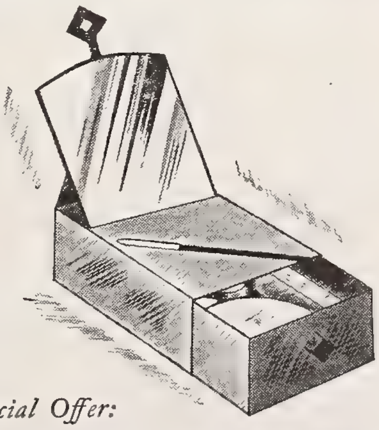
THE very heart and soul of Hollywood is spoken in those few words . . . words that have brought a thousand Cinderellas to Hollywood and made stars of them.

Elizabeth Arden has used her Screen and Stage Make-Up in David O. Selznick's revealing story of "A Star is Born" to dramatize truly the transformation of grey Esther Blodgett (Janet Gaynor) into glamorous Vicki Lester (Janet Gaynor).

Most Importantly . . . . .

So successful have the stars found the new Elizabeth Arden Technicolor make-up for the screen that they have taken it up in private life, creating a vogue for the subtle coloring offered only by Elizabeth Arden.



Special Offer:

Buyers of any $5 combination of Elizabeth Arden Screen and Stage Make-Up preparations will receive free one handsome, mirrored make-up kit as illustrated above, and similar to those used by Hollywood stars.

Every star . . . every movie fan . . . every woman who ever dreamed to possess glamour, may share in the discovery of Screen and Stage Make-Up by Elizabeth Arden . . . that they may find, thrill and believe in their own beauty, and like the people of stage and screen, live the days and nights of their private lives in rich fulfillment.

RAINER—the REBEL

Miss R. with her playwright hubby, Clifford Odets.

William Powell and Luise in "The Emperor's Candlesticks."

Luise wouldn't give a dime for glamor, but she'd spend a fortune fighting for happiness

By Ida Zeitlin

I SAT waiting in a publicity office something less than two years ago when a small dynamo in slacks and short-sleeved blouse blew in, dropped into a chair and began talking. I had never seen her before. I didn't know whether she was actress, visitor or scribbler. I did know—anyone would know the moment she entered a room—that here was an arresting personality.

The dynamic effect was produced not by sound and fury, but by a quicksilver vitality. Expression played over her vivid face like light and shadow over a stream—as changefully, as unconsciously, as agreeable to watch. Dark eyes under the windblown bob flashed and softened by turns. Her warmly tinted skin had a translucent quality. And though she was obviously a foreigner, her speech flowed vigorous and free. Never waiting to fumble for a word, she said what she had to say in a swift rush of language that was always graphic, if not always grammatical. Through sheer color and glow she took and held your attention.

"That's Luise Rainer, a European actress," I was told when she left.

"What? No mystery? No glamor? No airs and graces?"

"She's different."

I'd heard that often enough to be skeptical. Yet I'd seen for myself that her appearance and manner were different. You couldn't type her. You couldn't classify her. You couldn't say she was a second this-one or that-one or any other Hollywood star. She was like no one you'd ever seen but herself. And for any self-consciousness or effort, however subtle, to make an impression, she might have been merely the stenographer next door.

As the piquant little companion of "Escapade," I saw her capture the public's imagination as she had captured mine. For her tender, tempestuous portrayal of Anna Held, she won the Academy Award. Who would have played O-lan if Rainer hadn't appeared on the scene I have no notion. It was Mr. Thalberg who chose her. Had he lived to see the finished performance, to see the child of "Escapade" submerge her youth and charm to become the stolid, deep-souled Chinese woman, he would have been content with his choice.

As she moved from triumph to triumph, Hollywood talked about her as Hollywood does. She didn't like interviews; therefore she was doing a Garbo. She preferred long walks with her dog to lunching at the Vendome; therefore she must be a poseur. Soon after she married Clifford Odets, the playwright, she went alone to New York.

"Why?" she was asked.

"Because every time I am free, I make a trip. Mr. Odets is not free. So I go alone." But the truth was too simple; therefore, "Ha-ha! Rainer's marriage is on the rocks."

After you've lived in Hollywood for a while, you don't believe all the tales you hear. They may or may not be true. Anything for a headline. Suppose you have to

"On the one side, I am strong," asserts Luise Rainer. "And on the other side, it hurts if people think bad about me. Isn't that id-yotic?"

retract your statement tomorrow. So much the better. Today's headline will sell, and so will tomorrow's retraction. I couldn't associate what I'd heard with that unknown girl in the publicity office whose every word and gesture had been spontaneous. Yet Hollywood has been known to crush spontaneity.

So, although I went to see Miss Rainer with an open mind, I couldn't help but wonder if Hollywood really had changed her!

"Please, you must first have your lunch," she said when I came to her dressing room. "If you try to make an interview at the same time, you will not enjoy your eating. Then I will give you what time you want." She went to the phone to order food. "Here is Luise Ryner—Ry-ner—" she repeated, and shot me a rueful glance. "I always mispronounce my name. They all say Ray-ner. So when I say Ry-ner, nobody knows who is there. But so long it has been Ryner, it is hard to change."

Over coffee and cigarettes—my coffee and cigarettes, since she took neither—and with Johnny, her beloved Scottie, sleeping at her feet, we "made the interview." She sat in the corner of a couch, laughing, wistful, excited by turns. Not only her lips but her hands and body spoke, and above all, her velvet-soft eyes that changed with every changing shade of feeling. And, though her English was vastly improved, she showed that same fine disregard of dictionary speech I had noted earlier, for the sake of vigorous, unimpaired expression.

"My rebel-ation," she said, "was from the beginning to the end that I am what I am. But I cannot think of myself as a rebel because I do not fight to make others do what I wish but only to stay myself. And this is not to say I think I am God's wonder—please understand me well—but only that I cannot do what is for me not right and natural to do. It is far-est from my mind to hurt somebody else. It never came to my head till I heard someone say, 'This girl is a Frankenstein. She will spoil everything.' "

Her hands flew to her face, her eyes widened, recalling the shock of that moment. "I thought, 'Am I crazy? Are they crazy?' What can I spoil if I am true to myself? This I must be. Sometimes I may be convinced for a moment against myself. But before I know it, my own color comes through. Not that I will not do what for me is wrong. I cannot do it. Every person has inside of himself a judge," she tapped her forehead, "and for him this inside judge is the best.

"I will tell you something. What is the most important thing for a child? (Continued on page 78)

Here's the smile and profile the girls go for! Tyrone's next will be "Thin Ice," with Sonja.

NOT too many KISSES

IS TYRONE POWER in love? What does love mean to him? What have his romantic experiences been? How does he look at marriage, at women? What he's like, emotionally, has suddenly become of great concern. In his habit of half closing his eyes when he starts to smile there is—a provocative promise. This tall, dark newcomer, suddenly giving Robert Taylor a run for honors, has created a big stir in Hollywood, as he has with the public.

Girls have been drawn to him as automatically as he has been drawn to them. He is so vital. Women swear that his sense of humor—and his chuckle leaps into an infectious laughter—is the ultimate touch. He is, they vow, fervent, yet doesn't take himself "big."

I WAS over to his house the other day. In his own room, an extremely masculine haven at the garden end of the low, rambling white cottage in which he lives, there are a couple of vivid sketches splashing the walls. Several pictures of himself and Loretta Young, romantic "stills" from their latest teaming. Then atop a mahogany chest was an enlarged informal shot of himself with Sonja Henie. Queening it on his desk was a beautiful, silver-framed close-up of the blonde star. It is affectionately autographed to "Darling . . . With Love."

Everywhere he goes socially, the vivacious talented Sonja is on his arm. But does he actually want to get married so soon? If so, what was all that flurry about his stepping out with Loretta while the skating wonder was away on an exhibition tour? It is rumored that that brief interlude upset the Young-Eddie Sutherland understanding, that the report of those dates threw Sonja into a frenzy. For when news reached her that Tyrone and Loretta were happily partying at the Trocadero, she flew in from the East for a week's rest. Her studio gave her a luncheon, but it was plain that she hadn't made the continental dash simply for that. You've guessed the real magnet—Tyrone!

He is an amazing contradiction in person. Meet him briefly and he reminds you of the Buddy Rogers of years ago. Or of the Prince of Wales of yesteryear. He is completely attractive. Bring up stern reality and you'll be surprised. He not only has charm and tact; he has worked with his brain and with his hands. Although only twenty-three, he has encountered so many different kinds of people, and from them he has learned so many ways of life.

Tyrone's dominating characteristic is a remarkable sensitiveness. Now, of course, it is this innate sensitiveness

On or off the movie lot, Romance is never far away when Tyrone Power's near!

By Ben Maddox

which causes him to guess a girl's moods and easily fit in with them. He is obliging that way. He's an old-fashioned gallant, with 1937 ginger!

His most embarrassing moment with a member of the opposite sex came when he was but sixteen.

I MET a gorgeous girl at my mother's dramatic school," he confided. "We were living in Cincinnati then, Mother, my sister and myself. I ushered at the Orpheum and worked in a drug store after high school hours and I earned the money to buy my first Tux.

"I sorely needed one to escort such a vision to The Fortnightly. That was the society club and they were giving one of their dances when I fell so hard. She was blonde and had lovely long hair." Tyrone grinned at this description. He admitted then, "I can't resist hair that sweeps a girl's shoulders!

"I managed to borrow my uncle's car. It was huge—there was room enough in the back to put on a Shubert revue! Anyway, it helped me bolster up my pose as a nonchalant young man about town. When I parked in front of her apartment, I discovered the heater wasn't functioning. It was snowing like the devil and freezing cold. When we came out, the battery was too low to turn over the engine. I had to apologize and jump out in the slush and push.

"But finally I clambered in again and rolled up in front of the clubhouse as elegantly as I could. The pretentious doorman bent stiffly to open milady's door. At that moment the fellow in front of us backed up and my uncle's gleaming fenders folded right into the radiator. Tragedy! I wanly took the offender's name, checked the car, and somehow made the stairs. But when we had taken off our coats and were ready to step into the ballroom, I reached into my inner pocket—to pull out two blank pieces of cardboard. Later it developed that my cousin had borrowed my tickets to take his girl and had substituted those blanks. Have you ever had a cousin?

"Fortunately," he sighed, "we sighted some friends who knew we were supposed to attend the affair."

And once inside Tyrone had a whale of a good time. She was a divine dancer and he is very partial to girls who are smooth on a ballroom floor. He doesn't care to talk when the music's going dandy, incidentally. Girls who are continually dabbing on more make-up distress him and he dislikes the girl who invariably has to have two lights for her cigarette.

That blonde girl of the near-

SHE'D RATHER BE DEAD!

If you had beauty, fame and wealth, would you be willing to give them up? Miriam Hopkins would

By Gladys Hall

A sophisticate to her fingertips, Miriam Hopkins is no snob about the things she likes to do. She's a rabid "tourist" when it comes to traveling. She gapes and gawps and asks guides a million questions, even as you and I.

Miriam and Louis Hayward in the intriguingly-titled picture, "The Woman I Love."

These two, Anton Litvak and Miss H., are constant companions. Is it "lurve"?

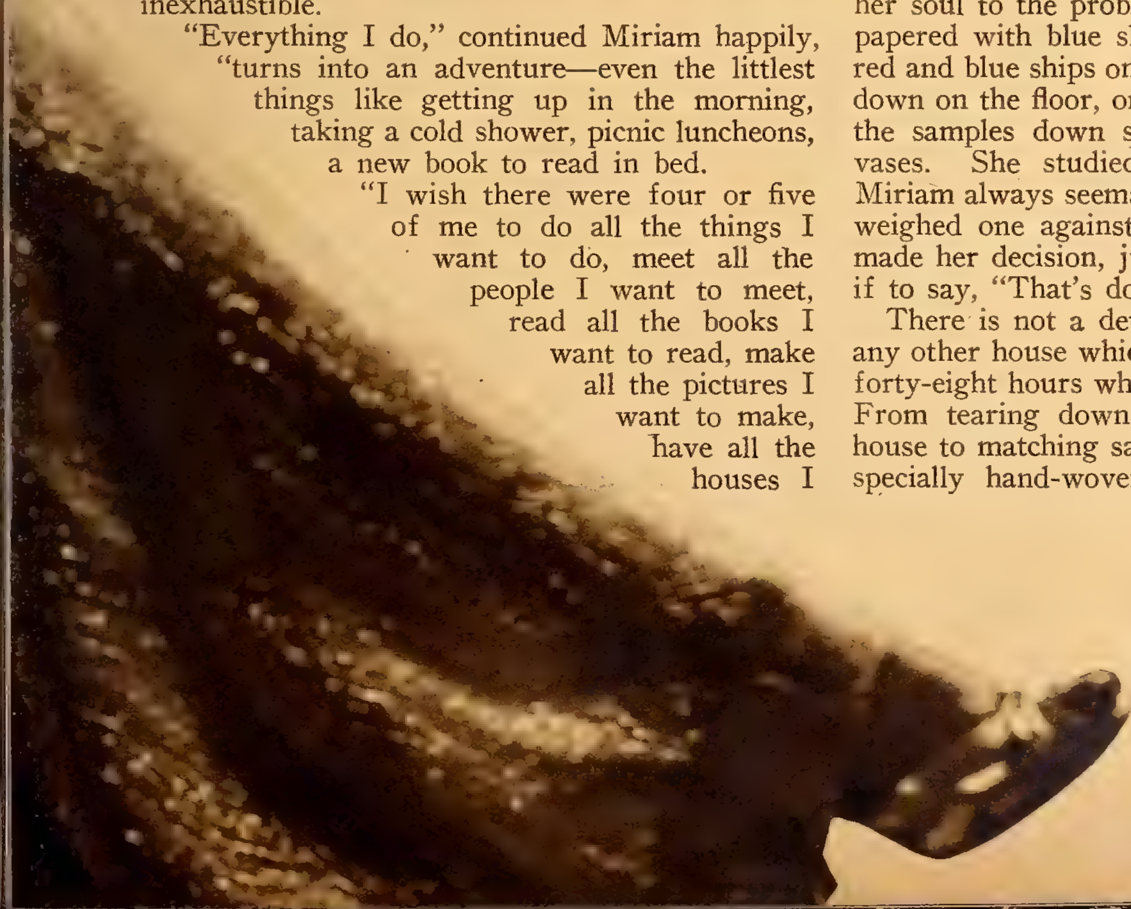
IF THE time ever comes," Miriam said, "when I fail to enjoy the things I am doing, when I fail to get pleasure and satisfaction out of every minute of every day, I'd rather be dead.

"Only I wouldn't rather be dead," laughed Miriam, making one of her quick mental reverses, laughing the low, in-the-throat, velvet chuckle which is Miriam's. "That's a ridiculous thing for me to say because such a time couldn't come for me."

Miriam lay back on the oyster-white divan in her dressing-room suite, a small, compact electrically-charged young woman, her corn-silk hair vibrant, her forget-me-not blue eyes wide, as they are when she talks, her mind like a flashlight, a revolving flashlight taking in, with searching brilliance, all aspects of the passing parade. She said, "Such a thing couldn't happen to me. I'm too curious about everything and everyone. Life is too inexhaustible.

"Everything I do," continued Miriam happily, "turns into an adventure—even the littlest things like getting up in the morning, taking a cold shower, picnic luncheons, a new book to read in bed.

"I wish there were four or five of me to do all the things I want to do, meet all the people I want to meet, read all the books I want to read, make all the pictures I want to make, have all the houses I want to have, live in all the cities and countries I want to live in, make come true all the dreams I have dreamed, and still dream and shall keep on dreaming. I get so impatient," said Miriam, "with my physical limitations."



On the floor were samples of wall paper for small Michael's nursery in the John Gilbert house which Miriam has bought and is doing over.

"I bought it because it was a bargain," she explained, "and I adore bargains. If I buy a hat, and if it is reduced from $25.00 to $24.50, I wear it like a crown of triumph. I bought the house because it was a bargain, because its location is superb and mostly because I detest living in a leased house. I like the feeling of a home of my own."

Samples of door panellings were all over the floor. Harold Grieve, who is "doing the house," not for Miriam, but with her, brought them in. And with complete concentration, brushing away every other care, Miriam gave her soul to the problem. Should Michael's cupboards be papered with blue ships on a cream background or with red and blue ships on a pale gray background? Miriam got down on the floor, on her hands and knees. She weighted the samples down smooth and straight with books and vases. She studied them with a breathy absorption. Miriam always seems to be just a little out of breath. She weighed one against the other, asked advice of no one, made her decision, jumped up, brushing off her hands as if to say, "That's done—now what?"

There is not a detail in the John Gilbert house nor in any other house which Miriam buys, leases or lives in for forty-eight hours which she does not personally supervise. From tearing down the vaulted ceilings in the Gilbert house to matching samples of specially woven linens with specially hand-woven rugs, Miriam shops, selects and confers with her decorator. Every drape, every pot and pan, every scrap of linen, every detail down to the soap in the powder-room bears the mark of Miriam's taste and choosing.

THINKING THINGS

Fredric March admits he's afraid to tell what's on his mind—

By Caroline S. Hoyt

EIGHT AND a half years in Hollywood," Fredric March said, "and I've been thinking things over, listing my assets and liabilities, holding up a damp forefinger to determine whither the wind listeth and why. And, I'm afraid to say what I'm thinking." Fred laughed a little, sitting there relaxed, on a divan in his dressing room, where he was "between work" in "The Buccaneer." "I all but cross my fingers," Fred said then, "look at the moon over my right shoulder, apologize to a comb if I drop one, when I realize how terribly lucky I have been and am. I must have some of the Chinese superstition bedded in the Bickel blood, that fear of speaking of one's own good fortune lest it may call down the wrath of some jealous gods.

"Perhaps," said Freddie, his gray eyes grave in the Palm Springs sun-tan of his indisputably handsome and thoughtful face, "perhaps that's why so few people ever do admit their own happiness. But I will admit mine;" here Fred crossed his fingers. "I have been astoundingly lucky. I have to pinch myself hard to make sure that I'm awake, not dreaming. And I'm grateful for everything.

"Not only because I have the things I always knew I wanted, but also because I have the things I didn't know I wanted. And most of all the things I haven't got and can still want.

"One of the grave dangers of Hollywood, especially if you are in the money, is the danger of satiety. The fear that the day may come when there'll be nothing left to want. As poor John Gilbert once said, 'What will there be left for me to want after I am forty?' Tommie Meighan, too, once warned me about that. When I first met him back East, he was awfully kind to me. I was nobody, and he was 'tops.' He made me feel like big pumpkins because he singled me out, took an interest in me.

"He said, 'Easy does it, kid. Be content to go slowly. Don't try to swallow the whole dinner in one course.' Although he was a comparatively young man, he'd made all the money he could use, had achieved stardom, tasted fame, travelled, bought homes. 'So now what?' he asked me.

"Well, I haven't reached the 'so now what' stage. For I haven't got everything I want. And the not having is, and thank God I have sense enough to know it, my most priceless possession. The only one, after all," smiled Freddie wisely, "that cannot be taken away from me.

"I could look back on these past eight years or so, sit out in a deck chair by my pool, let my mind linger luxuriously over my home and wife and children, our possessions, let my imagination dwell on some of the pictures I feel the greatest satisfaction in: 'Death Takes a Holiday,' 'A Star Is Born,' 'Anthony Adverse,' and let it go at that.

"I'll never 'let it go at that,' " said Freddie vigorously, "that's the best of it. And maybe, the best of me.

"I have got, so far as it is nowadays possible to get and keep—security. And security is what I have always wanted beyond and above all else. An heritage, no doubt, from my business-man father who knew the value of a dollar and the greater value of a dollar 'put away.'

"When I was a tiny chap of eight or nine," laughed Fred, "I can remember trotting down to the bank every week and depositing twenty-five to thirty-five cents of my fifty-cents-a-week allowance. 'Against a rainy day,' I said, aping my elders.

"I am afraid of rainy days," said Fred gravely, "not so much for myself as for Florence and the babies. Perhaps I should be colorful and say that my Art has given me my most profound satisfaction. But if it's truth you want and not trimmings, then I am forced to admit that my knowledge that Florence and the babies are as safe as I can make them is the most heart-warming satisfaction I have.

"Do you remember talking to me shortly before we took Penny?" asked Freddie with a look in his eyes that was nice to see. "I was skeptical about it, remember? Afraid, perhaps. I wanted to postpone it for a year or two. Still wishful that we might have sons and daughters of our own. Thinking it

WHEN PRIMA

Grace Moore whispered into Lily Pons' ear. Lily laughed and replied in French. Could it have been about Lily's best beau?

By Nanette Kutner

Our reporter, having caught up with Lily Pons and Grace Moore at tea, gives you a first-hand account of what goes on

When prima donnas meet, what do they discuss—men, careers or clothes? Above, Nanette Kutner records the teatime talk of two of the world's most famous singers—Lily Pons and Grace Moore.

WHEN I suggested taking Lily Pons to tea with Grace Moore, a facetious friend asked who would act as referee.

Grace Moore laughed at this. "We're twentieth century prima donnas," she declared with pride. "True, there is a spirit of competition, but no jealousy."

Lily Pons averred, "In Paris—what jealousy! But not here."

Grace Moore said, "Lily and I are the best of friends."

And so, they agreed to meet. Lily Pons suggested we come to her apartment. Grace Moore wanted us at hers. Trying to be tactful, I insisted upon neutral ground—the Weylin Hotel in New York.

It was settled. And they came.

Lily Pons, a little uncertain, nervous, but utterly natural, arrived five minutes early. She spoke English, carefully dividing the syllables, accenting them charmingly in the wrong places.

"It is so secret, meeting here. Like ambasse*deurs* from foreign countries," she whispered.

AS THE waiter carried in the large snowy linened table, Lily looked dismayed and suggested he fetch another.

"Not such a beeg one with white clothes on it," she implored.

When asked what she cared to order, she took a glass of water.

"I drink twenty glasses a day. It is for health. I work so hard, five operas, twenty-four concerts, radio and pictures."

Her talk turned to the still absent Miss Moore.

"She is charming woman. I have not seen her since 'ollywood. I went to her party there last September. I never accept parties, but to hers I go. Funny, she bought villa in Cannes where I come from, and I buy house in America." There was a pause. "She is late. I scold her when she come."

Wearing a coat of satiny broadcloth, Grace Moore arrived a half hour later. If she planned an entrance, it was spoiled, for as she walked through the doorway, Lily Pons unexpectedly leaped from her chair, ran across the floor, threw her arms around Miss Moore, kissed her, and cried triumphantly, "I got here first."

Thus Miss Pons unwittingly stole the show. But not for long, not with Grace Moore standing, radiant as a Klieg light, in the center of that room. Grace Moore of the blonde hair and vivacious laughter, Grace Moore, our gay Irish-American lyric soprano, who stood waving her hands and talking—French!

SHE WAS being a woman of the world, a linguist—a prima donna. She was being it for all she was worth, and it was a good act, and she knew it. She was having a wonderful time.

She explained the outburst with, "After all, Lily isn't at home in English."

I asked her what she would like to order.

"Hungarian Baruck," calmly demanded Miss Moore. The waiter looked bewildered.

"Oh, you won't have it," she assured him, and turning to Lily, "You know how bad drinks are for us, but this one!" She threw a kiss towards the ceiling. "An apricot brandy, my dear. A few sips before you go on; it does wonders for the voice. Every singer should take it." Then, aside, "I just ordered that to have Lily ask what it was."

Round Two definitely went to Miss Moore.

Lily stared at her. "Blonde meets brunette," said she.

DONNAS MEET!

An attractive little thing called a drawl was once Gail Patrick's chief drawback.

HOW TO STAY

You must have looks and talent, of course—but much more than

YOU'RE A foolish, stupid girl and you'll never make an actress. I don't know why the studio ever put you into this role."

The fourteen-year-old girl with the beautiful skin and the great blue eyes tried to keep back the tears.

For days it had been like this—with the director screaming at her. And she had thought when the studio put her into "Laugh, Clown, Laugh" that her great chance had come. Instead she had been subjected to the torment of being criticized mercilessly.

She crept into a corner, away from the eyes of the director and began to sob. But the kindly eyes of Lon Chaney found her. "Listen, child," he said, "stop crying. You're in the hardest game in the world. If they kick your heart around like a football, pick it up, brush it off and go on your way again."

The girl followed his advice and today you know her as Loretta Young. Her story illustrates what it takes to stay a star. Thousands of young people who have gone out to Hollywood and who have come back defeated have looked about them at the Shearers, the Myrna Loys, the Jeanette MacDonalds, and have said, "What have they got that I haven't got? Why did they get to the top and stay there?"

Talented young people. Handsome young people. All crying out in bitter mutiny, "Why?"

What does it take to stay a star? Countless times you've been told that it takes great beauty and talent. But they're not enough—not nearly enough. More than anything else, it takes courage. The men and women who get anywhere in Hollywood have to go through their own private Gethsemanes.

Look at Ida Lupino. She is very young to have been called upon to fight fear and discouragement. But Hollywood spares no one.

She was brought from England to Hollywood to play an unsophisticated girl in a picture that was expected to be a sensation, "Alice in Wonderland." But in one of those typical movie upsets, the executives gave the role to another girl. Instead of turning her back and returning to

If it hadn't been for one man's advice, Loretta Young might not now be in movies.

England, Ida did away with herself. Not literally, of course. She isn't the type to shoot herself, or jump off a cliff. But she decided that Hollywood had no use for another artless young thing when they grew as thick in Hollywood as berries in the field. So she did things. She changed her make-up, the way she did her hair. She turned sophisticated. Hollywood executives rubbed their eyes and gave her parts to play. Today, she'd laugh if you mentioned "Alice in Wonderland" to her. For "Alice" turned out to be a failure and the girl who played the part got nowhere.

Jean Hersholt has been in Hollywood for twenty-four years, longer than almost any other actor, so long that his own studio thought the public must be getting tired of him. It tossed him around like an old shoe. Finally another studio offered him the plum of the year, the role of Dr. Dafoe in "The Country Doctor."

Hersholt could hardly believe it. After all these years, to have a role like this. He made up his mind to play the part so that people would never forget it.

Then one day, while he was on location in Callander, he stepped into a crevice and fell. For several minutes he was unconscious. When he came to, he couldn't move and he thought his leg was broken. The newspapers that day carried scare headlines indicating that he might be crippled forever. Lying still and white in the hospital, he told his wife, who came to visit him, "Honey, keep your chin up. Don't you know that you mustn't believe everything the newspapers say?"

He lay in the hospital, his foot horribly twisted. At the end of three days, though he was still in great pain, he left the hospital and started to play his role as Dr. Dafoe. The first scene he was called upon to make was rolling with the Quintuplets on the floor. Over and over again they rolled, while every muscle in his leg tortured him; every time he moved he went through unbearable agony. Finally the part called for him to chuckle as he played with the Quints.

"I felt like getting up and screaming instead," confessed Jean Hersholt.

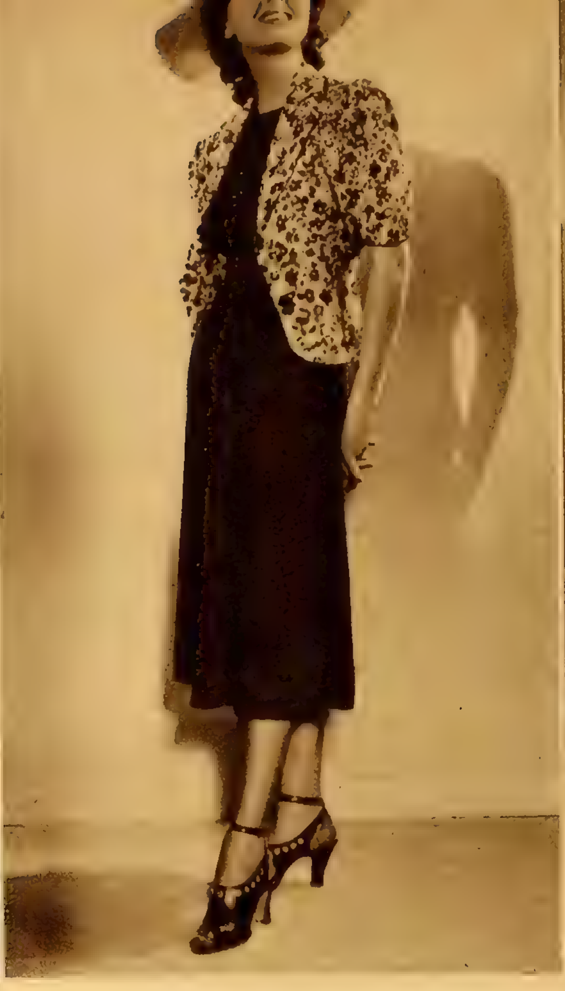
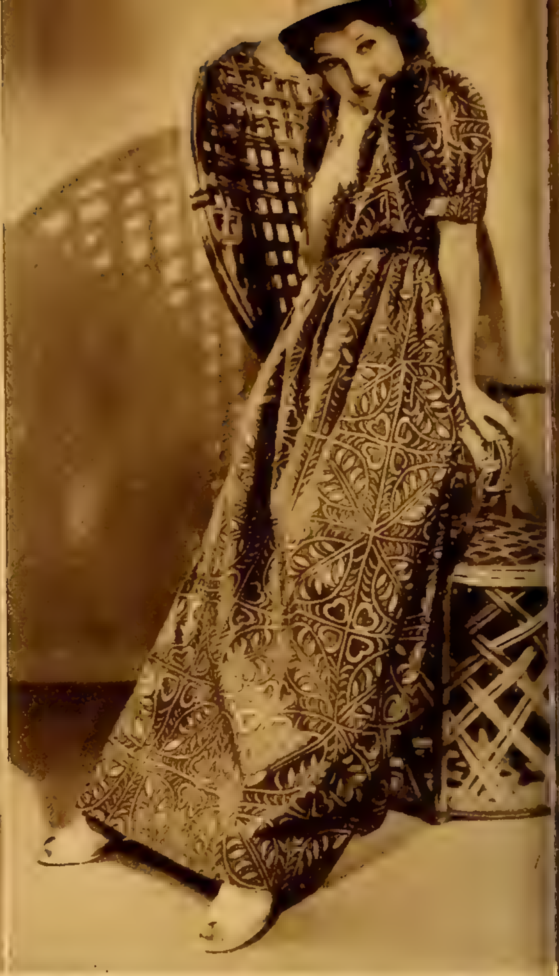
Jean Parker's printed cotton play dress, with matching jacket, is an indispensable playtime item.



A backless frock of Navy linen goes to town with perfect aplomb, topped with a figured cotton jacket.



She wears a peasant dress instead of a beach coat—as contrast to the sophistication of her swim suit.

Help Yourself to

YOU ARE going to have a lot of fun this summer—if you have the right clothes. That's the way of this wicked world. People may love you for yourself alone, but somehow it never occurs to them until they see you in a knockout outfit. A gaily flowered, crisp cotton sports dress, such as the one Jean Parker is wearing, as she dangles its impertinent matching jacket in her hand, is practically guaranteed to make that exciting new man you just met decide that you're just the companion he needs at the tennis matches.

The suave, dark linen dress, with its dashing flowered jacket, will convince almost any man that he can get away from the office long enough to take you to luncheon. And as for the beach clothes she is wearing, you have no idea how many young men never discover that they can get away with the family car and take you exploring all the beaches and pools in the vicinity until they see you in such an outfit. That settles it. They just have to show you off to their friends and rivals.

Now, a lot of girls have foolish and stubborn pride about admitting the effect that wisely-chosen clothes have on

They know that judicious use of brilliant colors in dresses makes a girl seem more alive, more vivid. They have discovered that there is nothing like a severely tailored dark dress to show off a slim, supple figure. And they have learned, too, the greatest secret of all—that clothes can bring

Warner (Chan has a Chan-o-gram for the tip of his tongue for every occasion. Olive and George Brasno are his listeners.

First of all, is there anyone in the audience who doesn't know that Charlie Chan and Warner Oland are one and the same person? Okay. Then, here he is with Sam Flint in a recent Chan-er.

Expert sleuthing in Shanghai, at the Race-track and even at the Opera, has nothing on the mysteries your favorite Chinese detective, Charlie Chan, unravels here about a certain Mr. Oland

I WENT to interview Warner Oland about Charlie Chan. I remained to interview Charlie Chan about Warner Oland. For, actually, the two men are one.

Mr. Oland admitted, with his shy, Chan-ish smile that playing the one part in so many pictures, for so many years, has so steeped him in the character that "not even my wife," smiled Mr. Oland, "can tell now whether she is married to Warner Oland, Dane, or Charlie Chan, Oriental."

When I arrived at the studio commissary to lunch with Mr. Oland, we ordered, with a sense of the fitness of things, Chicken Chow Mein, Mandarin and yellow tomato juice. And when I remarked, with an attempt at Oriental courtesy, that it was interesting to be talking to the creator of Charlie Chan, lo, it was Mr. Chan, himself, who rose from the table, made that well-known little bow from the waist, said sibilantly, "Thank you so much."

Mr. Oland is painfully shy about interviews. He says, "Don't talk too much. Words like sunbeams. The more they are condensed the deeper they burn." Warner Oland actually speaks in Chan-o-grams.

The result of this reticence is that no one knows anything about Warner Oland. It has been said that the Chan pictures make more money over a period of years than his studio's much touted super-super productions. But so deep-rooted is Mr. Oland's conviction that people are not interested in him, personally, that it would be painful for him to talk glibly about himself.

There sat Charlie Chan, the ends of his eyebrows brushed up, the ends of his mustache brushed down—his only make-up for the role of Chan. For the eyes, the voice, the build, and the gentle courtesy of Warner Oland are the eyes, the voice, the build, and the soft, impersonal courtesy of Charlie Chan. Knowing that Oriental courtesy cannot refuse a gift, even the gift of words, I induced Charlie Chan to talk about Warner Oland.

MR. AND MRS. OLAND live very quietly on their ranch in the Carpenteria Valley near Santa Barbara, in a Cape Cod farmhouse type abode, facing the sea on one side, the Santa Barbara hills on the other. The furnishings are a fascinating and discriminating conglomeration of treasures from the travels of the Olands. The antique English oak table was purchased in London. There are candlesticks from Italy, rare porcelains, some Early American pieces, an English Sheraton desk—Mr. Oland's favorite chair—and an Early American needlepoint. Occasional touches of Chinese red flame in the English oak living-room.

One room, which started out to be a library, now houses Mr. Oland's ever-increasing collection of Chinese prints and art objects. With this one exception, Mr. Oland does not go in for collecting. The two bedrooms are done very simply, one in green and lemon-yellow, the other in red and white. The servants' quarters are as cheerful as the rest of the house. And there are several portraits of Mr. Oland about the rooms, done by his artist wife.

There is a lovely rose garden. There are lemon groves, and avocados, limes and oranges, growing in abundance. Oland has an arrangement with one of the big fruit packing houses to tend his lemon groves and market the crops. He makes from sixty to eighty dollars a month on his lemons, believe it or not.

Mr. and Mrs. Oland seldom go out socially, and they entertain very little. On Sundays when they are at home at the ranch, they have a few close friends in to spend the day with them. These often include Louise Dresser and her husband, Jack Gardner, the Jean Hersholts, the Frank Lloyds, the Richard Arlens. Mr. Oland is a most casual host. He supplies his guests with bathing suits for a before-luncheon swim and after luncheon they will often play pinochle, poker or dominoes—never bridge.

But let Mr. Chan tell you about the Olands, in his own words. "Now and then he does some gardening himself. But he is an indolent fellow, this Oland," smiled Charlie. "He spends much time walking by the sea and in the hills. He calls this 'refreshing his soul.' He also sits before the fire, meditating and reading Chinese philosophies. As the years go by, he is becoming more and more steeped in Oriental literature and the ancient wisdoms. But he says, sadly, that not all his reading will 'capture the sea of literature in the thimble of man's brief span of time.'

"The marriage of the Olands is completely happy. The seed of their romance which was planted in the sound soil of mutual interests," said Charlie Chan, "has developed into the full flower of their marriage." Then he told the story of that romance from its beginning. They met in New York when Mr. Oland was playing "Peer Gynt" at the old Keith and Proctor Theatre on 28th Street. Mrs. Oland, then Edith Gardener Shearn, well-known portrait painter, had written a one-act play, "The House of a Traitor," and was backstage arranging for its presentation.

The press agent of the theatre asked if she would like to meet Warner Oland whose perform-

SOLVING SOME

If Loretta Young can eat and stay slim, why can't you?

Yes, Simone Simon can pout and look cute, but don't you try it!

By Mary Marshall

THIS MONTH, ladies, the beauty seminar will be conducted in question and answer form. By this snappy and efficient means, I hope to clear up a lot of beauty troubles which have been bothering you and me. So—without more ado . . .

Question: Why do I gain weight, when I eat scarcely enough to keep a bird alive, and why does my friend stay thin when she eats like a horse?

Answer: There is a difference, to be sure, in the rate at which individuals assimilate food. The canary's rations on which you claim you subsist seem to go, full speed ahead, into fat—usually around the hips—whereas the potatoes and pie consumed by your girl friend don't do her a bit of damage. But please notice that I said "canary's rations which you claim, etc." I'm not doubting your honesty. You think you're being honest. But wait—are you? You may eat little in quantity, but howz about the nature of the food you eat? When you say you "had only a salad for lunch," did you have mayonnaise on the salad instead of a dressing compounded of very little olive oil (mineral oil would be better), lemon juice, salt and a little pepper?

You know what's right to eat as well as I do—

Loretta Young loves sweets and indulges in them without gaining an ounce. How does she do it?

BEAUTY PUZZLES

Here is the answer to this and 24 other exasperating "whys"

Dolores Del Rio may have to count her calories, but she keeps that streamline by constant care.

Bette Davis knows how to make large eyes look starry instead of starey.

or you should, by this time. All fruit juices and fruits except bananas. All vegetables, 'cept corn, and go easy on the peas and beans. A baked potato or very little starch now and then. All roasted or broiled lean meats except pork. Also fowl and fish. And beverages without cream and sugar.

No trimmings on food—like sauces and stuff. No nibbling. Eat three light meals a day and don't get the snack habit. (That's put in especially for married women who "don't feel like eating anything alone"—so they have a cup of tea and a piece of cake, and what could be worse?) No hard liquor or beer. Don't go round saying you "have a thyroid condition" unless a doctor has told you so. That excuse has been worked to death.

Dolores Del Rio, up thar, puts on weight like a house afire if she doesn't watch out. Loretta Young, down thar, can't gain a pound without concerted effort. But Dolores sees to it that her luscious curves stay luscious and not lumpy, and Loretta, by constant attention to the cream soups and glasses of milk, stays slim like a willow and not skinny like a bean pole.

Question: If I'm fat (or thin) all over, what should I do—exercise or diet?

Answer: Diet for a spell, till you get somewhere near the weight

A LARK THAT LASTED

Claire was a hey-hey gal 'til Hollywood crossed her path

By George Benjamin

You'll see Claire Trevor in "One Mile From Heaven" next.

CLAIRE TREVOR is the most surprised star in Hollywood today. The light-hearted lassie for whom life was all a game has turned into the darndest career woman. Yesterday's dabblings are over. The old carefree fun is laid away in lavender. Why, even love's blacklisted!

"Imagine it!" she exclaims. "Gone career-crazy. Me of all people. How do you figure that one out?"

And it all began as just another lark.

She grew up in Larchmont, a pleasant suburb of New York City, without the slightest fancy for fame. The only child of a Fifth Avenue merchant, Claire's one aim was to have as good a time as possible in as quick a time as possible.

Her present stern sticking to business, her conversion to the cause of serious self-improvement, is all the more remarkable remembering that she was such a belle.

As a high-school senior she was as peppy and irresponsible a gal as you could find. Popular, you bet. She had snapping brown eyes, blond hair and a trim figure. She danced well, dressed with chic and was more fun than half a dozen other seniors altogether.

So it wasn't astonishing that even before she graduated she became the ideal prom girl. The college boys she met, and she seemed to meet the most interesting ones, decided that. She was invited to the best house parties from Harvard to Annapolis, including Princeton, Dartmouth, West Point, and way points.

Her adamant stand against falling in love now is the result of falling in love twice before she hit Hollywood. The first time was when she was seventeen.

Claire was still a senior when her cousin who had just joined the Dekes at Colgate wrote that she was to come up for the fraternity formal as his roommate's date. Naturally she dreamt of a Robert Taylor. But when she and the three other girls who went along with her for the auspicious week-end set foot upon the campus Claire had reasons to mentally moan. However, being ever polite, she bore up. When the dance was over and he was in the mood to spoon she drew the line though.

Saturday night, the remaining evening of that week-end, luck was with her. She went to another dance with her unappealing escort and was cut in on by a genuine R. T. effect. Zing went the strings of her heart, and his, too. He said, "I must see you later. Can't you get rid of the fellow who brought you?" Claire, like any romantic girl in that predicament, whispered, "Of course!"

The minute the orchestra finished "Home Sweet Home," she had a headache. She was so sorry but she had to retire right away. Cousin Frank's forlorn pal left her on the front doorstep of the house occupied by the visiting girls. Freshening her make-up, she tip-toed down the back stairs to the kitchen door, where he was waiting. With another couple they proceeded to go tobagganing in the moonlight. It was glorious. It was first love. When Claire returned home Sunday night she was in a daze.

But next day came a ten-page blast from her irate cousin. He'd heard about Claire slipping out on his roommate, then going tobogganing with the R. T. boy friend. The roommate had also heard about it, and was he on fire! "You'll never be asked to another prom," Cousin Frank underlined thrice. (She received five bids from Colgate the following year notwithstanding.)

She and the One Man corresponded. Her mother agreed that he should be invited down. Then the urge to move seized her parents and the house was in a mess. It was no time to intrigue a suitor. So in the confusion Claire somehow didn't answer his next letter and she never saw him again.

Keen as she was cute, Claire found lessons a snap. In fact, so much of a snap that she made a practice of not studying too hard. When she was ready for Vassar she learned she'd have to return to high school for a bit of brushing-up on certain credits.

"I decided that was too much trouble," she admits candidly. Tell Claire she has to do anything and instinctively she doesn't want to—with a vengeance. The university polishing was speedily abandoned. Still, she had to go on to something. Public speaking had been her pet subject so it occurred to her that a dramatic academy might be jolly. Her parents sent her.

But Claire wasn't stirred by an overwhelming inner flame seeking self-expression (Continued on page 80)

By the time you read this story, Gene and Jeanette may be Mister and Missus.

Gene's life is a series of cartoons—with most of the laughs on Raymond.

HIGHLIGHTING GENE

So Mr. Raymond won't talk? Well, listen to this—and all about himself, too

By Franc Dillon

BEFORE I interviewed Gene Raymond, I was warned not to question him about his romance and approaching marriage to Jeanette MacDonald. "He just won't talk about it, and if you so much as mention it to him, he freezes up," is what I heard from those in the know.

Oh yeah! Well, try talking to that lad five minutes about anything but his romance these days. It can't be done. Gene's too enthusiastically in love, too thrilled over the whole thing.

"I'm the happiest man alive," he exploded, and he looked it. Gene is a surprise to those who have seen him only on the screen, for he has a virility, an inner strength, which could almost be described as stern, and a vital personality that the camera seldom seems to catch. His shoulders are so broad that you have to look twice to see both of them, and his handshake so firm that you feel its effects for an hour afterward. Usually good-natured, he has a mind of his own which nothing can change when he thinks he is right. One of the points on which he is obdurate in his determination not to make a publicity stunt of his marriage.

FOR THAT reason and because they are both taking it so seriously, they have used good taste about the whole thing. Jeanette's mother announced the engagement at a tea last Spring, which Gene's mother attended. They set the date for their wedding—a church wedding—months in advance, believing that a long engagement would give them the opportunity to make sure they were making no mistake. They planned their honeymoon—not just a sleeper jump to Yuma, but a three months' trip to Honolulu and perhaps to the Orient.

They plan a home in San Fernando Valley, forty miles from Hollywood, which will necessitate a place in town where they can stay when they have early morning studio calls. But the place they call "home" will be just that, with all the trimmings. There will be kennels, stables, a tennis court, a swimming pool and a carefully planned garden.

The house itself will be a rambling, comfortable retreat. There will be a music room, of course, and, incidentally, Jeanette won't be the only musician in the family. Gene has composed several songs and wrote both words and music for "Will You?", one of the successful numbers in "The Smartest Girl In Town." He plays the piano very well, too, and hopes to compose a symphony when he has more leisure.

Offscreen, too, Margaret Lindsay is surrounded by an air of mystery. In other words—

Margaret's idea of fun is going 'round the world on a freighter!

She KEEPS YOU GUESSING

By Mignon Rittenhouse

SHE SEEMS like a girl fresh from finishing school, but she graduated six years ago. She's a lady with inhibitions, and not afraid to admit it. She believes that women can be good friends even when they're both Hollywood stars. She believes that men should be bosses after marriage, but you can't pin her down as Victorian. She's the girl in the snappiest evening gown, whom the fellows in the stag line fall all over each other to dance with. And she's pretty good at giving workable advice on how to break into the movies.

She's the girl in one of the mystery stories she plays in. She's a debunker. Before you meet her, you think she's going to be up-ity, that she's doing a Garbo on you.

Later she seems grandly human, intelligent and humorous, does Margaret Lindsay. You like her, even if she does keep you guessing!

On the way to her hotel suite, the elevator man asked sharply, "Are you sure you have an appointment with Miss Lindsay? Because I'm sure she isn't in to anyone."

Even when I'd reassured him, his eyes followed me suspiciously as I walked down the corridor toward her rooms.

Now as I rang the bell, I half expected a maid to appear and hand me a written announcement saying, "Margaret Lindsay doesn't live here any more."

But the door opened and a girl with frank hazel eyes and a low expressive voice said cordially, "I'm Margaret Lindsay. Won't you come in? I'm awfully sorry about that appointment. Please don't think I'm high-hat. The studio and I just seemed to miss connections. I've been so terribly rushed. You see, I'm on my vacation."

She wore a tailored Panama suit with a crisp brown linen blouse and nary a frill. She ushered me into a long feminine living room. Bright flowers everywhere—red tulips and yellow and blue-purple irises in colorful vases.

She had the same crisp incisive way you felt in "Green Light." But she seemed younger, with a fairer complexion than you'd think, judging from her pictures. More vital. Her personality did things to the room.

"I'm telephone operator, doorman et cetera today," she explained, as she curled up on one end of the sofa. "It's been like a madhouse here all afternoon."

The place didn't look like a madhouse. It looked smart, sophisticated and very bright. It looked as though Margaret Lindsay had gone around doing little things to it, changing the position of a chair or vase, rearranging the draperies to suit herself. It had the look of a room that a girl lived in, not one that she dropped into on a short vacation.

The telephone rang; Margaret darted off to answer it. She was back in a few seconds but not for long. The telephone rang again and again. Margaret was back and forth, back and forth. Janet (Continued on page 72)

Young Howard is giving himself just six more months to make good in movies. And then?

After finishing "Lost Horizon," Johnny stepped right into "Let Them Live."

By Martha Kerr

HE'S A COWARD

John Howard's not afraid of poverty, heartbreak or death, but just the same—

"ARE YOU a coward?" I asked.

John Howard laughed. It did seem a touch preposterous to ask such a question of a young man five-feet-ten in height, weighing 160 pounds, with bright blue eyes, brown hair, active and sound of mind and limb. Yet he answered my question promptly, quite without offense. He is enough of an intellectual—a Phi Beta Kappa from Western Reserve University—to be interested in any discussion which probes and analyzes human motives, even his own.

"Yes, I am a coward," he answered. "I'm afraid of being mediocre. I am terrified of being an inbetweener. It is my bogie-man, my nightmare. I am terrified of being one of that legion listed 'and the cast also includes.' If I can't be a spectacular success, I prefer to be a spectacular failure. I would rather be a good, juicy melodramatic 'dreg of humanity' than a comfortable and unsung semi-nonentity. There is something about walking the mid-stream of life, sitting at the 'second table,' which is sheer nightmare to me.

"I believe," laughed John Howard, "that this is my only cowardice.

"I've faced death on more than one occasion without flinching, so far as I know. I've faced blindness and kept my chin up against impending darkness. I've faced poverty and have found that it holds no terrors for me. I've faced the loss of the career I hoped for and sustained the loss. I've faced love and the loss of love and have emerged with the break in my heart neatly mended and ready for the rebound. I've faced Hollywood," laughed John, "and that's no mean test of the temper of the steel.

"I faced the formidable cast of 'Lost Horizon' and if my bright, brave little spirit did quail a bit at that, it can doubtless be ascribed to my psychopathic fear of mediocrity again. The fear that, pitted against such experienced troupers as Ronald Colman, H. B. Warner, Isabel Jewell, Edward Everett Horton, Margo, and the others, little John would go down in oblivion.

"I was terrified all the more because I didn't for one minute believe in the character I was playing. The fellow was a fool. Whenever I had to cut loose and have a good bout of hysterics because I had to stay at Shangri-la I'd be thinking to myself, 'What an ass the fellow is. Who would want to leave a place like this?' So, I had the added difficulty of playing the character 'against the grain.' If I did it at all creditably—and I can see enough room for improvement to put me well in my place—it is all to my credit.

Off Their Guard

Rochelle Hudson performs this "handy" with the greatest of ease. If you don't think this slick trick is difficult, try it yourself sometime! But unless you're on the petite side—five feet four and tip the scales at about 100—the results are apt to be a mite disastrous.

Summer's the time for fun and Frank Muto candid-cameras the cinema girls and boys during their gayest moments

With not a care in the world and all done up in smart Jantzen beach regalia, Rochelle emerges from her cabaña with quoits and surfboard in tow. You guessed it—Mam'selle is out to do some fine and fancy playing!

When a gal has to work up an appetite 'fore she can start work in a new picture, that's news. Well, Rochelle wanted to be prepared for any emergency that might arise in making "She Had to Eat," thus all the activity!

That ball gets a mean send-off from the little lady. Powerful stuff for a mere bathing belle. Rochelle evidently thinks she's down at the Rose Bowl, competing with the collitch boys.

Movie Mermaid

Rochelle Hudson casts herself as a sea nymph when the director isn't looking. Her location? Santa Monica

This business of sitting around on the beach, basking in the sun, a la typical bathing beauty, doesn't appeal to our little star. She dives right in and lets the nasty waves knock her down—that is, if they can.

The name of Rochelle's current heart throb is a deep, dark secret. But there is one, you can be sure, for when a gal starts drawing hearts in the sand, there's a gent lurking in the offing.

Four more quoits to go and everyone a guaranteed ringer. With a surefire aim like that, there's little wonder that Rochelle has made her mark in the movies — and we don't mean "X," either.

A gal's gotta keep busy

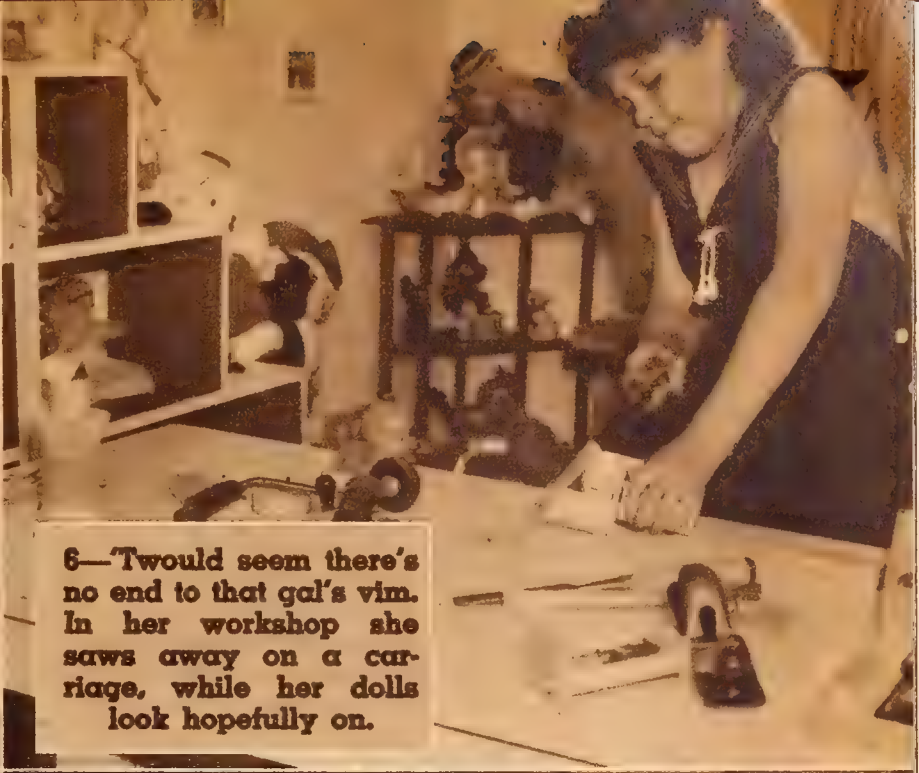
1—The days are never long enough for a regular kid like Jane Withers. She's up bright and early to do her sprint around the old cinder track. What pep! What form! What a gal!

2—This busy Miss spends part of each acting day in the studio schoolroom learning readin', ritin' and 'rithm'tic. And, naturally, she's a star pupil.

3—After "business hours," she takes up farmeretting. Here she is coaxing her chicks to eat out of her hand—as her fans are doing.

4—Two's a crowd on a motor bike built for one, but Jane's decided her pet dog needs an outing. The dog isn't so sure about it, though.

5—There's nothing young Miss Withers won't try once. Now she's lending a helping hand in building her new fish pond.



6—'Twould seem there's no end to that gal's vim. In her workshop she saws away on a carriage, while her dolls look hopefully on.

7—Next, she tries her hand in the culinary department. Won't Mother be surprised when she tastes the cake Jane's making?

8—Playtime's nearly over and she's only getting started on that new summer wardrobe for her dollies. The needle just won't stay threaded!

9—"Aw, shucks, can't I practice my scales some other time?" pouts Jane. But Mother thinks there's no time like the present.

10—Bedtime at last. Like lots of girls and boys, the Withers lass lingers on. How can a gal sleep with an unsolved mystery on the air?

To Market, To Market

A morning's bargain-hunt with Hollywood's loveliest bargain-cute Anita Louise

No one knows better than the Louise gal that an army marches on its stomach. But who ever heard of an army marching on a cup cake? Come, come, Anita, is that cricket?

Marketing's a lark for Anita Louise. "Yep," says she, "it's all in knowing how," as she makes the bananas look a pound or two lighter. Honor system, Anita! Besides, that scale trick is as old as the hills.

Anita grins—and bears three baskets. How about wearing that middle one on your head, peasant style? Or how about—aw heck, aren't there any gentlemen in the house?

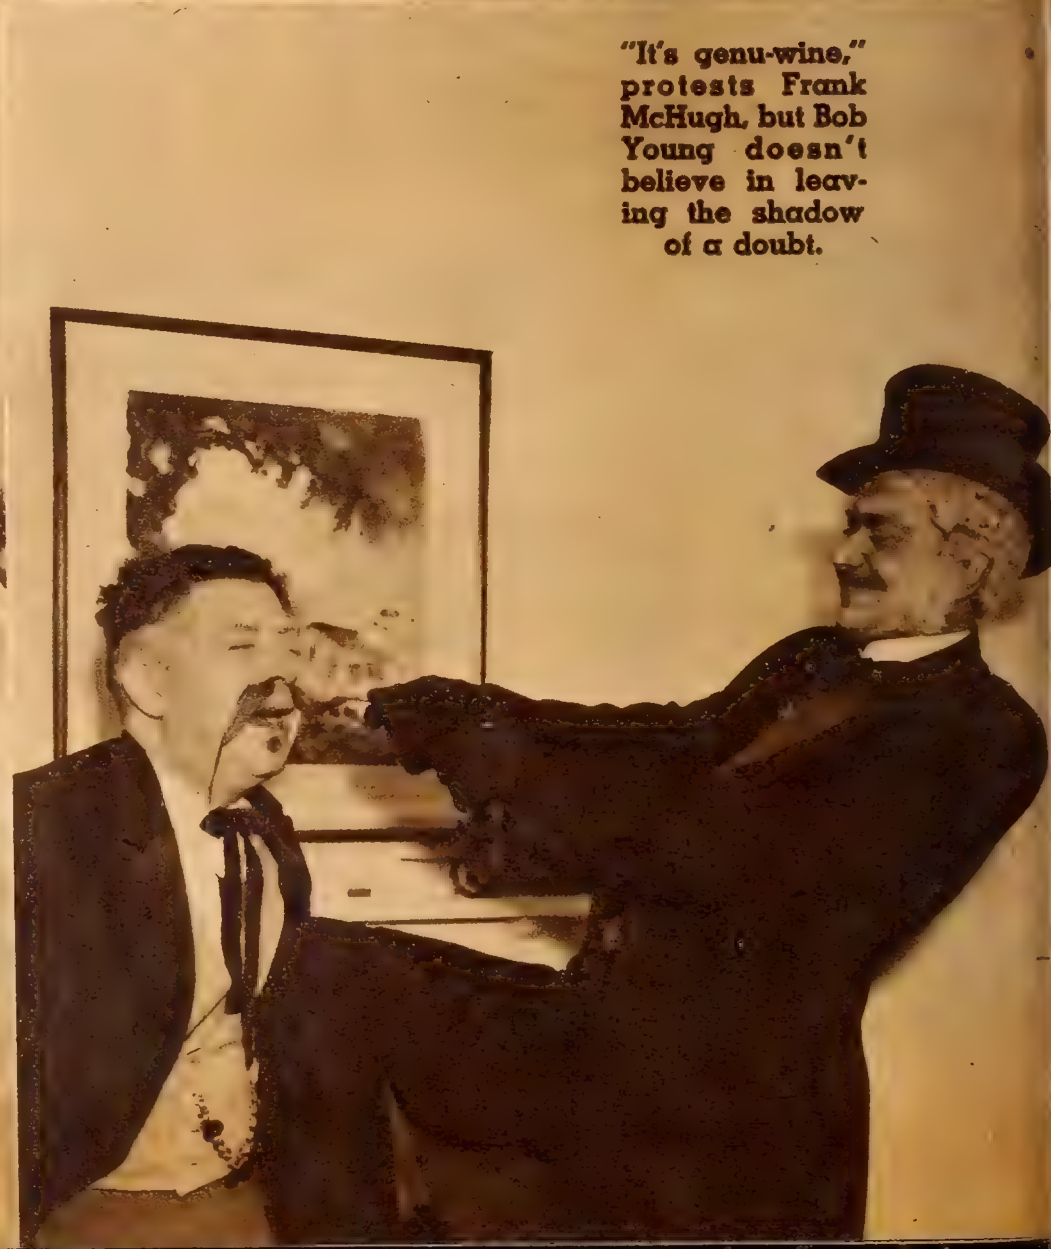
"Oooh, what a cute lobster!" enthuses Miss Louise. And can you imagine what the lobster is mumbling into his antennae about cute blondes? Just another case of love at first sight.

And now for a bit of lightning calculation. If five red apples cost twelve cents, how much will the lamb chops come to if Jack Smart drops in for supper? "Gosh," complains Anita, "I can't do a thing without my slide rule."

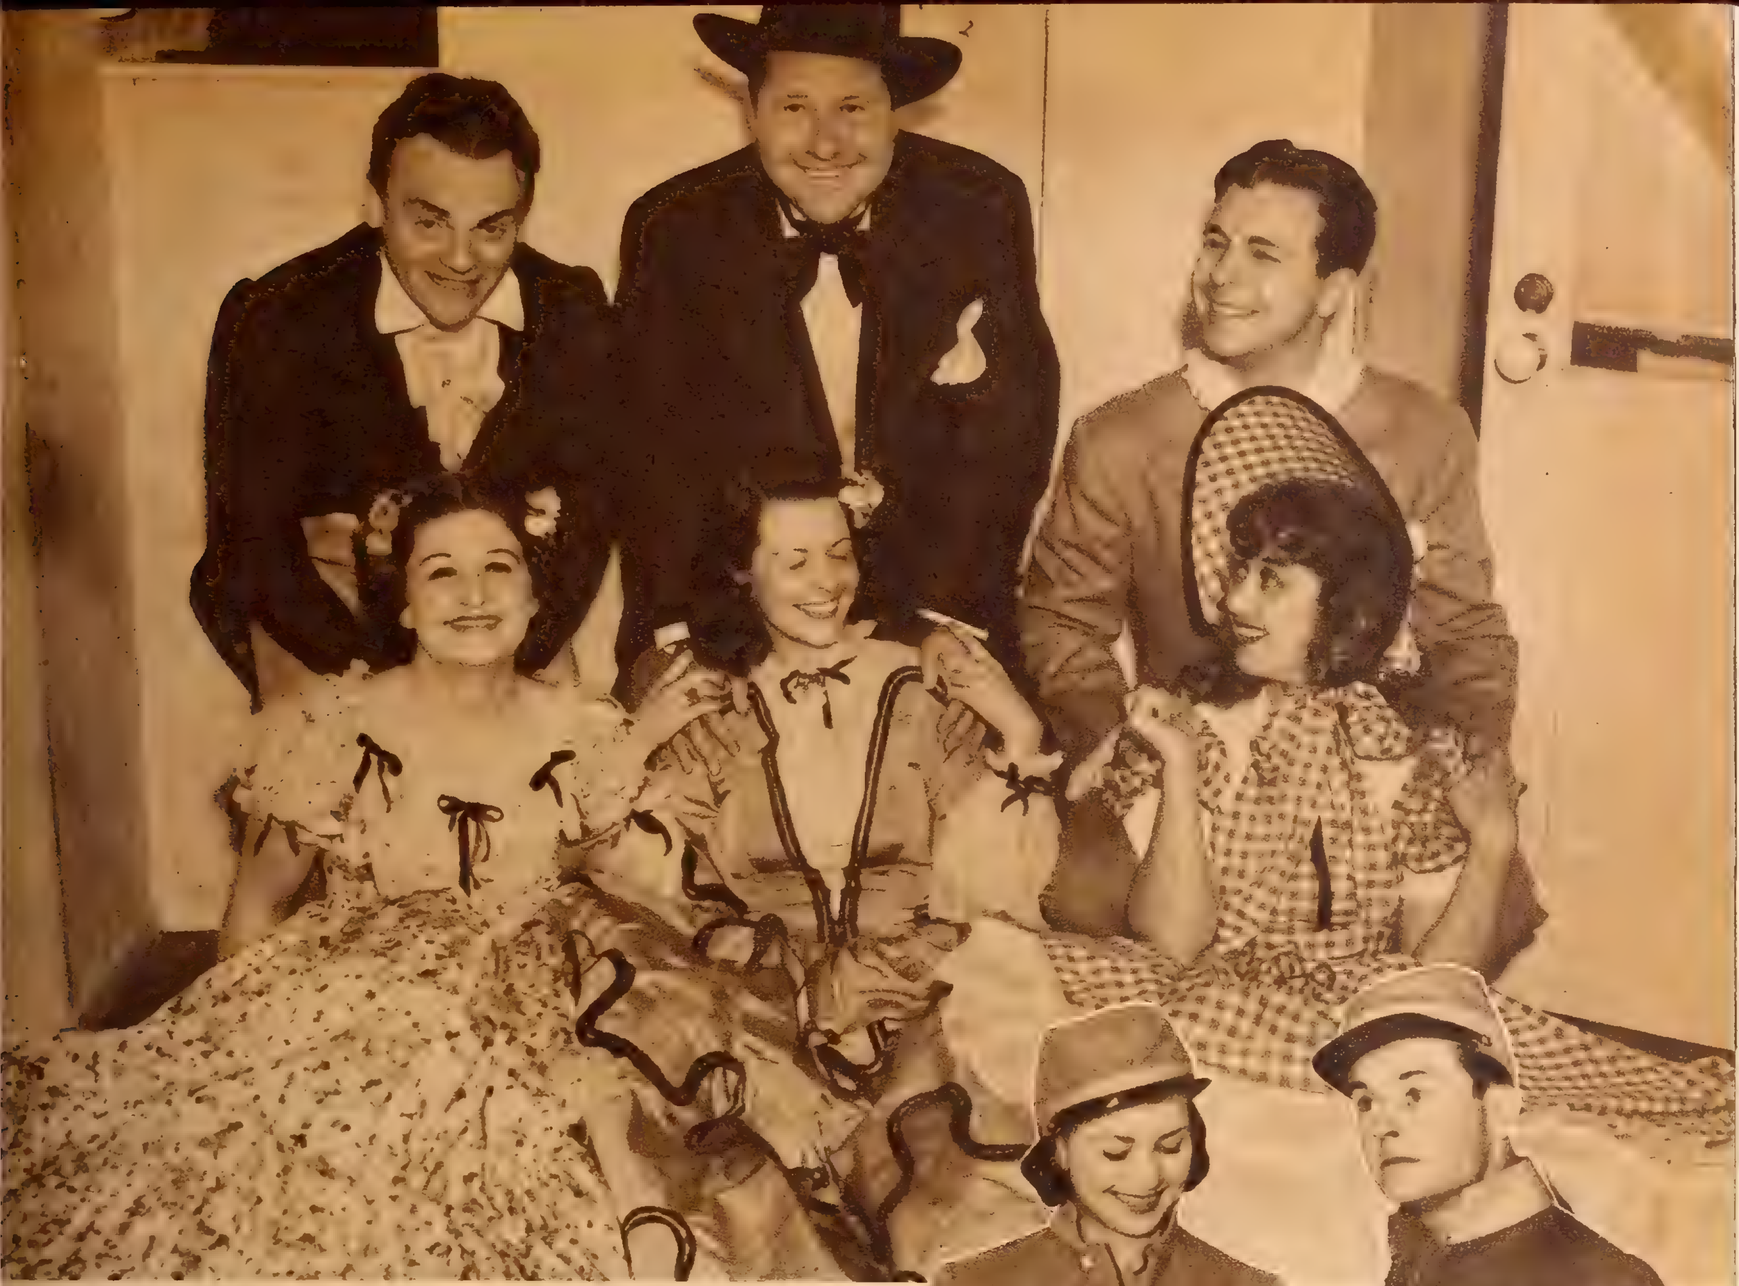
Figures are figures, but Anita obviously hasn't figured on this. Must have been the caviar. She has a good mind to call the manager and tell him to keep his groceries. She'll economize by roughing it at the Trocadero.

Jean Hersholt and Heather Angel enjoy a private joke, while Pat O'Brien hides behind his wife's hoop-skirts. The "non-com-poop" on the right is Corp'ral Joe E. Brown.

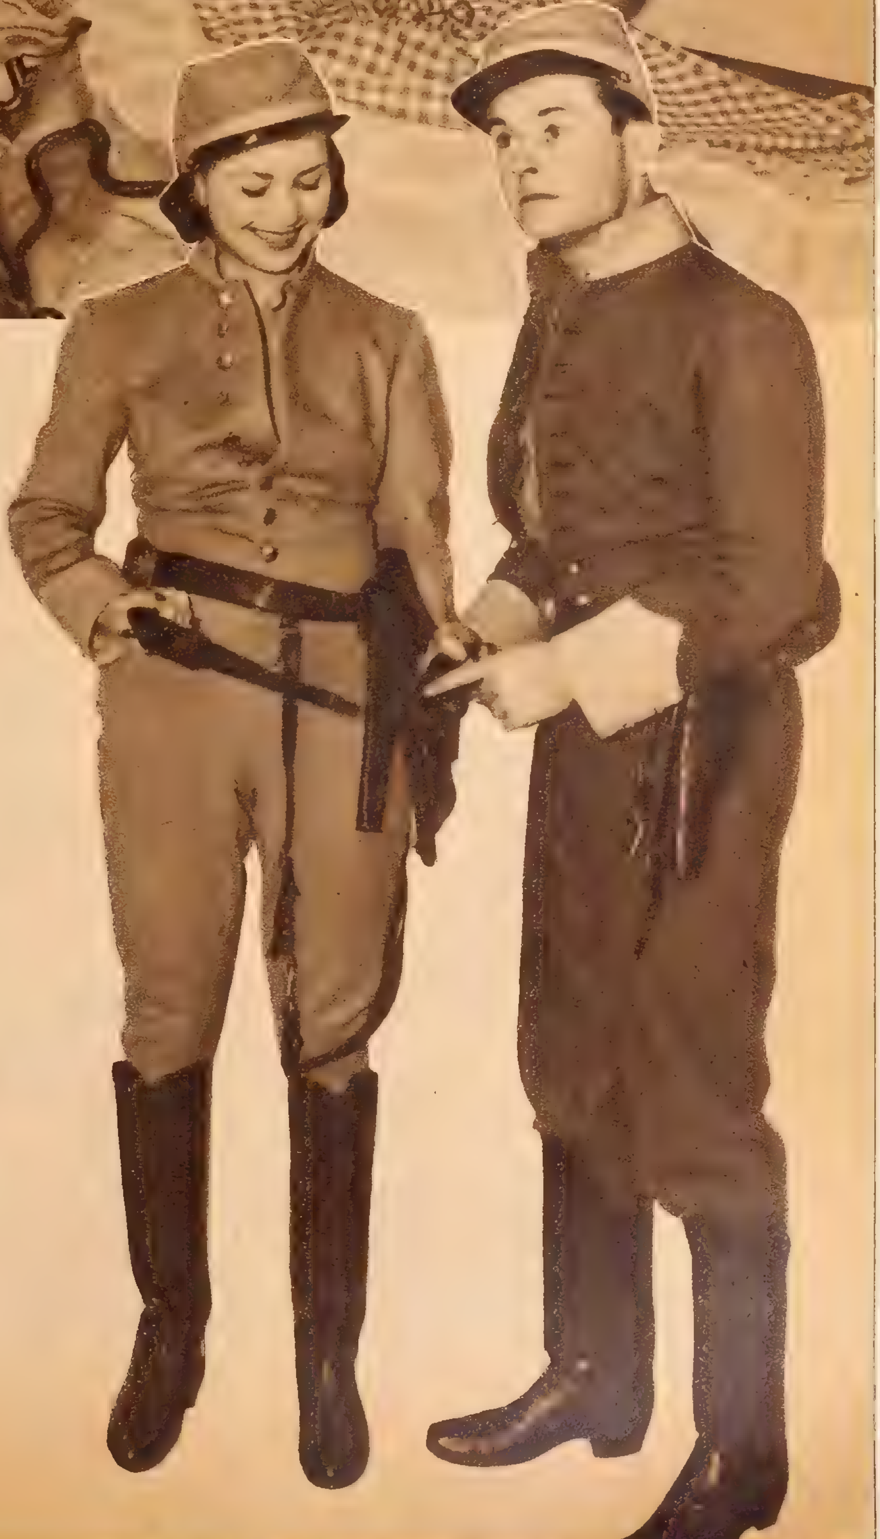
Courtly "Diamond Jim" Arnold requests the pleasure of the next waltz with Elaine Barrie Barrymore.



"It's genu-wine," protests Frank McHugh, but Bob Young doesn't believe in leaving the shadow of a doubt.



A homey gang of Confederates gets together to sample "Rhett" Oakie's southern hospitality. The occasion is Jack's "Come with the Wind" party. Mr. and Mrs. Cagney both seem thrilled by the old plantation glamor, as do Dick and "Maw" Powell—Joan Blondell to you. The shy little gal in the middle is Mrs. Oakie.



Tom Brown, shooting iron and all, seems headed for the front, or is he merely warning the cameraman to wait till he gets his coat buttoned? At any rate, his girl friend, Natalie Draper, looks ship-shape to blaze away at any enemy shoulder-to-shoulder with her man.

Come with the wind

Craig Reynolds and Pat Wilder play hookey from camera, cast and crew for a canoeing lark.

Craig has some ideas of his own and maybe he's not doing so badly, after all! We'll see.

Pat and Craig take off for Romanceland—and a hot dog with Java

She's no Johnny Weissmuller, so Pat steps charily as Craig hangs onto her for dear life.

Quick, Emily Post! What does a guy do in a case like this? The purp's no help a-tall.

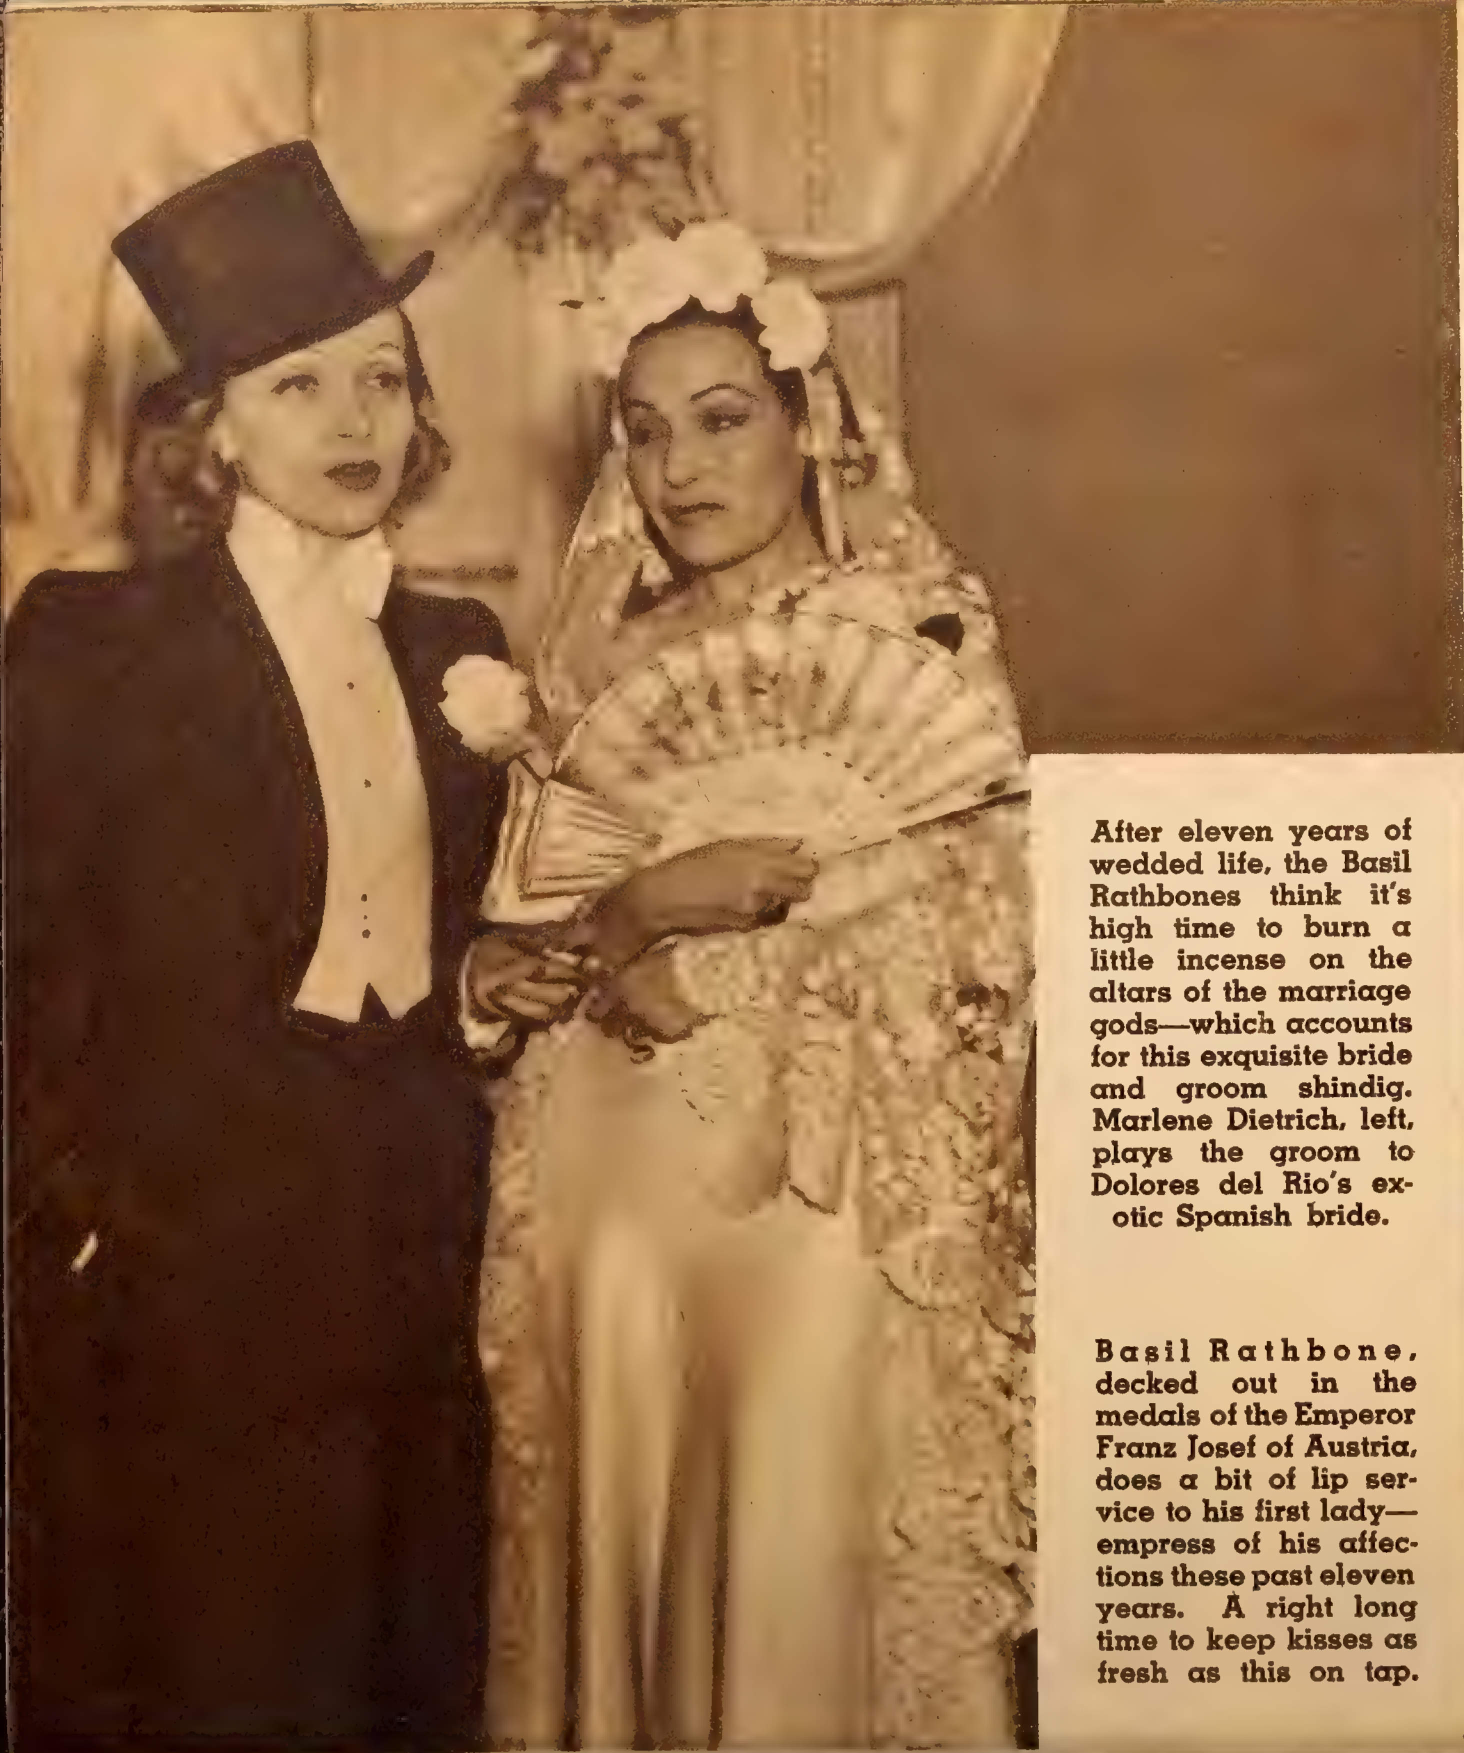
That ole dabbil diet plays second fiddle when weenies and cawfee are the theme.

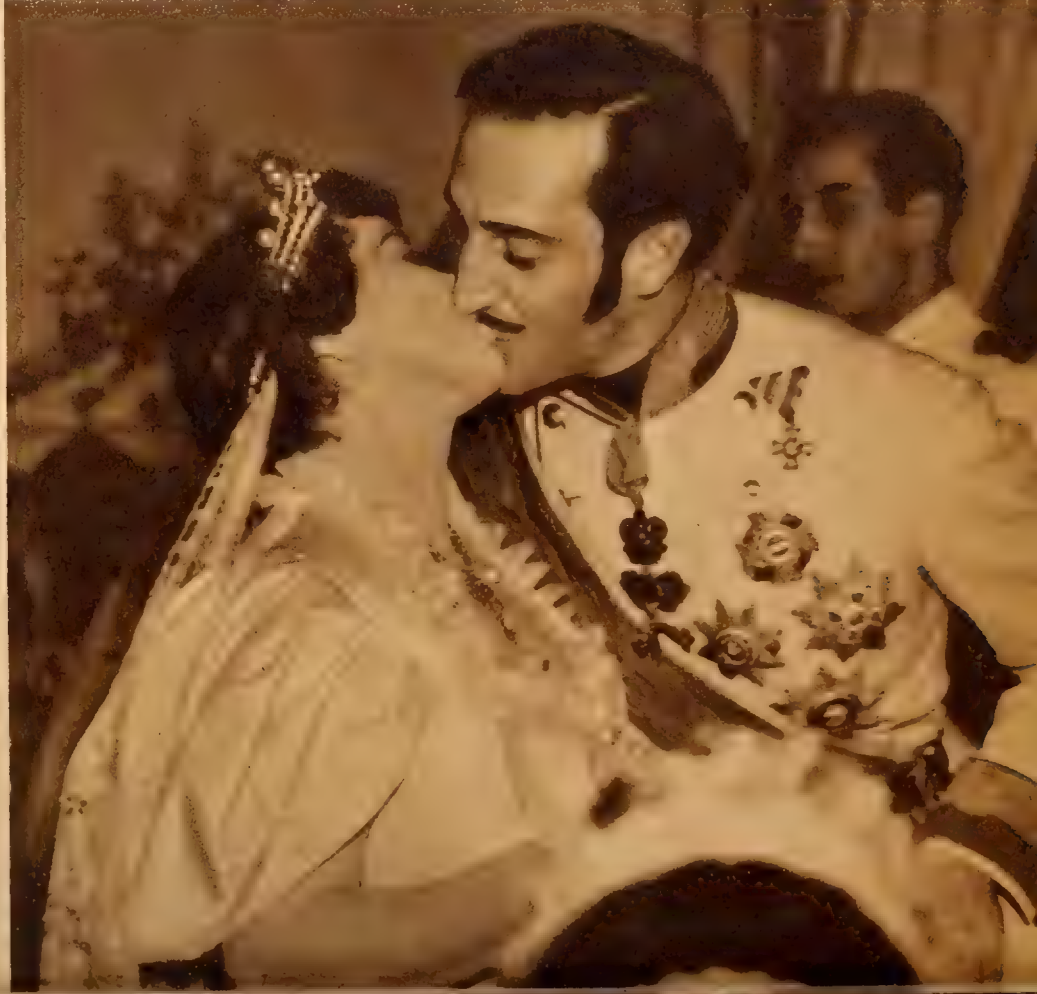
"Mister and Missus" Masquerade

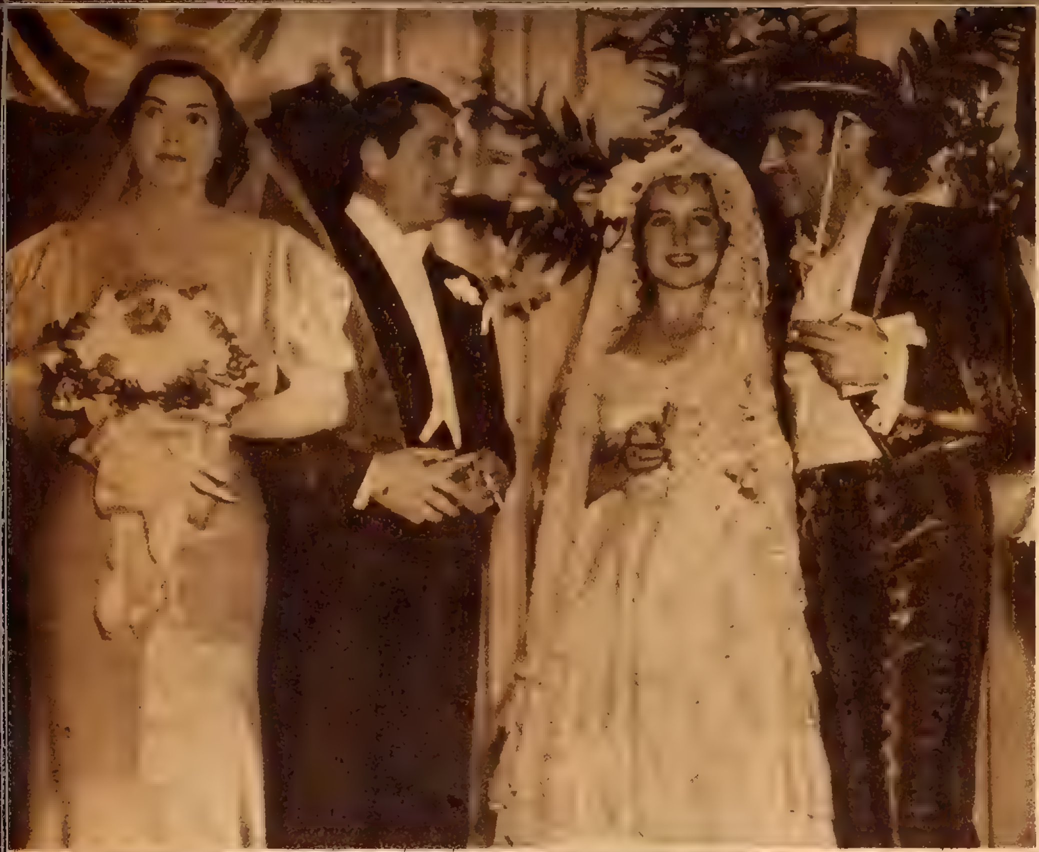
The Basil Rathbones Entertain

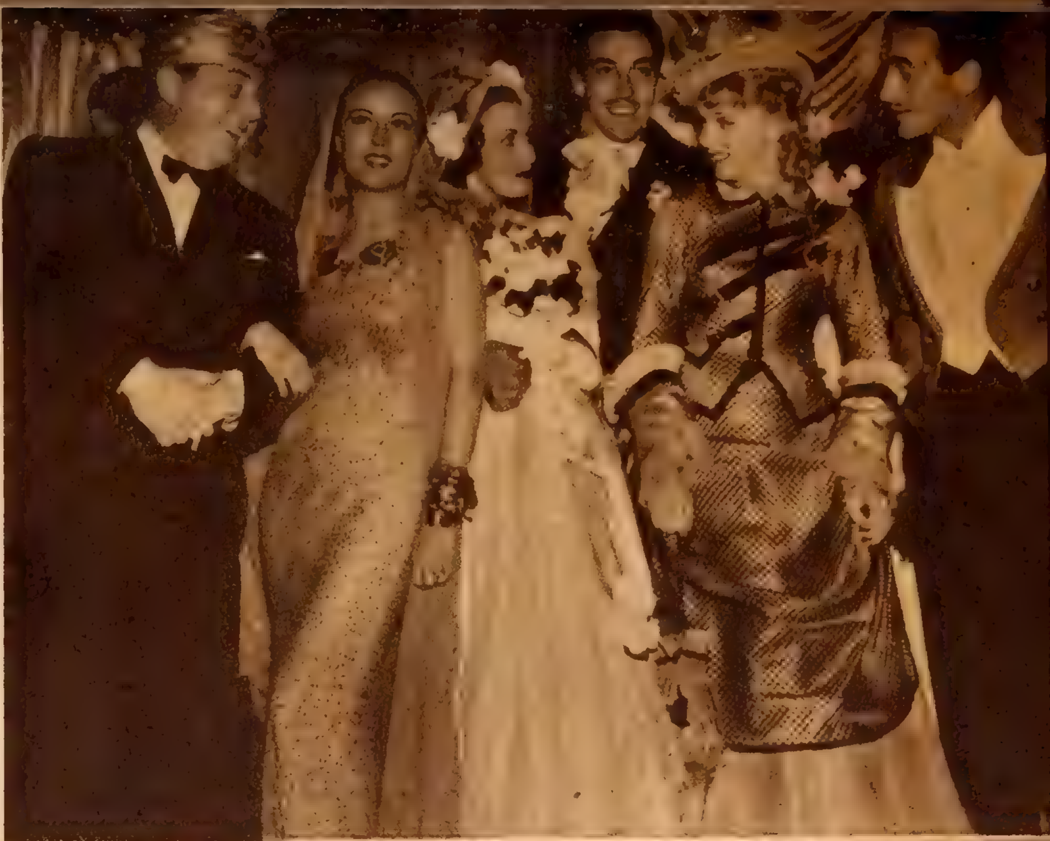


After eleven years of wedded life, the Basil Rathbones think it's high time to burn a little incense on the altars of the marriage gods—which accounts for this exquisite bride and groom shindig. Marlene Dietrich, left, plays the groom to Dolores del Rio's exotic Spanish bride.

Basil Rathbone, decked out in the medals of the Emperor Franz Josef of Austria, does a bit of lip service to his first lady—empress of his affections these past eleven years. A right long time to keep kisses as fresh as this on tap.

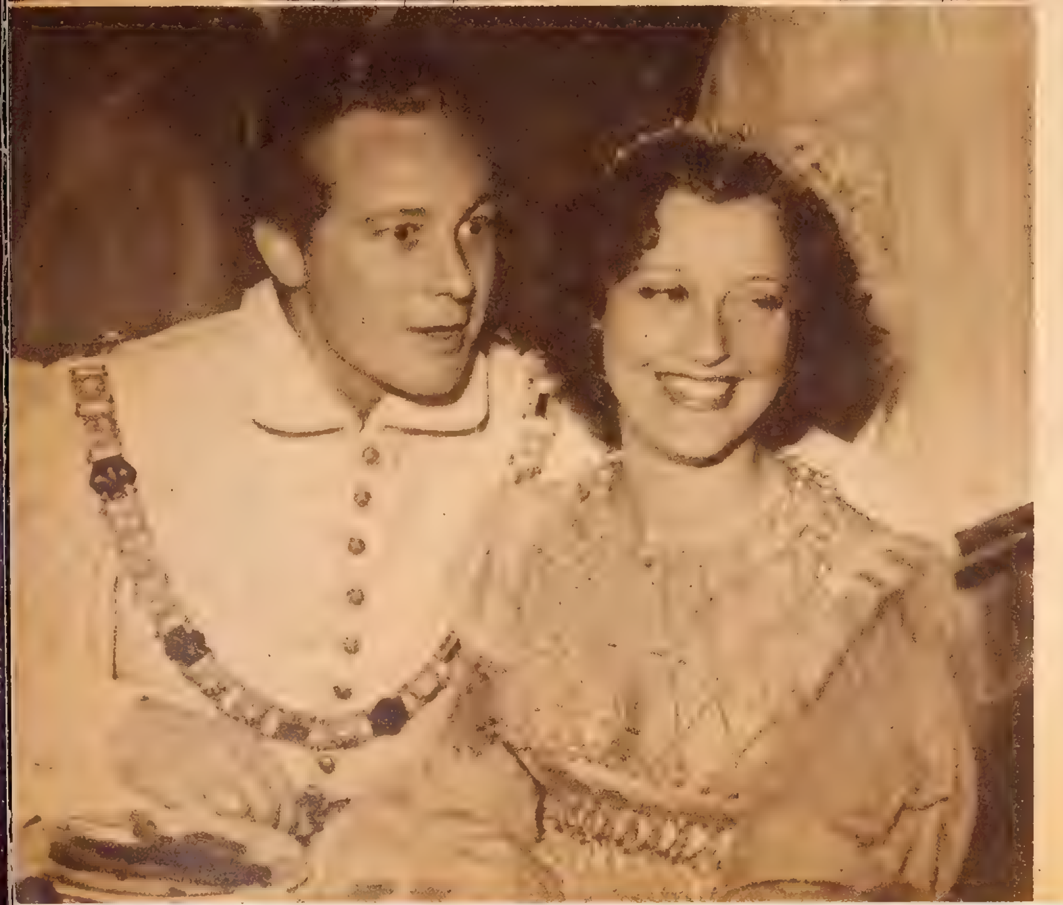


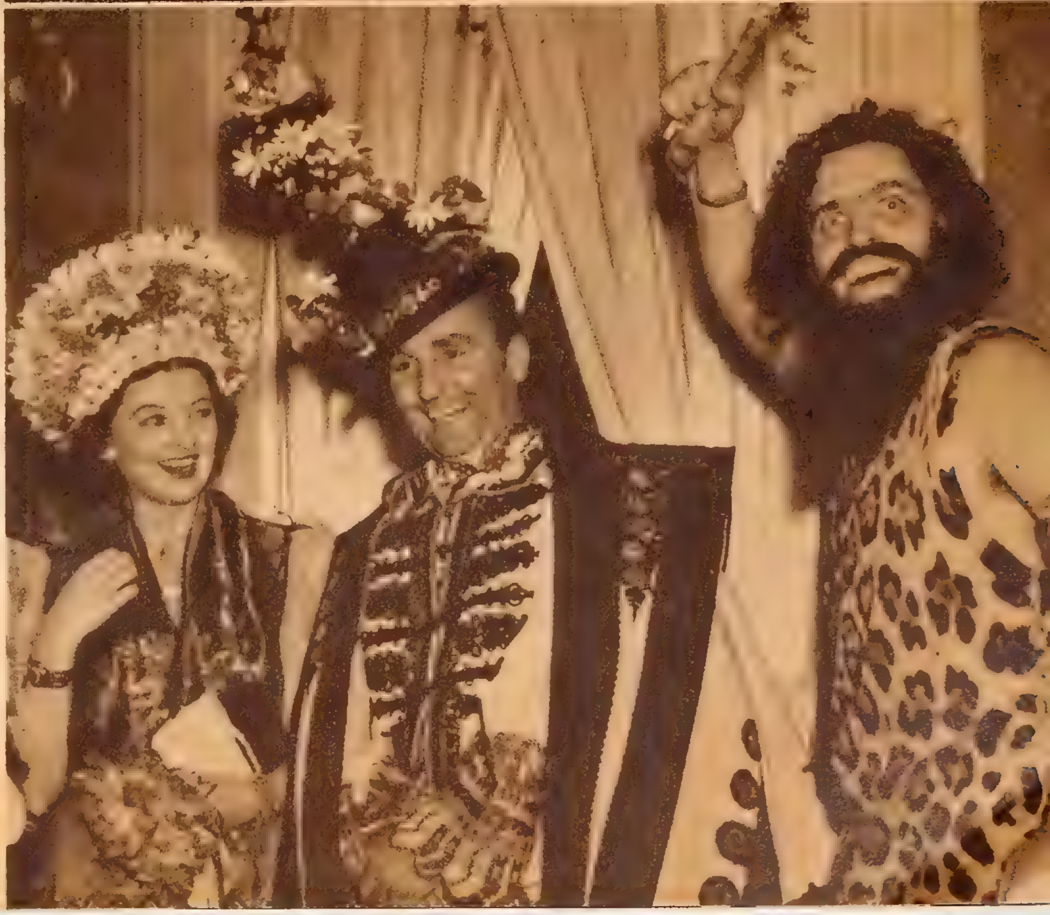




Says Charles Boyer to Mr. Baxter, left: "Ze señor is jesting? Thees reediculous costume!" Warner smiles sagely. He doesn't dare speak his mind about the Boyer get-up. Meanwhile, the brides, getting in the mood to love, honor, and obey, say nothing.

Maybe the turban doesn't make Lewis Milestone anything, but at least it "makes" Fay Wray. Don't look now, Lew, but that's your Missus in the white dress. Cesar Romero and David Niven haven't yet settled who's to wed the pert Scotch. lass, Virginia Bruce.





Nothing superstitious about Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond. They're masquerading as Romeo and Juliet—and everyone knows what happened to that unfortunate pair. But J. and G. are too busy with love to spare time for such trifles.

Just a couple of Tyrolese hill-billies are Myrna Loy, right, and Arthur Hornblow, but they know enough not to be alarmed by Freddie March's King-Kong ensemble. On the level, Fred, are you sporting a white tie under the beaver?

By Leo Townsend

They glamorize everything in Hollywood. The average discovery, for instance, is brought here, and the first thing she gets is a going-over treatment. They give her the works and when she comes out looking like everybody else, she's ready to go before the photographers to have her glamor recorded for the world. But the all-time high was reached by one studio a few weeks ago. They took a portrait sitting of Wafford, the pig.

The most popular gal in Culver City is Jean Harlow, and we'll fight the man who says she isn't, provided the weights are right. Day after she went to the hospital to have three wisdom teeth removed, the florist across the street from her home lot reported he dispatched an entire truckload of flowers to her. The floral donations were from studio pals—of which, as they say, Miss H. has more than anybody.

Flash: Jimmy Stewart retains his title of champion beau of Hollywood. The lanky Mr. S., long a favorite of the town's lovelier sex, definitely established his position last month when he was wined and dined by the models appearing in Walter Wanger's "Vogues of 1938." A round dozen of the gals—a very round dozen of them—cooked the dinner, with Jimmy as guest of honor. P. S. The champ ate a hearty meal.

At the Clover Club the other night, Lupe Velez dumped forty dollars in quarters in a slot machine, with no results. She went away for some change, and on the way back another gal stepped up to the machine, inserted a lone quarter and hit the jackpot. Lupe smacked the gal, but she immediately apologized. Probably thought she ought to hit something, after spending forty bucks.

A few days after the candid camera craze had set in in Hollywood, we donned our Inquiring Reporter costume and went about getting a few reactions. Bette Davis, we discovered, is fond of candid camera shots. She thinks they're cute. John Carradine is a candid fiend. He slinks along Hollywood Boulevard shooting facial expressions of unsuspecting strangers, hoping eventually to use them in screen characterizations. Clark Gable, on the other hand, isn't so sure. "They used to photograph our teeth," he says, "and now they take our tonsils."

Watched Marlene Dietrich on the set of "Angel" recently. Watching Dietrich this time was more fun than usual, for with

Summertime finds Hollywood hard at work and play, with our

Bette Davis and Hubby "Ham" Nelson celebrate four years of marriage by dining out together.

Ernst Lubitsch directing, the reign of silence on her sets is over. Everybody relaxes and pretends that Miss Dietrich is just another ordinary mortal. Even Marlene seems to be pretending. Lubitsch rehearses a scene with Dietrich, Herbert Marshall and Melvyn Douglas. While Lubitsch reads their parts, Marlene grabs a cigarette and lights it. Imagine—the most beautiful woman in the world, and she has to light her own cigarettes.

Jimmy Stewart is the happiest guy in town at the moment. Reason is that he's making "Vivacious Lady" with Ginger Rogers, his best gal. Those twelve "Vogues of 1938" models were a mere passing fancy; he's not going to marry them, even though they can cook. So now Jimmy spends his days emoting with Ginger and when evening comes he throws away the script and does his emoting on his own.

It's nice to be famous, but it isn't always fun. Take Clark Gable and Carole Lombard, for instance. For three Sundays in a row they took themselves out to a rodeo in San Fernando Valley and had a wonderful time. Then something happened; people heard about it, and the fourth Sunday found the place jammed with visitors. There wasn't a rodeo lover among them—they all came to see Lombard and Gable. So now Clark and Carole spend their Sundays at home.

They gave away another medal the other night. This time the award was sponsored by the newspaper critics of the country, and the recipients were, as usual, Paul Muni and Luise Rainer. The critical gentry held a banquet, and Producer Harry Cohn read a gracious presentation speech, but when it came time to hand Muni his medal no one could find it. After a few faces reddened Muni himself pulled the medal out of his pocket. "I took it before the banquet started," he said. "Thought it might save a few speeches."

It happened during the making of "Shall We Dance?" Fred Astaire, on roller skates, was posing for a series of pictures in the portrait gallery. He went through a number of intricate poses, balancing precariously on one wheel and then another. Winding up the series with an extra fancy pose, our hero skated off, and fell flat on his face.

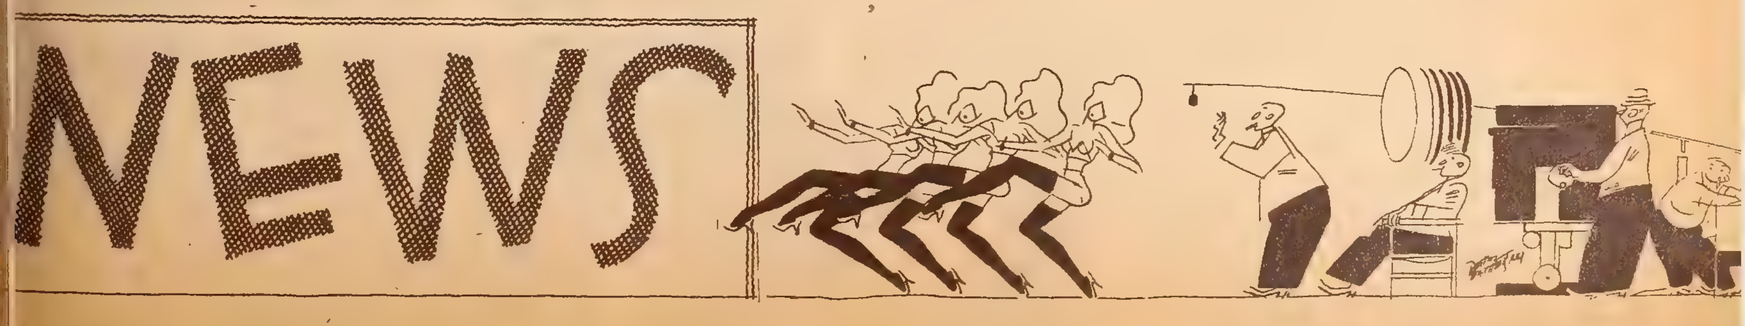
Private life of an Academy Award Winner: A few days ago Luise Rainer's secretary strolled into one of the publicity offices at the studio and asked for copies of all the current movie magazines. The young lady in the office, who had no extra copies, informed the secretary she could get them all on the corner newsstand. "But," said the gal, "Miss Rainer wants them free."

sleuth reporter right in the thick of the hottest happenings



The big news about Mae West at the moment is that last month she held up a bank. Our Mae held the bank up for an hour after closing time, and all she had to do was phone in and tell the boys she was coming up to see them. It seems Mae is one of the bank's most solvent patrons, so the entire staff waited until four o'clock, when Mae swished in accompanied by five ominous looking gentlemen who couldn't have been anything but bodyguards.

When they finished "Shall We Dance?" Gertrude Wellman, who has been script girl on all the Astaire-Rogers pictures, complained that her job was wearing her down. Typing gave her a headache, she said. Two days later Gertrude was around the lot showing off a new charm bracelet with two solid gold charms—a typewriter and a pill-box with two aspirin tablets. Miss W. would like it known that the gift was from Ginger Rogers, the working girl's friend.

Leslie Howard and Robert Arnold beau Anita Louise.

An automobile concern still thinks the Marx Brothers are the goofiest trio in pictures. Harpo, Groucho and Chico signed testimonials for the firm, and each received a brand-new car. Next day they were called to the studio to pose for advertising pictures and all three of them showed up in elaborate sedans, much higher priced than the car for which they had given their signed approval. It seems all three of them had traded in their free cars for the ultra-ultra brand.

His studio won't admit it, but the swell singing voice purported to be Jack Haley's in "Wake Up and Live" isn't really his. Jack sings, but his own voice is pitched higher than the crooning tones heard in the picture. In Palm Springs the day after the picture's preview, with the trade-paper reviewers raving over the Haley "voice," we overheard a lengthy conversation between Jack and his agent. It seems they wanted Jack to appear in a radio version of the picture. "I'll do it," wailed Jack, "but I can't sing."

Questions without Answers: What prominent male star, playing opposite a glamor girl several years his senior, is telling friends they're thinking of changing the title of their picture to "Boy Meets Grandmother"? Don't all talk at once, boys and girls!

And out at Hal Roach studios they're actually talking about the new Constance Bennett. The old one, it seems, has been traded in on a brand-new model, equipped with all the latest improvements, including smiles for the press and a fine cloak of graciousness. You'd never recognize the once-haughty Miss B., surrounded by the Our Gang moppets, but we saw her actually surrounded by them, and everyone seemed pretty happy about it. The Bennett favorite is freckle-faced Alfalfa Sweitzer, who is a constant visitor in her dressing room and who hopes one day to make her Mrs. Sweitzer.

Martha Raye vigorously denies that she's gone elegant since the money started rolling in. The story was around that she closed the set of "Mountain Music" to visitors. Martha's reason, she says, was that she was being tossed around in an adagio dance scene and she didn't want a lot of people watching her land on her anatomy. Touches of elegance, though, are reflected in a new town car, a chauffeur, and six fur coats.

SPAGHETTI

HOT WEATHER HINT!

Serve Delicious, Nourishing Franco-American Spaghetti

Ready in a jiffy...costs less than 3¢ a portion

YOU can make your kitchen-work much easier this summer. Several times a week give your family delicious Franco-American Spaghetti. They'll love it! It's simply packed with nourishment—good for children and grown-ups, too, and it is the greatest little work-saver you ever saw. All you need to do is just heat it, and it's ready to eat.

Sometimes serve Franco-American Spaghetti as a main dish. It makes a complete meal with perhaps a fresh green salad, milk, and a fruit dessert. Other times, use Franco-American Spaghetti to make your left-over meats into savory, delicious meals.

Please do not confuse Franco-American Spaghetti with ordinary ready-cooked spaghetti. Franco-American is entirely different. That marvelous cheddar cheese and tomato sauce, with its eleven delicious ingredients, makes Franco-American what it is—a tasty, delicious dish, with a flavor all its own.

Franco-American is a real help to the budget, too. A can usually costs ten cents, so Franco-American costs less than 3 cents a portion. Why not give yourself a break this summer, and give your family a treat, too?

"True," she continued, "a hostess with a long list of dinners that must be reciprocated and people who should be invited to the house, can dispose of many obligations in one social swoop by throwing a Buffet Supper, no matter how limited her facilities may be. I'll go even further and admit that they're generally jolly and friendly parties, too, because the very situation does away with all formality. But I still prefer to sit down comfortably at a charmingly set dinner table. And I'm sure if the matter were put to a vote the 'Ayes' would have it my way."

Then Jeanette went on to explain that she wouldn't for the world wish to sacrifice any of the air of happy informality "just because you're seated at your ease in the dining room instead of eating from the living-room mantel like a bad boy, or precariously holding your plate on one terror-stiffened knee or leaving rings on the shiny case of the grand piano!"

Jeanette has found a way to get around all this by giving the kind of Sit-Down Suppers we were just discussing. For these a limit of six is generally set for the participants, but no limit is placed on the pleasure given by these delightful informal feasts.

YOU, doubtless, will enjoy playing "Follow the Leader" with such a charming guide to show you the way. So here you have Jeanette's favorite supper menu as well as some of her prize recipes, a promise of still more recipes in the leaflet and a detailed description of how to plan and carry out just such a party as she recommends giving. One particularly nice feature of these Sit-Down Suppers is that they solve the problem of entertaining without a servant about as well as any way I've ever heard of.

Let's start off then with one of Jeanette's favorite menus. Then you can visualize the dinner better as we go about serving it.

(By the way the dishes followed by an asterisk are those which you'll find in this month's leaflet.)

MacDONALD MENU FOR A SIT-DOWN SUPPER

Hors d'Oeuvres and Canapés
Casserole of Sea Food, Catalina *
Baked Tomatoes en Surprise *
Mixed Salad Bowl
Home-made Bran Bread*
Crustless Apple Pie *
Demi-tasse

The first course is served in the living room, and what a charming room Jeanette's is with its Colonial furnishings and subdued coloring in autumn shades.

Here trays of assorted Hors d'Oeuvres and Canapés are passed with the cocktails. However, as Miss MacDonald herself does not care for alcoholic beverages she makes a point also of serving tomato juice cocktails for those who share her dislike for the other type. These are made with the usual popular tomato juice which is thoroughly chilled and highly seasoned with salt, pepper, lemon juice, Worcestershire sauce and a few drops of onion juice. The dainty little morsels of food that accompany the drinks are all of the type that can be eaten gracefully with the fingers, for remember, Jeanette is convinced that plates are even harder to balance than the national budget. Gay colored toothpicks and amusing, feathered "cocktail picks" stuck into holders made especially for that purpose, impale some of the tiny treats, while rounded toast, salted crackers and special canapé crackers supply a variety of bases for the spreads. At the end of this article I shall give you several suggestions for first course foods of this type. Just now I want to move on into the dining room where the dinner itself awaits the guests.

Before doing so I'd like to point out to you that the hostess who has no maid can be getting the next course onto the table while the guests are enjoying the initial food offering in the living room. However, in order to be sure that all is going well during her necessary absence, the hostess should delegate to the host or some close woman friend the job of keeping the first course food in circulation. Jeanette's mother acts in this capacity for her, since even though there are plenty of servants, the young hostess likes to step into the dining room in advance of her guests to see that everything is ship-shape, and to light the tall candles which give such a flattering glow to the complexions of the ladies present.

The Sit-Down Supper is now on the table. And here lies the greatest charm of such a feast; it is served family style. That is, everything is placed on the table to be passed by those sitting around it. If there is a maid her sole duty then, during this course, would be to see that the water glasses are filled. In the maidless home even this can be taken care of by placing a water pitcher on the table and the hostess can thus be at her ease without having to jump up constantly.

THE main course menu for such a repast must not be too complicated, naturally. Another glance at Miss MacDonald's supper suggestions will give you an idea of what I mean. Here, for instance, you have a Casserole which gives you your main dish, a rich, creamy gravy and a flaky pastry-topping all in one. Sea food is the main ingredient of this prize concoction. Fortunately for the inland residents who read this, the fish recommended by Miss MacDonald are all of the sort that can be bought in cans or bottles. You'll like the combination of shrimp, salmon and lobster, I know, for it is colorful, unusual, tasty and, better still, far more economical than would be lobster alone. The recipe card also tells you how to make the pastry, which, cut into individual servings before being baked, gives this Casserole added distinction.

Accompanying this dish and also served by the hostess, are Tomatoes en Surprise. These are filled, baked and served in a way which is really as surprising as their name indicates. The addition of a home-made bread to the menu, in this case Bran Bread, is a delightful idea, one which I hope you'll be ambitious enough to try, too. I particularly like the recipe you'll find in the leaflet and I don't imagine you'll think it a bit hard to follow. How people do fall for home-made bread and what a reputation as a first-class cook you'll gain by being able to make it! So here's your chance.

The Mixed Salad Bowl which decorates the other end of the table should contain, according to Jeanette, plenty of lettuce—endive, watercress; raw vegetables, such as cabbage, grated carrots, chopped celery, sliced radishes and wafer-thin slices of cauliflower. Add to this thin Julienne

"TO GO OVER BIG—GO LUXABLE"

says Bette Davis

Bette has everything it takes! A gay sense of humor. Down-to-earth naturalness. A fetish for freshness. Her washables (she adores them) always look ravishing. (They're babied with gentle Lux care.) With Luxables it's easy to have that lettuce-crisp look all summer long.

Don't miss Bette in her newest role as the Star of Warner Brothers'
"KID GALAHAD"

Tailored linen with bright piqué bandings is Bette's choice for a charming Luxable evening dress. She'd never let its color and texture be spoiled by cake-soap rubbing or harsh soaps containing harmful alkali. Lux has no harmful alkali.

She gives you some Valuable Tips about the Clothes Men Like . . .

Men fall for meticulous freshness . . . sports things clean-cut as skimming sailboats . . . sweaters fluffy as a kitten . . . romantic Luxable frills . . .

"Fastidious girls wear things they can whisk through Lux each time they wear them," emphasizes Bette Davis.

In Hollywood, not only personal wardrobes, but glamorous screen costumes are constantly Luxed. "They come out so perfectly, you can't even tell when they've been Luxed in the course of a picture," says N'Was McKenzie, wardrobe director of the Warner Brothers lot.

You, too, will find that the Lux habit pays. Cleaning bills are lower, colors look fresher, fabrics last longer! Anything safe in water is safe in Lux!

WHAT? NO MENNEN OIL RUB TODAY-

—then what's to keep my skin SAFE from germs?

"What's the big idea, Mommy? You're not going to take a day off from rubbing me with Mennen Antiseptic Oil, are you? Not if I can help it! Germs don't take any days off, do they? They keep getting on my skin all the time. That's why the nurse over at the hospital told you to rub me with Mennen Antiseptic Oil every single day. Doctor says it kills germs . . . and leaves a film of protection all over the skin. He says every baby needs this protection and I'm certainly no exception! Oh, you were going to give me my Mennen Antiseptic Oil rub anyhow? Why didn't you say so—hurry up, I need it—NOW! I want to sleep in peace and safety."

Nine-tenths of all the hospitals important in maternity work use Mennen Antiseptic Oil on their babies every day. Your baby deserves it, too!

MENNEN Antiseptic OIL

Most hospitals rub their babies with it daily shreds of ham, chicken or swiss cheese.

"The dressing for this," Miss MacDonald explained, "is made of olive oil, lemon juice, salt, white pepper and a little onion juice or a suggestion of garlic; just a whiff, you understand, without which no salad abroad or in my home is considered complete."

So much for the main course, and now we come to a real MacDonald triumph. It's called Crustless Apple Pie, a name which doesn't begin to do it justice. This wasn't the first time I had heard of pies that had neither top nor bottom crust, but I never before had gotten hold of a good recipe to try out myself before passing it on for your approval. Well, gals, that situation is now a thing of the past, for this particular recipe of Jeanette's is a peach. The pie comes out of the oven with a caramelized top that beats any pie crust I ever tasted. It can be served hot or cold, with cream or without, and if that doesn't make you want to try it yourself, either you have no imagination or no appetite. I don't list skill as a requirement for true appreciation of this dessert because even the world's most hesitant cook need have no fear with this recipe. As for the brides, here's their chance to shine as chefs.

Dinner over, coffee is served in the livingroom with Jeanette presiding at the low coffee table. This always is followed by games for which everyone feels in fine fettle after their excellent, not-too-heavy meal.

Try it yourself sometime real soon. The recipes are ready to be sent out to all those requesting them. And by the time you start preparing them in your own home, the new bride who has shared some of her cooking secrets with you here will be serving similar Sit-Down Suppers to groups of friends who will be dropping in to wish Jeanette and Gene "Long life and happiness"—as do we.

Hors d'Oeuvres Suggestions

Crisp potato chips topped with a dab of softened Roquefort cheese; tiny cocktail sausages and frankfurters on "picks"; olives wrapped in bacon and broiled radish roses, celery, curls, carrot strips; pickled onions and tiny green pickles; wafer-thin slices of dried beef wrapped around asparagus tips or filled with cream cheese, then rolled and skewered with a toothpick, etc.

Canapé Suggestions

Cut bread into many shapes, the more the merrier. Use cooky cutters, a sharp knife, and take especial pains, gals, for they must not be too large. Bread may then be toasted on one side, on both sides, or it can be sauted in oil or butter, or fried in deep fat. Try 'em all, each gives a different texture. Spread these prepared pieces of bread with pâté-de-foie-gras or any of the various prepared cheese or fish spreads that are now sold in such variety.

Other favorite canapé toppings are salmon, caviar, anchovies, parsley butter, sliced or minced cucumbers, flaked crabmeat and so on. Garnishes, which add immeasurably to their appearance include such things as riced eggs, yolk or white; chopped chives, onions or parsley; paprika; watercress; sliced stuffed olives, pickles, radishes and hard-cooked eggs; circles and stars of pimiento and curlicues of cheese forced through a decorating tube after being softened to the right consistency, with mayonnaise or cream added. With these suggestions to start off with and Jeanette's favorite dishes to follow, the success of your Sit-Down Supper is virtually assured!

Gaynor, who was also vacationing in town with her mother, was on the phone. Men friends called wanting to take her to plays, night clubs.

"But I'm leaving first thing tomorrow," she said when she returned the fourth or fifth time, "and I've seen just about everything. I've been to every night club and every restaurant in town. I've been in a Long Island blizzard. I've been to Virginia. I've even been to the zoo.

"Do you know what I'm going to do when I'm back working? Take a nice long vacation. I mean a restful one. Go to bed every night at seven. Not see anybody, or do anything after hours. Vacations are grand, especially when you only get one in four years, but—"

This time it was the doorbell.

"M'gosh!" exclaimed Margaret as she dashed away. "This is going to be hectic!" Her voice from the hall called back, "I've got some sparkling water here. How about a Scotch Valentine?"

"Swell," I returned.

"Let's make this a sparkling interview," she laughed.

"Sparkle away," I laughed back.

"I don't know how to," she said soberly, putting her glass down on the coffee table. "I mean, I'm not the kind of a girl who can pour out her love life while munching a sandwich with you in the studio commissary. I'm a girl with a lot of inhibitions.

"I tell you what," Margaret went on, her eyes facetious, "I'll ask a few questions myself. And answer them, too.

"Have you been to the Trocadero lately, Miss Lindsay?" asked Margaret. "And whom did you get yourself engaged to the last time you were there? You say you weren't there? Your picture was in the papers? It must have been your double? You say you're not married to Pat De Cicco, not even engaged to him anymore? That that was all washed up long ago? But I read about it in one of the columns. It said you were married. And a columnist's never wrong. You say that's what he says? What do you think about Hollywood? You don't think about it; you just live there!

"Seriously," said Margaret coming out of her ventriloquist act, "my kid sister wants to crash the movies. She writes me about it at least five times a week. I'd like to advise her on how to go about it. But I don't know what the heck to tell her. Now, if there were stock companies around the country, I'd tell her to get into one of those first. It seems a shame they're out, don't you think? Where are actors and actresses going to get any real training? Maybe in WPA plays; I don't know where else."

"YOU ought to know," I retorted. "Wasn't it Margaret Kies of Dubuque, Iowa, who passed herself off as an English actress named Margaret Lindsay, and landed in Hollywood in the 'all-English' cast of 'Cavalcade'? Didn't Margaret Lindsay tell an actor-friend of hers to pose as a Britisher, too, and land a nice fat contract?"

"Oh, you mean Robert Cummings," laughed Margaret. "Well, I'll tell you about that. I met him on the street one day. Robert was terribly blue. Just couldn't get a tumble from Broadway or Hollywood. Just another American actor without portfolio. I did tell him to go to England and pick up an accent as I'd done. I knew producers could always spot talent when it was farther away—especially talent with an accent. But I didn't think up that one. A smart press-agent told me about it in the first place."

"You worked it though."

"Yes, and so did Robert. I'm glad, for he's a grand guy. But I don't think it would work for my kid sister. The producers are all on to it now. The only way left to break in, I suppose, is to get a drag."

Margaret is a girl with a thousand faces; her expressions change with every shade of thought. Her movements are all quick, but never graceless. You know she learned about life from women—dignified, cultivated women—nuns and deans and dramatic teachers. Learned how to enter and leave a room. How to sit down and stand up. You know she brought her finishing-school manners and attitude toward the world right along with her to rough-and-ready Hollywood. They're as much a part of her as her fresh out-of-door complexion, her candid eyes and chic clothes. But you also know she picked up a few tricks elsewhere, that she's got what it takes to get along. She's got a chin, and she's going places with it!

Margaret was born in Dubuque, Iowa, on the Mississippi, and might be living there still if it hadn't been for that chin, plus her single-track mind.

THAT'S all I ever wanted to do—act," said Margaret. "I wonder if I ever will be as good as I used to dream I would be? I used to see myself on the New York stage. I never thought of Hollywood then. I never wanted to be a great tragedienne. I wanted to do comedy. So now I'm in Hollywood doing mystery yarns. Isn't that life?"

She paused a moment before going on, "I want to get married some day, but not while I'm in pictures. I don't think marriage and careers mix, though some girls mix 'em successfully. I wonder if I'll marry an actor. God forbid. Well, most of the really attractive actors are already married, so I suppose that lets them out, for I'm not a home-wrecker. When I marry, it's got to stick. And the man will be boss in my home.

"Now that I'm talking about likes and dislikes, here are some more. I hate picture premieres and parades of all kinds. I don't like pomp and ceremony and that's funny, for I adore the theatre and exotic places. I like the simple and clean-cut in clothes and people, and here again I'm contradicting myself, for I also like them to have that certain something else, savoir faire, zip. I love sitting under a hot sun at the beach. I love to play golf. I love night clubs and cocktail parties. I detest subways; they stifle me. Even when I travel on a train, I get out at every stop for a few moments.

"And speaking of traveling, I want that terrifically! How I'd love to start out on a freighter with my own crowd. Stop at places along the way that suited my fancy. Live among the people and really get to know them as I did in England, not just dash through countries with a Baedeker in one hand. But that'll have to wait. Meanwhile, I've bought a home in Honolulu. My 'Castle in Spain.' It's next to Janet Gaynor's. Janet and I are grand friends, and I think we knock into a cocked hat the fixed belief that girl stars can't be friends because they're jealous of each other professionally. That's the bunk.

"Well," said Margaret, "I didn't sparkle much. Not even on a Scotch Valentine. We'll try rye the next time."

BERT WHEELER once risked becoming permanently crippled, so that he might not lose his job. One night during a performance of "Ziegfeld's Follies," in which he was playing his first important stage role, he fell and broke his arm.

For a week he fumed in the hospital, until one day he heard the doctor tell Flo Ziegfeld not to keep Wheeler's job open for him, since it would be impossible for Bert to go back to work for six months.

"You've got to give your arm a chance to heal," the doctor told him.

That would have stopped almost anybody, but it didn't stop Bert.

Three days later, his arm still in a huge steel sling, he left the hospital. It was impossible for him to walk without someone walking in front of him and carrying the sling; and that was the way he walked into the Orthopedic Hospital in New York.

"I want to go back to work immediately," he told a specialist. The doctor warned Bert that since his arm was already set, it would be very painful and dangerous, but Bert insisted. The doctor broke the arm again, set it once more, and Bert went back to work that night.

That was the turning point in his career. From then on his stage work spurted steadily upward and led finally to an offer from the movies.

THERE are many players who have fought less spectacular but no less real menaces to their careers than broken arms and necks. Take that simple, sinister little thing, a drawl; it can ever so subtly draw a silken cord around the neck of the most promising career.

That was the problem which faced three young players, Frances Drake, Gail Patrick and Randolph Scott. They were told by their studios that they would never get anywhere as long as they spoke with an accent. Gail and Randolph were Southerners; Frances Drake came from northern England.

But they wouldn't be licked! Gail went to Phyllis Laughton, a dramatic coach, and studied earnestly. Scott persuaded Sir Guy Standing to give him voice instruction. Frances Drake took Claudette Colbert as her model. All of them beat "dat ole debbil" drawl and won out in pictures.

Self-consciousness ruins the careers of many girls in pictures, and Bette Davis once told me that when she first went into the movies she had a terrific inferiority complex.

"But I learned," she said, "that if anyone has an inferiority complex, the camera picks it up. Watching a picture, you can tell if the person who made it was embarrassed. On your first picture you're thinking, 'I hate my nose. I wish I could do something about it. Gosh, am I supposed to smile in this scene? I know I'll look as if I were simpering all over the screen.'

"I knew that I'd have to kid myself out of it. I'd get in front of the camera and tell myself, 'Go right ahead, Bette Davis. You're marvelous.' And gradually, assurance came to me."

If Bing Crosby hadn't been the sort who wouldn't take "no" for an answer, he wouldn't be a movie star today. For Bing Crosby was thrown out of the office of the first studio he ever worked for.

In those days, before he had achieved any real recognition, he was singing in a Los Angeles hotel, where Ray McCarey, a young director, discovered him. He persuaded Bing to make a picture with him at an independent studio. Unfortunately, the picture was nothing but a "quickie," made on an economy basis; the lighting, directing and acting were all bad.

When the picture was completed, the producer summoned both McCarey and Crosby into his office. He had a reel of the film on his desk.

"This picture is impossible," he yelled. "Whoever told you this young man was an actor? Or a singer? You're both fired."

When Bing walked out of that office, he felt like crawling in shame. He was afraid that he might meet some of his friends and that they might ask him what had become of his great screen opportunity.

Certainly it was Crosby's courage more than his ability that enabled him to succeed after this blow to his pride. He realized that the producer was partly right and that he could never hope to succeed until he had improved himself both as a singer and actor. And he labored ceaselessly to accomplish just that.

PERHAPS the hardest of all things to face is ridicule.

Before George Raft came to Hollywood, he had done many things in his adventurous career. At one time he was a prize fighter, and during a fight, the cartilage in one of his ears had been broken, affecting his good looks. When Raft began to be famous, people laughed at the disfigured ear. Leading men didn't have ears like that, they said.

Instead of departing from the town which mocked him, Raft faced the ridicule. He consulted the best surgeon he could find, had an operation performed and returned to his career.

Then there is Jeanette MacDonald. When Jeanette was singled out by the great Herr Lubitsch for an important role in "The Love Parade," Jeanette played the role beautifully. She had every reason to believe that she was a success in it. Hadn't the director himself praised her in front of all the company?

The day after the picture opened in New York, she picked up the newspapers to read the reviews. The first one that she read said that the picture was an amusing comedy, but unfortunately the prima donna ruined it. "She has buck teeth, a scrawny neck, and looks simply terrible," jibed the critic.

At first Jeanette was furious. Buck teeth indeed! Jeanette has gorgeous, evenly spaced teeth.

But instead of running home humiliated, she went to see the picture again. And she saw what the critic had meant. In the picture she really looked as if she had buck teeth. Undoubtedly, this must have been caused by some mistake in her make-up. She went to see the cameraman and the make-up man, and begged them to devise some make-up which wouldn't give that horrible effect in the future. They did.

The next time she was in New York, the first person she looked up was that particular critic. Sitting back in his seat, he waited for an explosion.

"I want to thank you," were the first words Jeanette said. "If you hadn't told the world that I had buck teeth, I would never have discovered the fault in my make-up that caused my pictures to look that way, and I might have gone on forever, making the same mistake."

Even children in Hollywood have to learn how to "take it." There's Jane Withers. At one time, when Jane was scheduled to make personal appearances in Chicago, she ate something that disagreed with her and became quite ill. Her mother then volunteered to go to the manager of the theatre and explain to him that Jane was not feeling well and would not be able to make her scheduled appearance that night.

Jane was shocked by the suggestion. "Oh, no, Mother," she said. "We couldn't do that. I have to go on. I promised."

Yes, it takes personality and talent to become a Hollywood star. But to stay on top of the heap takes something else again—courage, then more courage.

tragedy episode who was clever enough to be really feminine, stands out as the most interesting girl he knew in his high-school days. But there were others to come.

INSTEAD of going to college, Tyrone began an acting career by trouping with his father's illustrious Shakespearian group. Then he came to Hollywood, joined a stock company one of the studios was then experimenting with. Here he was thrown in with a young struggling Hollywood crowd and was for the time being wrapt up in seeking opportunity.

He lived in tiny apartments. He had no automobile, and every cent went for actual expenses and clothes he needed to make a decent appearance. Once in awhile he would double-date with some of the other aspirants, go to a movie, for a drive to the beach, have a fleeting evening of casual fun. But resolutely, I remember, he tempered himself.

He got nowhere by avoiding kisses. The noble experiment was a frost. So Tyrone packed his suitcase and went to Santa Barbara to try acting with the community players.

It was there he met the second girl who mattered to him. She was the debutante daughter of well-to-do people in the plays at the Lobero Theatre. She dressed strikingly and Tyrone inevitably notices a woman's flair. She was all gay exuberance.

In high school he had worshiped at a shrine, almost. Here was a different sort of girl, a girl who subtly teased him into enjoying the moment. She had a dashing roadster and she frequently invited Tyrone for week-ends on her family's ranch. His spirits rose. For a year he was in one show after another. But he had to go on, he couldn't settle down to a frivolous society whirl.

When he signed a movie contract he was sure he wouldn't seek another romance. At the studio he met Alice Faye and they went around for a month or so. It was just friendship. His meeting with Sonja Henie did lead to something, however.

"I'd only vaguely heard of Sonja," he confesses. "She was giving her Los Angeles skating exhibition and was lunching at the studio. I no sooner looked down into her merry blue eyes than I was—er, impressed!

"She said, 'You are coming to see me tonight?' Not having planned to, I replied, 'I haven't been able to get a seat.' Sonja twinkled. She reached into her purse. 'Here are two tickets, and you must come back during intermission and say hello and to my house afterwards for a little party I am giving!'"

TYRONE had made an immediate impression upon the little Norwegian marvel. Sonja is only in her early twenties, as he is. But she has been feted by Europe.

As keen to success in Hollywood as she was to capture all the skating trophies, the bond which links these two is their sky-rocketing simultaneously and their great wish to be accomplished as actors. At Sonja's spectacular all-white house that night after her tremendous acclaim for her skating, her attention was all on Tyrone. She wasn't glad that he'd invited a girl to go to her performance. Not at all. Tyrone still doesn't catch on. "Why did she give me two tickets then?" he wonders, reverting to naïvete. Sonja expected he'd throw one away and come alone!

She is accustomed to luxuries and he can't afford them. She spins around town in a big, all-white, streamlined motor, with red-leather upholstery. She will build a huge colonial home. Her picture salary is right at the very top, and whenever she skates she reaps thousands of dollars.

But Tyrone, who appreciates niceties, has had to skimp. And as soon as he was handed a raise he prudently mapped out a budget. His Uncle Frank, who isn't his uncle at all but a wise friend who's been the family lawyer for years, is investing for him so in the tomorrows there'll be interest coming in to live on. The one extravagance Tyrone's indulged in is a snappy roadster.

He was assigned that lead in "Lloyds" just as Sonja made her picture debut. After the cold mountains in which she grew up, the eternal sunshine of Hollywood is a brand-new treat for her. Tyrone has eagerly shown her California's charms. They swim and bicycle—her father was the fastest bicycle rider in the world—and most often they go dancing.

Sonja studied dancing between the ages of four and twenty; so she shines at the Trocadero and the Cocoanut Grove. But she doesn't want him to spend money on her. The evening of the day I was at Tyrone's last they were going to the movies.

They have so much in common besides their work. Both had Irish grandfathers, and both have inherited the quick wit of the Emerald Island. Both are impetuous, relying on hunches, and they have to control this impulsiveness. Tyrone has a stalwart appetite, and Sonja's daily workouts to remain in perfect trim keep her from having to diet. "I always seem to fall for hungry girls," he laughs.

Sonja has been most assiduously chaperoned, and it is only now, in Hollywood, that she is experiencing American girls' independence. But Sonja has sensed that Tyrone doesn't especially care for overly-athletic women, so though she has broken more sport records than any other man or woman in athletic history she artfully ignores that side of herself when she is with him.

She has become, naturally, grace personified. Yet she is sweetly feminine—except when she's a trifle imperious. Yes, Sonja is imperious at times and that merely captivates Tyrone all the more. He couldn't be attracted to a woman with no fire.

"I AM sure marriage is still the right thing," he has said to me emphatically. "I want to avoid the blunders which break up couples who start off so happily. For one thing, I do not believe in separations. Then I think, too, that a husband has to strive just as hard to make a marriage a success as the wife does.

"That's one important reason why I don't want to marry until I am older, until I have achieved permanence here. I couldn't find the time to be a very good husband now. To progress I have to be free to jump at chances. "Love," he added introspectively, "is a fundamental reply to something in me. It's a tremendous inspiration and influence."

His dates with Loretta Young were not a deliberate stepping out on Sonja. He and Loretta were each invited to dinner at the home of the vice-president of their studio. Each discovered the other was going alone. They were working together, and it struck them as silly to part only to meet an hour or two later. They went out again; Sonja was always skating, and Tyrone was lonely. Loretta, at a standstill in her romance with Director Eddie Sutherland—he has been previously married and her religion prohibits marriage with a divorced man—was in a quandary. Here was an amazingly refreshing newcomer who was temporarily minus his girl friend. She said yes when he asked her out, as what young lady wouldn't?

But Tyrone and Sonja are devoted to one another. She is filling a place no other girl could. She not only is a superb companion but she is going through the identical grooming, facing the same perplexities, learning what Hollywood is all about as an equally surprised overnight victor.

Perhaps you read a columnist's tale about Sonja having to stop telling Tyrone where she was going to open next when she was away on tour. Tyrone bought his first orchids when he proudly escorted her to the premiere of "Lloyds." Then, recollecting that the King of Norway always sent carnations and a personal telegram to Sonja when she had competed for her nation, he decided he should send orchids once a week, to remind her of him, as she skated in each Eastern city. His flowers were magnificent. Sonja guessed he couldn't afford the gesture and refused to say where her bookings were taking her. The columnist played up this intimate incident.

But here is the real topper to the story. Tyrone went downtown to his Uncle Frank's. The staid attorney was beaming. "This really is fine publicity for you, my boy, this account of you sending orchids!" Tyrone gasped, "Oh, you think so?" Uncle Frank expanded. "Yes," he declared authoritatively, "that press-agent yarn is worth a lot to you."

Tyrone pulled out the bill from the florist; the orchids had distinctly not been anticipated in his budget, and he owed for every one he'd ordered! "I trust, sir," said the new man of the moment with all the savoir faire he could muster, "that the gag is worth this much to you."

Uncle Frank looked at the bill and darn near fainted!

To have rest and quietness, isn't it so? I had not this. I had deep difficulties. I had shocks like war and shooting and revolution and inflation, things which every child is afraid of. For days our only safe place from airplane shooting was the cellar. I didn't dare to go from one room to the other because I was afraid to go alone over the floor. You know, this kind of thing can make you sick for your whole life long or it can make you strong, if you overcome it. What many other children have without question, I had to fight for, and this fight made me strong, and this fight made me think and this fight brought me to the bad or good which is in me.

SO I am sixteen and I start out and I am full of ideals. Well, I tell you my life hasn't changed for a dime. In me the same thoughts and ideals live which then lived, and which I have built up in myself as long as I can think. I had to compromise, yes, and every compromise made me unhappy. But I have not compromised with myself. Only with the outside. The day I compromise with myself—" she leaned from her corner and a small fist struck her palm—"I guess I have to commit suicide. And this means never. Because," she said, with a kind of amused grimness, "I do not dream to commit suicide.

"Maybe," she continued more quietly, "this sounds high-hatted to say I am strong. I am not high-hatted. How is it possible that your hat grows high if you have your eyes open? Because there is always another thing to reach to and another thing, and when you have reached that, and when you have reached the highest height of an actress, there is always far, far above you an Einstein or a Toscanini. Why I am strong is very simple to explain. Because I know so strong what I want. And what is that? To make out of yourself the best what can be made of yourself in everything, in life as in work. And nobody else can tell you how to do that, isn't it so?"

Suddenly she laughed. "It is funny. On the one side, I say I am strong. On the other side I must admit, if you ask me, that it hurts me if people think bad about me. Isn't it id-yotic? Because everybody cannot think good. I know it. Yet everybody matters to me. Everybody in the whole world can hurt me. It is so easy for me to have an inferiority complex. If I have nine hundred and ninety-nine good notices and one bad one, you can be sure I have the bad one in my pocketbook. The good ones I overfly. (Ed. note:—skim through.) Mr. Odets always laughs about that. 'Why do you laugh?' I tell him. 'You love me. That is why you think everything is good I am doing. This man does not love me. So it must be something bad I am doing.' "

Then her face cleared. "The only thing I don't read, and what doesn't bother me is the gossip column. They can write about me what they want to. It doesn't matter. Once, yes, I did read. One day I saw my test. Somebody asked me, 'What do you think?' I said, 'All right.' Because that person on the screen is to me not me but an actress. Shall I say always she is bad because her name is Luise Rainer? Somebody heard it and wrote, 'Luise Rainer thinks she is kolossal.' I laugh because I know I do not think it. They say, 'She must be thirty.' I am not hurt, because to be thirty is first not a crime in America, and anyway, this is something I know. I know I am not thirty. But I do not know, am I a good actress.

"Still, if something hurts me, I can bear it. Even if they would say, well, she's a rotten actress and if they would throw me out of the whole America, all right, they can do it, and surely I will not like it, but I will still go on being what I am. This is the real something, what is deep within me and what nobody can touch. I mustn't be an actress. Of course I love to act, but if they don't let me there are million things in life you can do and do good.

"This, that I am an actress, is something secondary to me. I was never longing for that which they call glamor. For glamor I don't give a dime. To be a human is so much more important. And that will come through if I make stitches in a cushion;" she seized one and thumped it, "or what my hands find to do," she cried, flinging it down again.

You couldn't have listened and remained unconvinced. These were no airy theories, whisked out at a moment's notice as a sop to publicity, but a philosophy painfully arrived at, intensely felt, solidly rooted. Nor was her object to convince me. What I believed was up to me. But "whatever you do, you must do it good," she had cried. So she was "doing good" the job she had undertaken of explaining herself. In fact, she was doing so nobly from my point of view that I couldn't help wondering about her rumored reluctance to grant interviews.

SHE answered that with the same willingness and clarity and candor she had shown throughout. "In my country," she said, "you work very hard, and you don't get so many rewards. People are not bowling—how do you say?—bowing? I thought always bow-ling! People are not bowing to you all the time. When I came here I was surprised. I didn't understand what are those interviews. For publicity, they told me, for advertising. So people will know you. But they will know me through my work, if they like it. If not, they don't care to know me. I don't want to make my way through that. I don't want a success that goes—swish!—up and then down. I want to find for myself what I am in this country, without publicity.

"That is why, in the beginning, when I was nobody in America, I do not give interviews. Today I allow myself to give a few. Because people have been so kind to like my work, I stand now on my feet here as an actress, and the rest is no more so important. Does it sound proud? It is then only the proudness of an honest shoeman in his shoes.

"And still I think, if you do the best work you can and spend the other life you have left in not thinking about yourself, but taking new things into yourself, it is more important than any interview. My acting I give to who wants it. The rest I would give to my husband and those few who love me. This is three-quarters of myself, what I give to the fans. They should please leave me the last quarter." Her voice had turned almost pleading, her face very sweet and serious. Then a little coaxing smile flickered 'round her lips. "And they should please not be angry with me."

I asked what the Academy Award had meant to her. She raised her lashes and I caught a glint of mischief in her eyes. "I am very thankful," she said. "For a couple of weeks I have no more my inferiority complex.

"You see," she said, "the last thing I did was this ugly little woman, O-lan. Beautiful inside, but ugly outside. Each time I look at myself I think, 'No man in the world could like you again.' So the complex becomes always more inferior. Then I was supposed to do this—'The Emperor's Candlesticks,' my next picture. William Powell got lost in the woods, nobody could find him, so I said, well, if he gets lost in the woods, I make a trip in my car." Gone was the serious mood of a moment ago. Now she was having fun.

"So I took my husband and we both went to see a piece of the country and we were very happy, and we saw the redwoods and Carmel and a piece of San Francisco, and we were lying in Santa Barbara on the beach—see, I am all sunburned. Then we came back late in the evening and my maid grabbed me. 'Miss Rainer, Miss Rainer, you are back. Mr. Mannix called, Mr. Mayer called, Mr. Capra called. They send the police behind you.' 'What's the matter?' I said. 'What can happen? They didn't start the picture yet.' 'I don't know what's the matter,' she told me, 'but the telephone doesn't stop.'

"Then again it rings, and a friend of us tells to Mr. Odets, 'Well, you better look out. The grapevine—' is there such a grapevine?—'the grapevine says Luise probably gets the Award.' I say, 'It's nonsense.' Mr. Odets says, 'Well, darling, what do you want? Do you want to go to this banquette?' 'But I cannot go like that. I am burned with the sun. Look, I have a head like a balloon.'

"'You are beautiful,' he said. He is my husband, you must excuse him. 'You look so healthy,' he said. 'But I am afraid, I am embarrassed.' 'They will think you are high-hatted.' So we chase down in a taxi. And I was afraid, and I was embarrassed, but deeply thankful, too, so I don't know how to look. But now when I see my little statue I say, 'Go away, complex. I don't give a dime for you.' Sometimes he goes, sometimes he stays," she shrugged.

I CLOSED my book. "You are finished? Then I must tell you one thing, and I want you to print it, because I come in many funny situations, especially lately, through certain circumstances. It is about politic." I pricked up my ears, beginning to realize that the "certain circumstances" had to do with her marriage. Because Odets' plays reveal him as an enlightened and compassionate thinker, in tune with his times, the undiscerning have tagged him radical.

"I never had anything to do with politic," said his wife, "and I don't dare to give any remark on politic because it would be id-y-otic, everything I say. But I do not believe in women having to do with politic. This I leave to my husband. I deeply believe that women should shut up in politic and better be womanly. I know that I make with this remark new enemies but I cannot help it. Maybe I am a rebel in this, too," she smiled, "that my husband's happiness means more to me than success. I am only happy if he is happy, and happiness and success—" her eyes looked off into space—"they haven't much to do with each other," she concluded gently.

My first impression of her innate simplicity, I knew now, was the true one, and her leap to the pinnacle of movie fame has changed her only in this—to intensify her appreciation of the genuine, her hatred of sham.

Shirley Temple flashes real dramatic talent in this "Wee Willie Winkie" sequence. But her fuzzy little pooch steals the scene.

I had always thought of her as a gay and charming child, despite her perfect identification with the woman O-lan. Now I began to understand how she had been able to sink herself so completely in the role. I think it was because she understood O-lan with her heart, because she shares with her O-lan's essential grace. "To be human is so much more important," she had cried. Like O-lan, I think she knows how to be human and to be it "good."

then. Rushing to so many football games and proms kept her from going profound over The Drama. She was gifted at drawing, so shortly she transferred to a Columbia University extension course in sketching.

HER twentieth birthday came, was celebrated and passed. Claire was restless. Art wasn't soul-gripping. Proms were no longer a passion. Quite accidentally she stumbled upon professional acting, through two chums; one was a girl who'd already played a few roles, the other, stage manager for Ethel Barrymore. Both of them vowed Claire ought to have a footlight future.

She went downtown one spring morning with the former girl friend, to make the rounds of the theatrical agents. Warned that novices wouldn't be considered, that the password was "past engagements," Claire promptly created a fine record. Her imagination has never done her wrong.

Finally her nerve was rewarded. She was waiting to give one of these free performances when she overheard a man say he was in from Michigan to hire an ingenue for his drama festival there. Claire hastily dropped her handkerchief and the conversation was on. Casually she disclosed that she herself was a superb Broadway ingenue. Between plays at the moment, don't you know? Go West? Well, that was something she'd never done!

She was prevailed upon to accept his offer and arrived in Ann Arbor to find herself billed in support of Margaret Anglin, the noted veteran actress.

But undaunted, she just went ahead and acted, and competently. When she reached home after this engagement she was prepared to snare more leads. Which she soon did. She went to St. Louis to be leading lady in the stock company there, opposite Lyle Talbot, an established favorite.

With summer, Claire went to Southampton and the fashionable playhouse there. She enacted four leads, and Broadway scouts were so attracted by her that in the autumn she was a main stem heroine for sure.

"The opening night of 'Whistling in the Dark' I got to the theatre at seven sharp," says Claire, who has no sense of time and is always late. "I was going calmly to put on my make-up and relax awhile." Telegrams and flowers poured in. She'd sent tickets to her relatives and friends; some sixty rooters were out front. "I had to stop and read every wire, sigh over every flower and examine every card. All of a sudden it was eight-fifteen, and I looked into the mirror. I screamed. I'd been dabbing on my make-up absent-mindedly, and I was a sight. Frantically I creamed it off and slapped on a new face. I had to snap myself together as I tore onto the stage!" After that Claire never arrived at the theatre until eight-fifteen.

A year in this one play and then another hit. And then love goaled her for the second time. "I was so preoccupied with him that I resented having to report to the theatre." She had cocktails before the show; there was supper and dancing afterwards. The glamor of sophisticated New York life got her. But although this was a much more mature romance, it wasn't to be, either.

FORTUNATELY, Hollywood grabbed her; this helped her forget. But Hollywood wasn't what she expected at all.

New BLONDEX THE BLONDE HAIR SHAMPOO & RINSE

"When Mother and I started for California I thought we'd only be here six months. It was to be one more laughing adventure." Claire not only has become a permanent resident of the film capital with no desire to live elsewhere again, but she has been notably changed by pictures.

On her arrival, she was met at the station with instructions to hurry to the studio. While fitting her into outdoor garb, they passed on a few pointers on screen make-up. Her second day in Hollywood she was on a train for the great open spaces to be George O'Brien's sweetheart. They thrust her on a horse—she, who'd never so much as looked at one! But she rode the ranges because there was no choice. And she was such a gracious Western heroine that she was immediately assigned to the next O'Brien horse opera.

"I've grown to love my work," Claire avers. "I want to stay in Hollywood in the profession I know I prefer. I like the people here; they're so stimulating. Kind also. The breadth of the country out here has won me. I stumbled into the work I'm cut out for instead of the social life I anticipated. It's so gratifying."

She's lost interest in big parties. Claire doesn't care much about dancing any more. Rather, she chooses the latest movie so she may see what the other actresses are doing and profit thereby. She's been earnestly taking voice coaching and dancing lessons.

Fame was but one more fling when she gave it a tumble. But here is the lark that lasted.

Another one of Gene's pastimes is drawing, and he often illustrates informal little notes to his friends with comical caricatures. He would like to be a good enough cartoonist to illustrate some of the highlights of his career and hang them where he could see them frequently and be reminded that he wasn't always a motion picture star.

One picture might show Gene on a train, deeply engrossed in a poker game and would remind him of a time he needed an overcoat but lacked the money to buy one. The $65 he won took care of the bill.

Being in a sentimental frame of mind just now, his first cartoon would undoubtedly illustrate his introduction to Jeanette, which occurred on the doorstep of a friend's house when they arrived simultaneously to attend a party.

"I'm Gene Raymond, Miss MacDonald," Gene said politely, as they stood waiting for the door to be opened, but their hostess exclaimed: "How nice of you to come together!"

THE second picture of this series would no doubt chronicle their next meeting which, strangely enough, occurred on the doorstep of another friend's house where a breakfast party was in progress. Again they entered the house together and their friends jumped to the conclusion that they were "that way" about each other. No amount of denial on their part could convince their friends that their meetings had been accidental.

Almost unbelievably, they met the third time at the box office of a theatre where they had gone to attend a preview. Jeanette asked for her tickets, but through some error there were none for her. Gene then stepped up to the box office and was handed four tickets. Having but one guest, he promptly offered Jeanette and her mother his extra tickets. They entered the theatre together and were photographed by every cameraman in town. They sat together and laughed at the strange series of coincidences.

"We'd better make it official," Gene whispered. "Will you have dinner with me tomorrow night?"

There might be another picture to end this series, showing them repeating their marriage vows at the wedding they plan on the 17th of June, 1937, just two years from the day of their first official "date."

In the romantic corner there would be a little picture illustrating one of Jeanette's April Fool jokes. When Gene was ringing her front doorbell, Jeanette ran out another door and climbed into the tonneau of his car. Her butler informed Gene he was to pick Miss MacDonald up at another address. A little puzzled, but still willing, he drove off. About a mile away, at a particularly dark spot in the road, he saw in his mirror a dark figure rising up behind him.

"I'm held up," he thought, and, quickly pulling over to the curb he stopped the car suddenly and prepared to give the intruder a good battle. With his fist upraised he was interrupted by Jeanette screaming: "Don't shoot! It's I!", and Gene nearly fainted at the thought of what one of his hard punches might have done to her.

IN a mood of boastfulness, he might draw a picture of the time he got the best of a motorcycle officer. Hurrying down the boulevard one Sunday morning late, as usual, Gene was stopped by a cop who was so obviously Irish you could almost see the shamrocks sticking out of his ears.

"Shure, and I'm late for mass, officer," Gene explained. To which the good-natured Irishman replied: "Be hurryin' along thin, me lad, and be shure you say a prayer fer me."

Of course, his art gallery would include some pictures illustrating his motor trip West and his introduction to Hollywood. It was while he was making a hit in "Young Sinners" in New York, that he signed a contract to come to Hollywood and make pictures.

"You can drive out, Gene," he was told. "But you must be in Hollywood two weeks from today."

Gene and his brother started off from New York in high spirits. Their first stop was in Chicago and there they had rather a hilarious time, staying two days longer than they had expected. From Chicago on, they began to run into detours, bad roads, mechanical troubles, and one delay followed another.

Arriving finally at the studio, he was received coldly by the clerk at the information desk. Did Gene have an appointment? What was his business with Mr. Young?

"I'm under contract here," Gene explained, whereupon the man cast his eye on his contract list and said "no."

"But I am. I just arrived from New York," Gene insisted. "Maybe you have my other name—Raymond Guion," he suggested, but a second perusal of the list only brought fourth another determined "no."

Gene decided that his tardiness had caused him to be fired, but finally persuaded the man at the desk to telephone Mr. Young's office. Mr. Young was out, but his secretary arranged a pass, and Gene was inside the studio. He almost ran to Mr. Young's office, where he cooled his heels for half an hour awaiting Young's return. Presently he came in and, looking very surprised at the sight of Gene, exclaimed: "Hello, Gene! What on earth are you doing in California?"

"That was deflating enough," Gene laughed, "but when he took me down to introduce me to B. P. Schulberg, that gentleman just looked at me and said: 'I thought you'd be a much older man.' And when he introduced me to Al Kaufman, production manager of the studio, Al remarked sourly: 'Didn't know you were blond.'"

HOWEVER, Gene was under contract, and for the next four months he waited around for an opportunity to work. Every week he collected a salary, but nothing was ever said about putting him in a picture. Then came an offer to return to Broadway, so Gene went to his employers and said: "I don't know whether you know it or not, but you've been paying me a lot of money that I haven't earned. You don't seem to need me around here; I have an offer to go back to the stage, and I'm leaving in three weeks for New York."

Never let it be said that an actor who is good enough for Broadway isn't good enough for Hollywood. Gene was put to work immediately.

He takes his career seriously, seriously enough so that he gave up a good contract and free-lanced for awhile because he didn't think the pictures he was making were doing him any good. He refused to play opposite a great star in an important production when, from every angle, it seemed a great opportunity for advancing his career. He didn't think it was the right role for him. Another time he refused an equally important picture because the producer insisted that he dye his hair.

Although firm in his beliefs, he never crosses bridges until he gets to them and doesn't worry over things to any great extent. Actually, he dislikes publicity.

"If I make good pictures, the publicity will take care of itself," he says. "I don't believe in saying just anything in order to get your name in the paper."

Publicity is Gene's biggest bugaboo, and his efforts at cartooning would include one to illustrate what he considers an all-time low in exploitation.

Picking up a magazine one day he saw a large picture of himself in which he was looking admiringly at a dish of some unrecognizable food. Under the picture was a caption reading: "Gene Raymond's favorite recipe for Crepes Suzette."

"Crepes Suzette!" Gene exploded. "And what, may I ask, is Crepes Suzette?"

ance was just over. Miss Shearn was shown his photograph, expressed interest, but did not have time to wait for an introduction. Just then Mr. Oland came in. He was presented to Miss Shearn. They talked, and it was as if they had known each other all their lives.

Someone who had joined in the conversation commented on Mr. Oland's "Peer Gynt" and that of Richard Mansfield. Mr. Oland's performance, she said, was old wine, Mr. Mansfield's, beer. Oland quietly replied, "I think it was wonderful of him to produce 'Peer Gynt' at all." Miss Shearn, impressed with the modesty of the man, wondered if she had met, at last, a man humble and sincere, who thought only in terms of art. She forgot her other appointments and remained to talk. She made arrangements to paint his portrait, the first of many. He went to her studio to watch rehearsals of her playlet. Within three weeks they were engaged to be married.

"It is a marriage," said Charlie Chan, "which is enduring because it is joined by the treasures of the mind which neither rust nor corrupt. They are as much married in their tastes and interests as in their affections."

THEY do everything together. Mrs. Oland started to paint when she was twelve. She studied at the Smith College Art School, at the Art Students League in New York and later in Paris. She studied under such artists as William Chase and Robert Henri.

Mr. Oland also paints, though he speaks of his wife's painting, not of his own. He would, he confesses, rather have been a painter than anything else in the world, but he never had enough confidence in his ability. He never had lessons. He watches his wife paint and does landscapes himself. He says that his wife's work is "virile," while his is merely "lyrical." His favorite among his own paintings is one he did of Benedict Canyon, near Beverly Hills. He called it "Spring" and stood knee-deep in mud during a rain to get a certain landscape mood.

The Olands, jointly, translated the first eleven Strindberg plays ever translated and published in English.

The household of Mr. and Mrs. Oland consists of Preyedes Venedetti, the cook, and Preyedes' husband, who is the gardener. He did not know a weed from a geranium when he started, for his trade in Italy was that of a stone worker. There is also Milton Thorp, the chauffeur, who not only drives the Oland cars, but also answers all of Mr. Oland's correspondence, fan and personal mail.

"Perhaps the most important member of the Oland household," resumed Charlie Chan affectionately, "is Mrs. Oland's mother. Mrs. Shearn is over ninety and has the verve, the gaiety, and the vigor of a woman of forty. Mrs. Shearn maintains her own bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel, visiting the Olands only upon occasion. She believes that mothers-in-law should not live 'with the young folks'—unlike the custom in my country," added Charlie Chan.

"There are no children in the Oland family. But there is Shaggedy Ann, a German Schnauzer given the Olands by Richard Arlen. And there are Shaggedy's children, Countess Julie, Mr. Chan, Princess Ming Lo Fun and Till Eulenspiegel, named for one of Mr. Oland's favorite Strauss tone-poems.

"A whimsical fellow, I am afraid, this Warner Oland," said Charlie Chan, "for he threatened, at first, to give all of the puppies away. Then he changed his mind as his affections were assailed and now, not only keeps all puppies but takes them with him on his travels and also to his various places of residence. They go along to their farmhouse in Southboro, Massachusetts, an old house built in the days of the Revolution, and to their 7,000-acre ranch on the wild Mexican island of Palmetto de la Virgin.

"Mr. Oland has some distressing little habits," Mr. Chan pursued, something like a gleam of satisfaction in his slightly slanted eyes. "He has a habit, for instance, of putting his lighted cigarettes—at all times he resembles a lighted chimney rather than a portly gentleman of some 200 pounds—on desks, tables, ancient books, choice prints. Accidents occur. I would like to tell him that he should pay attention to detail. Insignificant molehill sometimes more worthy of notice than conspicuous mountain. He does the same with wet fountain pen. Mrs. Oland does not believe in Occidental wifely habit of nagging. As Oriental wife she bears and forbears; she permits him to blot and burn. One time he ruined his wife's costly white opera cloak. Several of their prized Sheraton chairs have been marred by such burns. On the other hand, he keeps very fine care of his clothes. He has neither a valet at home nor a dresser at the studio.

"Mr. Oland habitually brings his lunches to the studio—sandwiches and coffee, principally coffee, to which he is an addict. He brings his lunches in humble fashion, in a workman's metal container. And he brings them not because he cannot stand cafe cooking, but because he must concentrate, while working, on character of Chan. The only intrusion into this concentration is Shaggedy Ann.

"One afternoon Mr. Oland disappeared from the set. Great disturbance resulted. Scouts were dispatched. Calling All Cars was considered. It was found that Mr. Oland had rushed Shaggedy from his dressing room to the dog hospital, having found that a medicated flea bath was indicated.

MR. OLAND has a bland, calm manner. He moves slowly and with deliberation. His voice is pitched so low as to be, at times, inaudible. Inwardly, he is very nervous and tires easily. The only time he ever shows signs of nervousness is when someone stands in his line of vision off-stage while he is playing a scene. He takes his work very seriously. He takes Charlie Chan very, very seriously. One of his greatest regrets is that he never met Earl Derr Biggers, creator of Charlie Chan.

"He has played many Oriental characters prior to Chan. His first screen appearance was in support of Theda Bara in 'Jewels of the Madonna.' He played in 'Old San Francisco,' 'Chinatown Nights,' 'Heels of Chance,' 'The Mysterious Dr. Fu Manchu,' 'The Return of Dr. Fu Manchu' and many others. Then he began the Charlie Chan pictures and will make no others.

"Mr. Oland cannot live in Hollywood. He says that the vibrations would destroy him. When Mr. Oland is in Hollywood, he has rules for living there and for working in pictures. They are:

Don't alibi. Old excuse like ancient goat, has whiskers.

Face the facts. Dreams, like good liars, distort facts.

Be punctual. Cold omelette, like fish out of sea, does not improve with age.

Think things out. Hasty conclusions, like hind leg of mule, kick backward.

Don't hog the picture. One man cannot move mountain.

Lead the right sort of life. Talent without virtue like silver without a master.

Be determined. Oak tree do not fall with first stroke.

Invest wisely. Much wealth will not come if little does not go."

Mr. Oland is not, Mr. Chan said, greedy for money. He believes that much money, like much poverty, is much responsibility. He receives many offers to play other Oriental characters and invariably refuses. He was offered a fabulous sum for playing the general in "The General Died at Dawn" and declined the part. He makes his three Charlie Chans a year and will make no others.

"This is a saying of Mr. Oland," Charlie Chan added. "When he is told that he should make more money, work more often, strive for greater gains he always says, 'Naked I came into the world and naked I shall go out of it.'"

I'M not afraid of death. Once, a few short years ago, Mother, Dad and I were on a fishing trip that almost proved fatal. There are just the three of us, you know; I am an only child. And naturally we have been, and are, always together. We have a little house here in Hollywood now. Anyway, we were on this fishing trip late one afternoon when we came to a river that was in a state of flood. We started to cross the seemingly safe bridge. Midway across, the bridge cracked. Dad thought fast, reversed, backed the car swiftly to the high precipitous bank overhanging the river—but the engine stalled. There we were, imprisoned in that car, the slightest move on our parts almost certain to send the car hurtling down that drop of several hundred feet into the roaring torrent and sure death. We didn't dare to move or breathe. We didn't speak a single word. For some fifteen eternal minutes we hung there.

"In that fifteen minutes we made good acquaintance with the thought of death. I knew that, at any instant, life might be a thing of the past. And it wasn't fear I felt. To my own amazement it was, instead, a sort of deep curiosity. What would I find on the other side? I also had a weird sense of gratification that the three of us would be together in death, as we had been in life and that I would not be dying, dismally, in bed, with the measles or the mumps. There, again, you see my fear of the mediocre even in the teeth of death.

"At last, using the most infinite caution, Dad climbed out of the car. He found that it was being held there by the upthrust root of a tree. As lightly and swiftly as was humanly possible, Mother and I stepped out. We clung there to the bank and then, with the release of our weight, the car, soundlessly and instantly slid into the waters which closed over it.

"Another time," reminisced John, "I was hurled through the windshield of our car. My eyes were badly cut. For days they thought that I would never see again, and I faced the dark thought of being blind for life. My whole life had been filled with books. We'd never stayed in any one place long enough for me to make friends, or to join in the activities of the football field, or clubs. I'd done most of my living through books. My other hobbies were painting, piano and the theatre. A blind man would be in a bad way with painting, piano and the theatre as hobbies. I had no other interests. Still I was not afraid.

"I decided that if I were fated for blindness I would be one of the most extraordinary blind men in the world. I would be a male Helen Keller. Again, you see, the rebellion against mediocrity. So, when I was finally told that the eye injuries were, after all, curable, I was not conscious of any overwhelming relief.

"I've been in love. I had always thought that love was something to be afraid of. I'd never had any romances in college. For one reason because we moved around so much I never had time to strike any roots, even romantically speaking. I fell in love out here in Hollywood, and I awoke one morning to find myself thinking in terms of marriage. Then I knew that I had not escaped. I expected to feel something approaching terror. I didn't.

"Now," said John quietly, "it's over. And the loss of love is something from which stronger men than I have quailed. Emotional anguish is harder to bear than physical pain. Well, it hurt. There were some bad hours. But I've lived through that, too. And I'll never be afraid of love, or the loss of love again. It hasn't embittered me. It hasn't made me cynical. I hope to fall in love again, to be married.

I'M not afraid of loss of my career, either. I've been through that. I studied, I planned, I hoped to become a professor of English. Then, after I graduated from Western Reserve University, in Cleveland, I found that there was not enough money to give me the post-graduate course I needed in order to be eligible, one day, for a chair at Harvard, Yale, or one of the ranking colleges. This meant, again, that I might become just another professor. I couldn't go that.

"A talent scout had approached me, on the campus, a few months prior to graduation. At that time, dangling my Phi Beta Kappa key, I had laughed at Hollywood. I hadn't been interested. What should I do there? Only when I knew that my whole planned career was not to be, did I wire the talent scout in Hollywood and ask him if I might reconsider.

"I am in Hollywood, and I'm not at all afraid of losing out here. I know that there is no such money to be made elsewhere. I'm not keen for money. I do want to establish a substantial trust fund for Mother and Dad so that I can know that they are safe. After that, it doesn't much matter. I haven't luxurious tastes because I was brought up with simplicity. I was taught that the 'best things in life are free.' Woods and rivers, books and music, the heritage of all men, rich and poor. I had expected to be a professor with the full consciousness that an English prof does not correct his term papers in a limousine or on the edge of a blue-tiled swimming pool.

"Yes, I am inoculated against the major fears: death, poverty, loss of chosen career, loss of love, competition with my betters. I am afraid only of mediocrity. And because of that fear I shall give myself six more months in Hollywood. If, at the end of that time I haven't found myself or 'been found,' then I shall leave Hollywood and seek other fields to conquer.

"It's going to be a little difficult to find myself here in Hollywood because I don't seem to be any standard type. There is no pattern, cut and ready for me to wear. I don't think I'm enough like any other screen actor to be classified as 'another Gary Cooper, Franchot Tone,' or whatever. Not that I'd want to model after anyone, but it does make it easier to cast a man who fits into some category, I believe. I'll have to find my own niche, as others have done. Fred MacMurray, for instance.

"Fred and his wife are among my best friends in Hollywood, by the way. They're grand, regular people. I haven't many friends out here. I haven't been 'taken-up' by society. My name doesn't appear in the columns as 'among those present' at smart parties. I don't go Troc'ing. I don't belong to tennis clubs and beach clubs. And I don't care. But I do have a few close friends. I do go out on occasional dates with Ginger Rogers, Anne Shirley, Margo and a few others.

"I am not afraid of age. I want to grow older as rapidly as possible, for youth, in Hollywood, is a terrific liability. They don't believe out here that young people have any brains. Youth in Hollywood has only pictorial value. Young men must be leading men, juveniles. Young men must pose, simper, smirk, shake cocktails, say, 'I love you.' Don't I know? Didn't I smirk and simper and act young through 'Soak the Rich,' 'Valiant Is the Word for Carrie' and the others? They won't give youth a chance to be raw, ugly, wounded and violent.

"No, it isn't what I am doing that matters to me. It's the figure I cut in doing it. If I were in a bank, I must be the president or nothing. If I go to war, I must be an officer, not a private. If I am an actor I must be either a ranking character actor or, at least, star material. It is the whole law of my being."

Without Penny and Tony. I can't imagine what it would be to live without children's toys all around the place, children's parties, even children's problems—and there are plenty of those.

"I find myself feeling actually sorry for people without children. Even sorrier for people who have children and complain about how it's a wear and tear on their nerves; the business of measles and whooping cough and mumps, of having teeth straightened, and all of the bumps and bruises; the 'lap and heart trouble of having children at all,' my mother used to call it. It's life, isn't it? The famous man who once said, 'Why is it that we always come in the end to a little child?' was so darned right.

"When we have children, we are giving ourselves hostages to the future," said this star who will never be lonely. "For there is nothing more deplorable, more tragic than the actor or actress who, when the grease-paint wears off, the applause dies down, sits alone among a heap of dusty scrap-books, all his eggs in the one basket of his own fame, and that basket frayed or broken.

"There is nothing more pitiable than the sight of the actor or actress who, his or her day done, runs madly after the receding figure of Popularity.

"And thinking back, I can tell you that I couldn't possibly be fonder of children of our own than I am of Penny and Tony. There'd always be the fear," laughed Freddie, "that the terrible traits of some Aunt Lulu of Florence, or some Uncle Dodo of mine, or even some of my own traits which I admit I don't want perpetuated, would rear their ugly little heads in our offspring.

"We have no such fears. We have no inhibitions about our children. We can rave about their beauty, marvel at their cleverness, boast and brag about them to our hearts' content and no one can say, 'Well, they think they did pretty well, don't they?' It's very gratifying to watch Penny and Tony taking on some of the better characteristics of their proud parents, some of the habits of thought, the manners, the reactions we have tried to give them through environment. Penny, for instance, speaking with the lilt in Florence's voice.

"Of course, we'll tell them they're adopted when the time comes. We'll tell them in the way other parents who have adopted children have done. That other children just come to their parents, and their parents have to take them as they are, but that their mother and daddy adopted them, chose them from all the little boys and girls there are in the world just because they were Penny and Tony. We hope to make them proud of being adopted, able to feel secure about it.

"Whenever I possibly can, I give some happy significance to the word 'adoption.' For instance, last Easter I took Penny to buy some Easter bunnies. And when we found the ones we wanted the most I said to her, 'Shall we adopt them for our very own, Penny?'—thus stressing the meaning of the word 'adoption'—the love in it, you know.

"AS I think back," smiled Freddie, "when I remember myself as I was ten years ago, I am amused. And a little sorry for that chap with the single-track mind, before all the warmth and varied interests had come into his life. Then my one and only idea was to win success in the theatre. Nothing else mattered. I wanted to crash the theatre. That wanting was all of me. Well, I didn't crash it. I did several plays, got good enough notices, saved a little more money each year, never quite making that crash. I never achieved

MY DEODORANT GETS GREASE ALL OVER ME AND MY CLOTHES!
YOU MUST TRY THE NEW NON-GREASY ODORONO ICE — IT DISAPPEARS

New Non-Greasy Cream Vanishes Instantly and Checks Perspiration!

NOW, at last, there is a cream deodorant that is absolutely non-greasy. And checks perspiration immediately!

Just apply Odorono Ice with your finger tips, night or morning. In no time, it is completely absorbed, leaving no grease to make your underarm or your clothes messy.

A single application keeps your underarm odorless and perfectly dry for 1 to 3 days! And Odorono Ice leaves no odor of its own to betray you to other people. Its own clean, fresh odor of pure alcohol disappears at once.

Odorono Ice is made on a totally new principle. Its light, melting texture is entirely different—refreshing and cooling on your skin. And unlike ordinary creams, it frees you not only from odor, but from all dampness.

This means you need never again worry about ruining your lovely frocks. You'll save on both clothes and cleaner's bills.

Odorono Ice is so easy and pleasant to use, so dainty and so wonderfully effective that 80 per cent of the women who have tried it prefer it to any other deodorant they have ever used! Buy a jar tomorrow. 35¢ at all Toilet-Goods Departments.

what Florence achieved in the theatre, nor anywhere near it.

"So, when I came to Hollywood in 'The Royal Family of Broadway' and was offered a job in pictures, we decided to take it. We'd stay a little while, we said. The climate was pleasant. The experience would be valuable. The money was even pleasanter than the climate. I'd make some real money here and then we'd go back to the theatre again. I needed money. All actors need money. We are, by nature, luxury-loving brutes.

"Thinking it over," Freddie said thoughtfully, "perhaps the security bug has been the 'ole debbil sea' in my life. Perhaps actors shouldn't be too secure. It may not make us smug to feel that way, but it does tend to make us soft. Too many limousines, too many easy-to-get-into swimming pools. Palm Springs at hand if you feel too cold. Too much good food, good clothes.

"I love making pictures and I certainly don't despise movie gold—far from it. But too much gold from any source may harden the heart, insulate the spirit against the aches and pains and hurts that are good for it. It was a terrific temptation, you know, to stay tucked snugly into a contract and to re-sign when my contract had run its course and another was offered me. I fought the temptation, Florence helping me. I decided to freelance. And when I asked myself, 'Why do you want this kind of freedom?' the answer was, 'So I can be free for the theatre and the licking I never gave it.'

"So my thoughts lead me," smiled Fred, "to one of the two things I want and haven't got—a chance to crash the theatre. And that's what I'm going to try to do. Within the year, I hope. We're going back, Florence and I; Florence to the place she has already made for herself, I to the place I hope to make for myself. And I like the idea of reversing the usual procedure.

"It has been the custom, you know, for stage successes to come to movies and movie failures to go to the theatre. I want to go to the theatre when I am among the 'tops' in pictures, when I don't have to go. I don't want to go begging at the back door of the theatre when the front door of films begins to close on me.

"So, that is one thing I still want.

"THE other," said this amazing Freddie, "is twins . . . Yes," grinned Freddie, "Florence and I would like to adopt twin boys. And very probably that's exactly what we will do. We may decide to wait until Penny and Tony are old enough to go with us and help us choose them. This, even more than the Easter bunnies, should prove to them what adoption really means, how much love goes into it.

"Thinking it all over," Fred said, "I realize how great, how immeasurable a part Florence has played in everything. She is never jealous. And I know well that the role of wife to a Hollywood actor is the most difficult role in the world. Especially for a woman who has been what Florence is in the theatre, and has given up her world for mine. At least temporarily. She has helped me keep my feet on the ground. She is not the kind, thank goodness, to gush over me.

"Sometimes I kid her and ask her why she doesn't throw her arms about me, give me some of the adulation to which a gent in the movies should feel entitled. And she always laughs and says, 'Because I don't fuss over you is one reason why you are still around.' And how right she is.

"I am grateful to her for the sacrifices she has made. I am grateful to her for helping me find other interests in life apart from scripts and sound stages—photography, which she encouraged; music, which

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

I knew very little about until she made me realize how little I did know; art, languages. She speaks French exquisitely. Penny is fast learning. I know that I must get busy and keep up with them.

"I am grateful to Hollywood, too, for many things besides security. For the friends we have made here, the Bob Montgomerys, Gloria Swanson, the Chester Morrises, Marion Spitzer and Harlan Thompson, Bart Marshall—others.

"And," went on Fred thoughtfully, "it's a pet theory of mine that the reason so many of us do keep our feet on the ground, some common sense in our heads in spite of all the flattery and fulsome praise our celluloid images induce, is because so many of us are small-town boys. Take Gable, Gary Cooper, Bob Montgomery, Bob Taylor, Bing Crosby, any number of us—all small-town boys. Kids who were brought up without fuss and feathers, made to go to Sunday School, wash behind our ears, do chores, obey the Ten Commandments, to darn well know the difference between black and white, or else.

"Yep," mused Freddie, shaking hands in goodbye, "I'm the luckiest man alive. I've always been afraid to say that before. But I've said it now. I hope," he added under his breath, "that the gods who shape man's little destiny are bowling with thunderbolts or something and don't hear me."

I looked back as I stepped into the car. And there, sure 'nuff, was Freddie, fingers crossed, in the act of placating the greedy gods for the happiness he dared to confess; the good fortune he has earned—gratefully.

out the many moods of an impulsive and versatile individuality and save you from being always the tailored type, the fluffy type, the schoolgirl, or the siren.

New fashions for this summer are particularly exciting because they have all the contradictory traits of the ideal girl of 1937. They look alluring, frivolous and high-spirited and actually prove to be thrifty and durable. In their gay coloring and crisp daintiness there is no hint of their sturdy virtues, their resistance to stretching, spotting, and wrinkling. Just as you would never suspect to look at Jean Parker's exquisitely-thin arms and legs that they mask a steel-wire strength that makes it possible for her to swim confidently through the pounding waves of the Pacific.

Now, before you go out to buy your summer playtime wardrobe—whether it is to be one outfit or ten—I want you to ask yourself frankly just what sort of shopper you are. Do you dash into a store and buy something you just saw in the window because it is a color you like or the price you can afford to pay? Or do you do as Jean Parker does, study each purchase carefully and score it by points? Is it becoming; that is, does it do something definite for you spiritually, not just cover you up? Does it heighten your coloring or accent the best lines of your figure? Is it appropriate? Do many occasions crop up in your life when you need just such an outfit? Is it comfortable? You can't have poise without comfort, and poise is the essence of style. Are its details true to the newest fashion trends? Has the fabric been treated by the new processes that make it resistant to dust, perspiration, crumpling, wilt? Is it washable? Does it offer marked contrast to the dresses you already have?

JEAN PARKER did not always have the lavish funds at her disposal that she has under her new contract with Columbia Pictures. But always, even in her days as a shy youngster down at M-G-M, she was not overlooked, even when Norma Shearer and Jean Harlow and other experienced fashion plates were nearby. Necessity had taught Jean how to shop cannily and thriftily. She knew that mistakes in a wardrobe were costly, not only in money but in wasted opportunity. Dresses that don't add some zip to your appearance are just like a great blanket of fog hiding your personality. But dresses that serve as an accent bring all sorts of invitations your way.

Now I am going to ask you to study carefully the pictures of Jean on pages 48 and 49 to see if you can figure out her exact reasons for selecting these summer outfits. Then come back and check your findings against what I have to tell you about them. You'll know then how to go about selecting your summer clothes.

First let's look at the figured cotton sports dress, because that is the type of dress that every girl needs in her summer wardrobe, whether she is staying in town or going to the country. The background is white for daintiness, and the leaf-figures are a fresh, clear red and yellow for gayety. Jean is inclined to be a shy, retiring girl, so she deliberately selects clothes that are striking in color, or fit, or novelty of style. The low-cut square neckline is an important style point. (If you have high-necked sports dresses left from last year you may want to cut them down just as the rest of us are doing.) The peasant-fashion tie belt emphasizes her slim hips, and the fullness introduced in the skirt by inverted pleat front and back makes the skirt comfortably wide for tennis or golf. Of far greater importance than its size would suggest is the jacket that matches this dress. That trifle takes the dress into the dual-role class, makes it suitable for town as well as country or sports wear.

Her tiny hat that looks like a Dutch cap is crownless and is made of linen, so it can be washed daily, emerging fresh and clean as new. You will find these hats, in pique and novelty cottons, ridiculously cheap. Her shoes are the ever-popular brown leather and white buckskin spectator sports pumps. Girls who buy only one pair of summer shoes do well to select this model, as these shoes go well with all types of summer clothes except the dressiest chiffons.

Jean Parker enjoys wearing skittish novelty fashions, if they can be thriftily discarded when she tires of them. That is why she selected a simple white silk sports dress with a detachable bodice of peasant embroidery rather than one of the new peasant frocks. If the Tyrolean fashions run their course swiftly, as they threaten to do, she can just leave off the bodice. This is not an extravagant gesture, because she still has a distinguished white dress that can be enlivened with various colored scarfs, with one of the new basket-weave moire ribbon belts, or with the flowered jacket shown with her dark linen dress.

Note the tiny stand-up collar on this white dress, the puffed sleeves and the circular fullness of the snug-hipped skirt. Those are all featured in the newest fashions.

There are many sly reasons behind Jean's choice of the dark linen dress. When you have been wearing white and pastels continually, and everyone you know is dressed in light, girlish colors, don't you long to show up in something suave and dark? So does Jean. Any director who harbors a notion that she is just a naive and guileless ingenue is going to visualize her in more worldly roles when he sees her in this outfit. And if your friends are accustomed to pigeon-holing you as a jolly, open-faced playmate, you can jolt them into suspecting hidden depths, if you wear an artfully simple Navy, or mahogany, or black linen dress like this occasionally.

This dress, like the white one we just discussed, is a basic dress that is the delight of a girl dressing on a small budget, because it can look different every time you wear it, by merely adding a bright scarf, a jacket, a peasant bodice, or novelty belt. It is grand for motoring or train travel, because the linen is crease-resistant and smooth enough to repel dust.

THE trim jacket that she is wearing with this Navy linen dress is made of matelassé (we plain folks call it crinkly or blistered, cotton printed in red, yellow, blue, and green. Can't you just see how you'd practically live in such a jacket, wearing it with all your dresses?

Her Navy kid shoes, stitched in white, show you how heels are coming out in the open this summer in street shoes as well as in evening and beach sandals. They are so comfortable and cool, you will wonder why we never demanded them before.

We really should have started with the bathing suit, instead of ignoring it all the time, for it was her appearance in a bathing suit that launched Jean Parker into a film career. She posed for an Olympic Games poster, and as soon as M-G-M saw it, they sent for her.

The bathing suit she is wearing in the photograph on page 49 is of smart white satin, figured in sprays of California poppies. And let me warn you right now that only a girl of her gentle temperament and willowy figure could get away with a suit like that without looking downright brazen. Pastel colors are better for those less lithe and plain dark suits for those with bulges. (And shame on you if you bulge when our beauty expert, Mary Marshall, would be so glad to send you corrective exercises.)

These well-made suits give the figure firm support, and are so durable they will survive at least two summers of daily plunges through surf. They are comparatively inexpensive, and come in all colors and every style.

VARIETY is the spice of personality, so having played the siren in her bathing suit, Jean goes to the other extreme in selecting a beach wrap. Quaint and modest as can be is the wrap of blue cotton printed in white, made on the lines of a peasant dress. Don't you see what a dramatic build-up that is when she slips out of the picturesque wrap and emerges so woman-of-the-wordly in her swim suit?

Current fashions make it possible to play the drama the other way around if you want to. You can choose a stately wrap of gleaming white acetate jersey or fine white terrycloth tightly fitted through the hips and swirling into deep folds like the most glamorous evening wraps. Under that, for contrast, you would wear one of the dainty, full-skirted swim suits made like a little girl's pinafore.

These beach coats aren't a rash extravagance, even if your visits to the beach are rare, for you will wear one the year 'round at home as a lounging robe. They are quite inexpensive when made of chintz or paisley cotton.

You are going to be deeply grateful to Jean Parker, I know, when you go shopping and discover how much her advice has helped you.

Solving Some Beauty Problems

you wish to be. Then some exercises won't hurt.

Question: If I'm fat (or thin) in spots, what should I do?

Answer: Exercise for the fat. Diet, plus special exercise for the thin. By "special exercise," I mean stunts to smooth out any lumps and bulges that may appear as you gain weight.

Question: All kidding aside, can the bust be reduced?

Answer: You mustn't expect miracles, but you can do considerable to improve your appearance in this respect. A general reducing diet, if you're generally fat, will reduce the bust some. Buttermilk is a helpful bust reducer. Always wear a good uplift bras. And do deep breathing exercises for ten minutes every morning. Raise the arms in front to shoulder height, move them out to the sides and as far back as you can, meanwhile trying to feel a "lift" in the breast muscles.

Dress devices to kid the public into thinking your figure to be better than it is, are as follows: Let your dresses fit easily—not form-fitting, nor yet so loose as to look old ladyish. Don't wear knit goods. Wear V-necks, long tunics. Don't go in for jabots and frills. Set your waistline a

UNDERARM VICTIM!

EVERY day she makes the same mistake. She expects the bath she takes at 8 o'clock in the morning to protect her from underarm perspiration odor at 3 o'clock in the afternoon!

It can't be done. All a bath can do is to wash away the traces of past perspiration. It cannot prevent perspiration odor from cropping out later in the day. A bath works backwards; never forwards.

You cannot count on your daily bath to keep your underarms fresh, free from odor longer than an hour or two.

It takes more than soap and water to do that; it takes special care.

You can give your underarms this special care in just half a minute. With Mum!

Mum takes care of you all day. Smooth a quick fingertipful of Mum under each arm and you're safe for that day, no matter how long and strenuous it is.

No trouble to use Mum. You waste no time in using Mum. And when it's on, you're through. No fuss of waiting and rinsing off.

Harmless to clothing. Mum has been awarded the Textile Approval Seal of the American Institute of Laundering as being harmless to fabrics. So don't worry — if you forget to use it before you dress, just use it afterwards.

Soothing to sensitive skin. Mum is so cooling and soothing you can use it right after shaving the underarms. How women appreciate this!

Does not prevent natural perspiration. Mum does just what you want it to do—prevents the ugly odor of perspiration and not the perspiration itself.

bit lower. Above all, don't slouch.

Question: Where should very short girls watch out for excess weight?

Answer: Besides the obvious stomach-and-hip area, the back and upper arms should be watched. Stretch—stretch—every morning. Make an exercise of stretching.

Question: What can (1) the very short girl do to look taller and (2) the very tall girl to do to look shorter?

Answer: First place, the short girl can emulate Luise Rainer's walk and posture. To be pretty sure of good posture without thinking about yourself every minute, just get the habit of keeping your chest out. When the chest goes out, the shoulders go back, the tum just naturally has to be pulled in, and there you are. The short girl can wear the highest of heels, but she shouldn't wear the highest of hats nor high coiffures, because such ain't in keeping. Beltless, princess-style frocks are good. And though fashion says skirts are shorter, the petite lass might well keep her clothes ten or twelve inches from the ground, rather than fourteen.

The very tall girl, now, should also stand up to her full height, for slouching will only make her look slovenly. She should wear high heels when high heels are appropriate, for the little smitch taken off by low heels won't help her height enough to matter. A page-boy coiffure, if she can wear it, will flatten her down some. Two-color outfits, if she's slim, are swell—the dark frock, with the neutral or bright toned jacket. And big hats are just her dish.

Question: What make-up problem is illustrated by Simone Simon?

Answer: The problem of the heavy lower lip. Very cute on S. S., but unattractive on some girls because they erroneously try to make their mouths look smaller by not applying lipstick to that lower lip. Build up the upper lip a trifle to balance the cute pout, and see if you don't like yourself better.

Question: What make-up problem is illustrated by that ace actress, Bette Davis?

Answer: The problem of large eyes, light in color, which can so easily look starey, rather than starry. Eyebrows, in such a case, should be trained down, rather than up. They should be straight, rather than curved. And never pluck them too thin—but of course, you wouldn't do that, for it ain't fashionable no mo'.

Question: What make-up problem is illustrated by that lovely person, Myrna Loy?

Answer: The difficult problem of the red-head, who simply must get herself rouge and lipstick in the new rust tone, and not wear much of either. If she has the pink-and-white skin that so often goes with red hair, let her by all means wear a creamy, pinkish powder—more creamy than pinkish—and pay no attention to the folks who urge her to try a suntan shade to cover her freckles. Mascara should be brown—on the light side, rather than dark.

Question: What's a good make-up scheme for the girl with light hair and dark skin?

Answer: Golden shade of powder—one of the many suntan shades, darker than her skin rather than lighter. Very little face rouge and bright, bright lipstick, in a clear red. If her lashes and brows are naturally dark, no mascara at all. If not, brown mascara, not black.

Question: What's a good make-up scheme for the girl with dark hair and very fair skin?

Answer: Cream or ivory powder, no face rouge, bright lipstick. Black mascara, if she needs any at all.

Question: What should the woman with gray or white hair do about make-up?

Answer: A little rouge—delicate pink—is essential to keep her from looking washed-out, no matter what her age. A little lipstick more pink or rose than red. If her lashes and brows are naturally dark, she should be a knockout. If they're not, a little dark brown mascara at night for young ladies who are "prematurely gray."

Question: Why, even on skins which are rather dry, does the nose shine?

Answer: There's an oily path, down the center of the forehead, over the nose and chin. The oil glands here work overtime. Even if your skin is dry, anoint the beak occasionally with a good astringent.

Question: What—and why—are blackheads and how to get rid of them?

Answer: The pesky curse to the human face known as the blackhead is a particle of natural oil, plus dirt, which makes an enlarged pore for itself, or settles in one already provided. Two cleansings with cold cream, plus a gentle washing with bland soap, plus the application of a warm towel to the face, will loosen these unattractive blights. When they're well loosened (and it may take a few treatments) rub gently, with a circular motion and a piece of tissue, over the affected area, to remove the blackheads. No pinching and gouging. Touch the spot afterwards with alcohol or astringent.

Question: What can be done about fingernails which break all the time?

Answer: Soak 'em in warm olive oil. Don't wear them longer than finger-tip length.

Question: What's the latest news in shades of nail polish?

Answer: The latest news is that we're getting a little more sensible about same. For everyday doin's, we are wearing the lighter, smoky rust shades. These shades blend well with the riot of colors fashion decrees. They're chic, they're ladylike, and they're not so darn pale that they look washed-out and uninteresting. For gala occasions, there are bright and deep tones, but even these have an overlying smokiness.

Question: To what extent should one try to keep up with "fashions in faces" and hair-dos?

Answer: Only so far as you please and is becoming to you. Take the best of any new trend, and pay no attention to the freakish side of it. For instance: 'tis fashionable for eyebrows to be heavier and more natural, and I think that's fine. But if some dodo in Paris told us to wear colored wigs—green and purple and so on, as actually happened once, so 'elp me, though you young things won't remember that far back—well, one should say "phooey!" to that. Remember that it takes a lot of time and money to doll your face or your hair up in some artificial manner. Fashionable ladies with plenty of dough are the target for such decrees of fashion, and it keeps money in circulation and amuses the fashionable ladies. But you and me, toots, we can't afford the regular services of expensive beauty experts, and we only look tacky if we attempt highfalutin' beauty stunts on our own.

Question: What can be done to keep pretty blonde hair from turning darker as a girl gets on into the thirties?

Answer: Rinses. Heaps of warm olive oil. Daily massage. Daily brushing. Judicious sunning. A girl can do all these things for herself. Watch out for excess oiliness. And how about dyes and bleaches, you ask? If you must resort to such, go to the best beauty parlor you can find to have it done. To make a simple comparison: if you want to tint a slip, or old summer dress or something, you feel no tremors at doing that yourself, do you? But if you wish to have a lovely evening gown dyed, you send it out to the best cleaner and dyer in town, don't you? Treat

Golden
Cleansing Cream
(CONTAINING COLLOIDAL GOLD)

BEAUTY authorities agree that thorough cleansing is the most important step in complexion care. A simple step, too, since Daggett & Ramsdell created Golden Cleansing Cream, with its remarkable new ingredient.

New Kind of Cleansing

Golden Cleansing Cream contains colloidal gold, which has an amazing power to rid skin pores of dirt, make-up and other impurities. You can't see or feel this colloidal gold, any more than you see or feel the iron in spinach. Yet its penetrating action makes Golden Cleansing Cream more thorough than ordinary cleansers, and, at the same time, tones and invigorates skin tissues.

Make This Simple Test

Apply your usual skin cleanser. Wipe it off with tissue. Then cleanse with Golden Cleansing Cream. On the tissue you will find more dirt—brought from pore depths by this more effective cleansing.

Try it tonight. See for yourself how fresh and clean Golden Cleansing Cream leaves your skin. You'll find this new cream at your drug or department store for just $1.00.

PERSONAL DAINTINESS
THE FIRST RULE OF Loveliness

Prove for Yourself that QUEST NEVER FAILS ON SANITARY NAPKINS

● Why take chances now that complete protection is so easily obtainable? The makers of Kotex bring you a new deodorant powder named Quest that positively destroys all types of napkin and body odors.

Quest is utterly effective—even on sanitary napkins. It prevents perspiration offense; assures all-day-long body freshness, yet does not irritate skin or clog pores.

Try Quest today. Use this cool, soothing powder on sanitary napkins—after the bath—under arms and for foot comfort. Quest is unscented, so does not cover up the fragrance of perfume.

And Quest costs no more than other kinds . . . only 35c for the large two-ounce can. Buy it at any drug counter.

QUEST

your hair as well as you'd treat a dress.

Question: What can be done about (1) a large nose, (2) a double chin, (3) a receding chin and (4) heavy jaws?

Answer: (1) If it's flesh and cartilage that make your nose large, you can refine it with massage. Takes heaps of time and heaps of patience, but you'll get results. Powder your nose with powder a shade darker than you use on the rest of your face. (2) If you're on a general reducing diet, your double chin will come down along with the rest of you. A lifting massage will help, too. Very important, keep your head back and up, and the double chin won't seem nearly so dreadful. (3) You can sit with your chin in hand, pooshing and pooshing, and that will help. You can train yourself to keep your chin thrust forward a little, too. I know, on account of I did it. (4) Again, a general reducing diet will take down the lower part of the face. A rouge shadow, very cleverly applied on the lower part of the pan, will help kid the public.

Question: Do the various rather high-priced cosmetics called "tissue" this and "muscle" that, really do any good?

Answer: They help some. They don't do any harm, and they often do some good. If you can afford 'em, use 'em.

Question: Can I make my eyelashes grow?

Answer: Yes, a little. By constant application of a good eyelash grower, your lashes will thicken and perhaps increase in length. The grease, too, makes the lashes look more healthy and luxuriant than they may be in reality.

Question: How do some of the movie stars get that fascinating point in the hairline? You know, the hair is parted on the side, swept straight across the head, and right at the place where one would have a widow's peak if one were that lucky, there's a little point in the hairline that's not quite a wave.

Answer: If you think this would be becoming to you, see if the following method won't achieve it: part your hair where you want it parted. Now, right at the center front, where you want that point, comb the hair back just the least bit. Just as though you were going to comb your hair straight, slick back, then stop. Then bring the hair over from its side part as you want it. You'll have a sort of cowlick right at the center front. Sometimes, the judicious plucking of a few hairs will help to give the desired pointed effect. Set the hair with lotion as you want it. Let it dry very well indeed and don't comb it out thoroughly—just sort of lift it a bit with the comb. It's pretty difficult to explain this on paper, but go ahead and experiment, and I think you'll understand better what I'm driving at.

Question: Do them there beautiful stars, with the gudgeous figures, wear girdles?

Answer: Yes, indeedy. Even if they're streamlined to the hilt, they wear a wisp of a girdle—lastex pants, or a featherweight step-in model—to give their gowns a beautiful smooth line. So, gentle reader, even if your figure is pretty durn good, wear a little something in the way of a foundation.

Question: Why, Miss Marshall, haven't you said anything about dry skins during all this tirade?

Answer: I'm coming to that. I gotta present for yuh, and it isn't a present for dry skins alone, either, though it's particularly good for dry skins. It's a lotion, of which I'm positively aching to send you a sample, and it's inexpensive to buy, non-sticky to use and serves a dozen purposes. It smooths your skin out quickly, if you're suffering from temporary roughness; it's a protection against sun and wind and "cloudy weather" burns—a blessing to be thankful for, now that summer is on our necks again. And it's a good make-up base. If you want to try it, fill in the coupon below and send it to me.

And remember that Mary Marshall is always at your service. I am only too eager to help you with your beauty problems. Just address your letter to Mary Marshall, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. That'll be all for now. Be seein' yuh next month.

back on the divan. "If I were not in pictures I'd be a real-estate woman, I'm sure. I love to look at houses, just go through them and snoop. I love to do them over. I always 'settle in,' make a home of any place where I happen to be staying, however transiently. If I stay in a hotel room overnight I order flowers, arrange my books on the tables, put out some framed photographs. My dressing room here, even my portable dressing room on the set, gets 'fixed.' Even though it may be only a bowl of flowers, or a picture of Michael, I want it to be homey, my own."

THERE is something extraordinarily rich and warm about Miriam. She talks like a character out of a book. A rapid talker, she is also a rapt listener. People come to her with their problems and their troubles. Ex-husband Austin Parker brings to her all his plans, triumphs and fears, sure of the sympathy and understanding only Miriam can give.

In Miriam's dressing room every new book worth reading was spread over the tables; a victrola poured forth symphonies, jazz songs; favors for young Michael's fifth birthday party cluttered chairs and divans; scripts, costumes, long-distance calls from New York, maids, publicity men, retakes, fittings—all these things came in for their share of attention from Miriam. She was supposedly resting during her luncheon hour and the place was like a beehive at swarming time.

You might suppose that Miriam, socially-minded, popular and sought by so many of the eminent people of the world—Lady Mendhl, Gertrude Stein, the Duke and Duchess of Kent (she lunched with the Duchess at home and reports chops and peas, much folksy talk of "where did you buy that frock?" and babies and servant problems); Mrs. Simpson (she has met Wally and reports her as a vivid, intensively vital personality, always eager to go places and do things, no sooner at one place than she is planning on going to the next) —yes, you might suppose that Miriam would take her work lightly, hold Hollywood casually, even with a touch of gay, amused condescension.

Miriam studies her scripts with the same quality of absorption with which she studies blue ships on a cream background.

Recently, while making "Woman Chases Man" (her fifth picture opposite Joel McCrea, incidentally), she did a scene where she had to appear a touch on the stiff side from champagne. The plain gingerale she was drinking on the set was hardly conducive to authentic champagne capers. It is against the Hopkins grain to fake anything. She never wears any make-up at home or on the street. So Miriam thought it over. One of her chief charms is that she doesn't send her lively mind down blazed trails of thought. She blazes her own trails and they are full of fascinating curlicues.

When you see her in this particular sequence you will find that she appears very champagne-caperish, indeed. What she did was this: she walked briskly onto the set a moment or two before Director John Blystone called "Cameras!" With her pulses racing from the rapid walk, she stopped, spun violently on her toes for fifty revolutions or so, and then, the sound stage reeling about her, she went into action before the cameras.

MIRIAM is also a realist. She may walk with kings (and Mrs. Simpson), but she never loses the "common touch." She may entertain the Maharajah of Indore in her drawing room, but she also knows full well what goes on in the kitchen, what the Maharajah is going to have to eat for dinner. She can discourse on world economics with economists, Chinese philosophy with a disciple of Lao Tse and infant feedings with any young mother.

She has an intense love of being in the center of things. When she was abroad last year, she saw to it that she was in Berlin on Hitler's birthday, in Venice at the close of the Ethiopian war to hear Mussolini broadcasting from Rome. Wherever history is being made, there Miriam would like to be. She flew over a great part of Europe on this last trip with a woman friend. When she settled in England to make a picture, she had her small son, Michael, brought over to her.

She said, "I intend to take Michael to England with me every time I go, and I'd like to go once a year to make a picture. I want him to be familiar with all of the historic spots of Europe. I want him to know languages. He had a French Mam'selle and speaks baby French right smartly. He came back from England with an English Nana and spoke so veddy, veddy British that I found myself asking him, 'What say?' "

Miriam is no snob about the things she does and likes to do. Sophisticated down to her tapering fingernails, she is quite honest when she says that she has more to learn than she will ever know. She isn't stuffy either about being a "tourist."

She says, "I am one of the best. I go to all the tourist spots. I visit the Tower of London and ask to be shown the exact spot where Mary, Queen of Scots, was executed—it was Mary, Queen of Scots, wasn't it? I stand in front of Buckingham Palace and get a thrill if the flag is up and I know that the King is 'in residence.' I gape and gawp and ask guides a million silly questions and learn a lot."

1.. CAN'T CHAFE...

The sides of Kotex are cushioned in a special, soft, downy cotton to prevent chafing and irritation. Thus Wondersoft Kotex provides lasting comfort and freedom. But sides only are cushioned — the center surface is free to absorb.

2.. CAN'T FAIL...

By actual test Kotex absorbs many times its own weight in moisture! A special "Equalizer" center guides moisture evenly the whole length of the pad. Gives "body" but not bulk — prevents twisting and roping.

3.. CAN'T SHOW...

The rounded ends of Kotex are flattened and tapered to provide absolute invisibility. Even the sheerest dress, the closest-fitting gown, reveals no tell-tale lines or wrinkles.

Goodbye FRECKLES

Send for this true story of a freckled face girl's life. Learn how her skin freckled easily — how her homely freckles made her self-conscious and miserable at fourteen — how she gave up hope of ever being popular socially, until one day she saw a Stillman's ad.

She purchased a jar of Stillman's Freckle Cream. Used it nightly. Her ugly embarrassing freckles soon disappeared, leaving her skin clear, soft and beautiful.

It's a real experience that will bring hope to you too, reprinted word for word in our booklet "Good-bye Freckles."

She adores people. When she was in Versailles Lady Mendhl gave a party for her. In Paris she saw Gertrude Stein. Her friends are everywhere, in London, Paris, Berlin, and New York. Her best friends in Hollywood are Edmund Goulding, Ex-hubby Austin Parker and Anton Litvak. "We are very good friends, Anton and I," Miriam told me, "but definitely there are no matrimonial plans.

I LIKE to have a great many people around me most of the time. There is no Garbo in me! I have never been bored with any human being. I have never met a dull person. Everyone has something to give if we care enough to drag it out. I talked to clerks in little drugstores all over Germany, to taxi drivers, concierges, shop girls, and policemen in Paris and learned a lot.

"I love luncheons and dinner parties, with plenty of good food and good talk. I love tennis parties, surprise parties, swimming parties and children's parties. I love Punch and Judy shows and word games.

She loves jokes, too. A few weeks ago she was lunching with Edmund Goulding, Anton Litvak and the Earl of Warwick, known as Michael Brooke in the movies. Austin Parker called to ask his ex-wife, who is also his best friend, whether he might borrow her car and man for the next day. His man, he said, was going to the dentist and would be off for the day. He needed the car and he needed a man to wake him in the morning, make his tea, shine his shoes, and so forth.

Overhearing the conversation, Edmund Goulding called out and offered to lend Austin Parker his man, an Englishman, who was very good, he said. The next day, promptly at eight o'clock, Austin Parker was awakened by Goulding's "man." The "man" made the morning tea, so bitter and so black that poor Parker gulped it unprotestingly only because he didn't want to be ungracious. His shoes were polished and the polish spilled into the shoes and on the floor. Two teacups and two vases were broken. When Parker left his house he was a nervous wreck; his suit was badly pressed; he was jerkily shaven and the car was driven with such speed that he was on the verge of collapse.

That noon he lunched with Miriam, Edmund Goulding, and Anton Litvak. Miriam said to him, "I'm sorry, Parker, but Edmund's man says he can't possibly stay the day with you. He says you are impossible, temperamental, sloppy, surly and hard to please." Austin Parker saw fifty-nine shades of red. He was just about to slip the last control when the "man" came in casually, took a place at the table, rubbed his hands together, gave an off-hand nod at Parker. Miriam said, "May I present the Earl of Warwick?" High, joyous and unrestrained was Miriam's laughter then.

difference, more than Lily looking pale, Grace, glowing with buoyant health.

"How do you work so hard?" I asked.

"We are strong," said Grace.

"But not strong enough," added Lily, who is a simple person, and despite her exquisite clothes, remains the thrifty well-disciplined French woman, intensely in earnest, taking everything seriously. I don't think she has had much fun.

Grace Moore gives the impression of knowing her way around and wanting you to know that she knows.

"I have had a grand time." She drawls the words, flaunts them. "Nobody can say I haven't lived! I could have got further, but I like to enjoy myself. And I'm not sorry."

She is on the defensive, this Grace Moore. Wary, quick thinking, there is little restful about her. She commands attention with the same knowing competence in which she pulled up her chair and took charge of our conversation. The parry of words is her stimulant. Under her armor of "my dears," of villas, of general braggadocio grows an honest lustiness. For this, she is likeable.

She smiled at Lily. "Our paths have always crossed," she said. "When I arrived in France to sing 'Boheme,' I was the artist receiving the fuss and ovations. Lily had just sung her first role in 'Lakme.'"

"She was the star," said Lily. "I was the debutante."

"Then, to show you what this business is," went on Grace, "one year later, Lily, the great French star, made her sensational debut at the Metropolitan."

"But we did not meet then," said Lily. "We met in 1931, when we both sang in 'Tales of 'offman.' I was the doll; Grace, the courtesan."

Miss Moore, trying a bit of Spanish on our cameraman, neglected to catch this remark.

"But tell me, Lily, how are you?" she asked, again concentrating on us.

"I have cold. Seven months I go without cold, now before I sing I get cold. I think it is hay fever."

"Hay fever!" laughed Grace. "How could you get hay fever?"

"From the air," said Lily.

"G'wan," said Grace, good-naturedly dropping her diction. "G'wan, Lily, it must be love."

AS if this were her cue, Grace Moore, up on all stock interview phrases, spoke her piece.

"I started romance at the Metropolitan," she said. "Until then nobody thought a prima donna could be happily married." Here she stopped to scream at the busy photographer. "Don't you print that picture! Tear it right up!"

Lily Pons, encouraged, asked him not to take her profile.

"Oh, you can take my profile," said Grace sweetly. Then back to love and to the marriage she so proudly wears.

"Everyone said I wouldn't make a go of it. I proved they were wrong. The other girls followed my example. Gladys Swarthout, now . . . Lily. I do not know whether she is married or not, but look what romance did for her!"

"Until a year and a half ago I was always alone," admitted Lily Pons. "When you are alone, you are lost. I sing, I go home, I sleep. What good?"

"A woman must give love in order to get it back," volunteered Grace. "No career is worth loneliness. When I look around at the old stars, with their money gone, and nobody to care about them, I shudder. Was it Henry James or Barrie who said, 'I'm living my life now so I can have roses in my garden in December?' That's the way I feel."

"Her husband is charming man," said Lily.

"So is Andre Kostelanetz," returned Grace, complimenting Lily's suitor.

There was a deadlock.

I broke it by suggesting they question each other.

Grace started with, "Is it really true that you're going to retire in five years?"

"Yes, I quit, I mean it. I work and work, for what . . . for in-come tax! Better do four operas a year and not so much in-come tax!"

ANOTHER cue for Grace. "I was only saying to Beatrice Lillie last night, we don't seem to have fun any more. All we do is work for security." This failed to jibe with Miss Moore's previous line about living her life, but it fitted the moment.

She said rich people no longer cared about security because nothing, in these days, is certain, when Lily piped up with, "I have house in Connecticut. I build swimming pool. I go three days week. It is my health. I tell you, Grace, I am country woman."

Grace chuckled. "Have you chickens, Lily?"

"No . . . but I have deer."

"I'm country-minded, too. I'm importing chickens from France. Before leaving the coast I planted one hundred-and-forty-three grapevines on my California place. Besides, I have that villa at Cannes, and I'm buying houses in Italy, England, Germany—all over. My pictures play on a percentage basis; I can't take money out of those countries, so I buy property."

"I take vacation," announced Miss Pons. "This summer I just do once week radio program."

"I'm taking a real vacation," said Miss Moore. "We've bought a yacht."

"Do you go to see each other's pictures?" I asked.

"Oh, yes!" exclaimed Lily. "Grace, I see 'When You're in Love' in Ottawa before my concert."

"What did you like best?" I asked.

Lily Pons did not hesitate. Bouncing in her chair she shouted, "'De Minnie De Moocher!'"

"That was the hardest thing I ever did," said Grace. "I was okay in my dressing room, but it was awful when I had to wriggle before all those people."

"And the sound track," added Lily. "The sound track, she make me jitters."

"Lily sang 'Minnie the Moocher,'" said Grace, "four years ago at a benefit with Helen Jepson and Gladys Swarthout."

"In pictures I am afraid," said Lily "Minnie, she not my style."

"What do you mean!" A determined note crept into Grace Moore's voice. "Your studio tried to buy it for you two years ago, but mine got it first!"

There was an awkward silence, graciously broken by Miss Moore who praised Lily's singing of "The Beautiful Blue Danube."

"I think there is a place for opera on the screen," she said, off to another stock start. "'Love Me Tonight' started a cycle. It took the high-hat off opera."

"You cannot put a whole opera into pictures," declared Lily.

"I disagree with you," said Grace.

"But," argued Lily, "all women I sing are cra-zy women. Lucia, she cra-zy, everyone she cra-zy!"

"Isn't she cute!" Grace Moore laughed appreciatively. "Lily's right. Her roles are different because she is a coloratura. However, I could do 'Louise.' Incidentally, my next picture will bring Wagner to the screen for the first time—'Lohengrin' and Elizabeth from 'Tannhaueser.' I'm going to Vienna to study for it. The story is from the novel, 'Of Lena Geyer.'"

"Mine is 'Kiki'," said Lily. "They have trouble with the writers."

"I want to ask Lily a question," said Grace, "but I don't want you to hear it."

SHE whispered into Lily's ear. Lily whispered back. When Grace heard the answer she uttered something in French. I did some rapid translating and made out the words, "I thought so." Thus, to my way of guessing, Miss Pons may be married to Andre Kostelanetz after all.

This terminated our meeting. On the way downstairs Lily told us she was leaving to do some singing in "Mees-ees-zepp-i."

"Don't come back with a southern accent," teased Grace, whose car was the first to drive in front of the door.

"I have a Nash," she explained. "I sing for them."

Lily, walking toward her car, remarked timidly, "I have a little Pack-urd."

"But they gave me mine!" sang out Miss Moore.

I watched them drive off into the distance.

Rushing to telephone the editor, I sighed with pride and relief at my achievement in bringing two famous prima donnas together. But, apparently, there is no rest for a weary reporter. All the editor said was, "Too bad you didn't get Gladys Swarthout in on it, too!"

now a Roman legionnaire—his riding won him a lead in a Western two-reeler. A short while later, his work in "Wings" raised him to star status. For the next two years, Gary was the busiest man in Hollywood. Dividing his time between courting Mexican Lupe Velez and seventeen pictures for Paramount, he found himself on the verge of a nervous breakdown.

Once again folks tried talking sense to him. What he needed was a good rest, and all that sort of thing. So Gary left on a six months' hunting safari through the African jungle, just missed getting gored by a rhino, and came back feeling fit as a fiddle. What he forgot was that Hollywood was as fine a hunting ground as the African jungle. Between Veronica Balfe, a young "huntress" from Park Avenue and a little fella called Cupid, Gary was snared. He proposed, and, of course, the lady accepted. Gary will be seen soon in "Souls at Sea," with George Raft and Frances Dee.

MILDRED KORMAN, Yonkers, New York: You bet following our Barometer is every bit as fascinating as horse-racing! In fact, from what I hear, a good many people are betting on the results. Frankly, I'd like to discourage the practice. Too much of a chance. You can't tell from one month to the next what a star's position will be. For instance, look how close to the top Flynn is in this issue. Well, from the way the requests have come in so far, it looks like Tyrone Power, sprinting up from fourth place, is going to weasel in ahead of Errol in the August Barometer. And little Deanna Durbin—but you'd better stop me. I can talk all night about this Barometer business. Besides, if you want the monthly lowdown on who the first ten are, as well as a few predictions concerning future issues' ratings, just write in. I'll keep you, or anyone else interested, posted free of charge for the next six months.

DICK POWELL (Last printed November, 1936. Total number of requests since then 414.) All a practiced biographer wants is a very few clues about a man—trifles like wavy hair, a melodious voice, roguish eyes, a boyish smile — they do the trick. He'll reconstruct you a life story with no more evidence than that. That there will be lots of admiring girls is a safe bet, says he; plenty of trouble, too; and money, easy money; and no end of chances to go wrong.

Take Dick Powell. Girls? Oh, yes, they were crazy about him, and he loved it. Used to sing to them. One little girl (couldn't have been more than fifteen, 'cause Dick was only sixteen himself) told him he had just about the swellest voice she'd heard. That gave Dick big ideas. Money ideas. He got himself three jobs all at once. Sundays, he sang in the Presbyterian Church. Wednesdays he was a Scottish Rites-man. And every Friday night he donned a prayer shawl and did some heavy chanting in the Little Rock, Arkansas, Synagogue.

Dick was alternately a studious boy and a prankster. In grammar school he became a member of that august body known as the P. I. E. (perfect in everything). However, he ended his education in high school, or rather the school ended it for him. He and a group of his buddies "borrowed" a car to ride in an Armistice Day parade, and prankster Powell was summarily dismissed.

"Aha," says your biographer, "trouble! What did I tell you?" But Dick didn't know what trouble was until, some four years later, he met Mildred Maund. She was attending a P. I. E. dance, a strange girl from the South, and she swept him off his feet. Ignoring the fact that she had come with another escort, Dick took her home. He showed himself so perfect in everything that three months later Mildred eloped with him. At the time, Dick had a good job with the telephone company. But a sixty-dollar-a-week offer from one of the country's better orchestras stifled his ambitions along that line. Opportunities thrust themselves upon Dick after that initial break. At the end of little more than a year, he was commanding a salary of $450 a week as master of ceremonies at one of Pittsburg's largest theatres.

But ol' man trouble still had his number. Life for Dick had become synonymous with business, and his frail little wife from the South languished from inattention. The couple split up shortly before Dick was called out to Hollywood to take a tenor role in "Blessed Event." That was in 1932. Once again the biographer's guess comes true. Dick had gone wrong. But there's a rock foundation of good sense in Dick's make-up. He doesn't go wrong twice. Hollywood love affairs passed him lightly by, until he was sure he had found the real thing. His marriage to Joan Blondell is no kid marriage. It will last. His latest picture is "Singing Marine."

NANCY SQUIER, Chicago, Illinois: Whaddaya mean, Joe Brown doesn't like parties? As a matter of fact he's nuts about them—especially costume parties. A short time ago, he attended four in a single week.

night at the Trocadero. Dixie Dunbar had just finished her act. To the unbelievably rapid rhythms of Fats Waller's jazz piano, Tony Martin's heart kept time. He was about to do his first vocal solo, and Darryl Zanuck, puffing at one of his everlasting cigars, was in the audience. When Tony broke into the opening bars of "You Hit the Spot," Darryl put his cigar down, let it burn out. After the show, he went back to see Tony—and that was that. A few months later he made a hit in "Sing, Baby Sing."

Sounds ridiculously easy, but back of that evening's success story is a long tale of devotion to music. Tony's a California boy, born in Oakland, on a Christmas day. As far back as he can remember Tony has had musical aspirations. The band he organized in high school was so much in demand in 'Frisco theatres, that his mother began to wonder how Tony could be passing his studies. When she discovered he wasn't, she saw to it that the band was disbanded.

But "music wherever he goes" remained the Martin motto. It proved a most painful motto to the pious brothers at St. Mary's College. When they caught Tony jazzing up some of the hymns on the chapel organ, the good brothers agreed that Tony was carrying his musical devotions to excess and asked him to leave. To make up for the fact that he had left his four years in college incomplete, his life story now ran in cycles of four years. Four years after leaving St. Mary's he was given an M-G-M contract. For a time he remained on their payroll, but was given no roles. And then, after another four-year period, RKO signed him. This studio was every bit as blind as M-G-M. Tony was stalled with promises, but in six months not a single part was found for him. He got a release from his contract and was probably looking forward to another four years' Odyssey as band leader and singing troubadour, when that amazing Zanuck chap caught up with him.

At present writing Tony is unmarried. Whether his lovely sweetheart, Alice Faye, will let him suffer on much longer in that unblessed state is one of Hollywood's burning questions. "Sing and Be Happy" is his latest picture.

I have heard of these stars all my life and would enjoy seeing some of their pictures. Is there any good reason their old films cannot be shown in local theatres? I am sure an occasional silent would be appreciated.

I know there are a number of people my age who would enjoy seeing these players and I am sure there are many older people who would love to see once again such pictures as "The Sheik," "The Kid," "The Four Horsemen," "Beau Geste," etc.—Adele Fisher, Normal, Ill.

Justice for Small Towners

Do we, the people of the small town, get justice? I am speaking of the number of poor pictures we have to put up with. If the picture rated only one star in the leading magazine critics' polls, it is sure to be shown to us very shortly after it is released. But, behold, if it is a grand film, we may see it six months afterward. By that time the film is so blemished and worn and has been patched so much that it has lost all of its charm. We realize

A 13-Year-Old Speaks Up

We children of adolescent age aren't often heard from, but, after all, we have our ideas about motion pictures, too. We're not so young that the only thing we enjoy is a picture in which a child actor or actress is starred; often that type doesn't even win our favor one hundred per cent.

I want to say in behalf of myself, and I'm sure many other children between the ages of twelve to fifteen everywhere, that Deanna Durbin, for one, deserves orchids and orchids and orchids.

Besides having a golden voice that just thrills you right down to your toes, she's a great actress and rates above Garbo any day. Her role in "Three Smart Girls" was a good one to begin with, but the way she played it made it simply superb.

She isn't a goody-goody girl like Shirley Temple, nor a brat like Jane Withers. She's just—just Deanna Durbin and I predict a great future for her as far as we kids are concerned.—Betty Hindman, Springfield, Mo.

Blushingly Yours—

Why not give the Bob Taylor fans a break? Now, for instance, in that scene in "Personal Property" where the thrilling heart throb of millions of American women sat serenely in the bath tub. Just think how much nicer it would have been if Bob could have been taking a shower with that handsome head thrust out of the top of the curtains and his shapely (I hope) legs peeking at us from underneath.

I held my breath hoping he would show his legs at sometime or other, but, alas, he did not. I would like to know just why we are deprived of seeing these two very important features. Maybe it is for the best, though, as they might not be so perfect as he, and I never could love a man with bowed legs. I lost interest in Warren William after seeing him running around in a pair of shorts, and maybe it would be that way with Bob.

I will still continue to see all the Taylor pictures, hoping some day to see him in trunks.—Billie Leer, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Robert Taylor had better look to his laurels. A certain 20th Century-Fox actor is knocking on the gateway to a million feminine hearts which Taylor couldn't even get within speaking distance of. being beautiful.

I have been taking a private census lately for my own amusement, and out of nearly twenty girls I found only two who like Taylor better than this new rave. Four have never seen this new star and have other favorites. Nine prefer him to all others, even Taylor. His name is Tyrone Power.—Donna Mae Wirth, Portland, Oregon.

Ga-Ga Over Tyrone

Nowadays girls are always sighing and saying, "Oh, Robert Taylor, isn't he handsome or isn't he just too cute for words?" Bosh—I just cannot stand him. Does he have any acting ability, or roles in his pictures that would dirty up his pretty face? No! Can he make a speech in a film that will startle you beyond words? No!

Ah, but there is a young actor who has acting ability and personality with a capital P. He is not conceited and doesn't think all the girls are ga-ga over him. He sent shivers down my spine in his magnificent speech in "Lloyds of London." Please let's have more of Power and give our playboy, Taylor, a rest.—Sylvia Shaw, Dayton, Ohio.

Poor Bob!

I've heard so many people rave about filmland's latest idol, Robert Taylor, that I felt compelled to venture my own humble opinion on this feminine heart throbber. Personally, I think he resembles a goo-goo eyed, washed-out mama's boy. I can't decide whether it's his too divine toothy smile or his immaculately groomed coiffure which has captivated so many gals' hearts. But whatever it is, I'll take vanilla. I hope I'm not too harsh on the poor guy.—Hortense Cupo, S. I., N. Y.

★★★ Cafe Metropole

If you're in the mood for a slightly mad jamboree, then this is your dish. Your dish, so to speak, is concocted mainly of satire, but it's whipped up in a manner that won't strain your mentality, just in case you had a hard day at the office.

Loretta Young is the daughter of a wealthy American manufacturer, and Tyrone Power is a young gent from these shores who finds himself the author of a bad check for a gambling debt, owed to Victor, major-domo of the Café Metropole. To pay the debt, young Mr. Power, under Victor's direction, assumes the rôle of a Russian prince whose sole duty is to marry Miss Young and collect from papa. You know what happens, but everything is done in a fine comedy vein, and the thing winds up happily for everyone, including the audience.

Both Tyrone and Loretta turn in excellent performances, and there is an equally deft portrayal by Adolphe Menjou, as Victor. Gregory Ratoff is swell as an indignant waiter, and Charlie Winninger and Helen Westley add splendid comedy. Directed by E. H. Griffith.—20th Century-Fox.

As for the story, it's one of those things about a Park Avenue chanteuse who deserts her Broadway-trained agent for someone on her own level. The broken-hearted agent scouts around for a new singer and finds Frances Langford, whom he skyrockets to radio fame in spite of her prison record, which is revealed, of course, by the mean gal from the social register.

Phil Regan is a handsome and capable hero as the agent, and Miss Langford, photographed to advantage in most of the unreeling, lends her excellent chanting to several good numbers.

This musical is terrific, colossal, stupendous and not very amusing. Its sets are amazing combinations of chromium, cellophane and imagination. Their very size tends to dwarf the entertainment offered in front of them. In one scene, a huge mirrored floor makes it impossible to see the dancing feet of George Murphy and little Peggy Ryan, which is a pity, for both Mr. Murphy and Miss Ryan are experts. The picture consists of a series of good vaudeville acts without a plausible story to bind them together.

Doris Nolan, as a batty heiress, shows promise of a fine screen future, and George Murphy, who is an excellent dancer, gets the break he should have had long ago. The best breaks, however, are handed to Ella Logan and Gertrude Niesen. Miss Logan can sing and dance and has a swell sense of comedy. Miss Niesen, treated kindly by the camera, registers well in her song numbers. Hugh Herbert, given too much to do, overdoes it. The Three Sailors come through with several good routines. Eleven-year-old Peggy Ryan does a neat impersonation of Eleanor Powell, and Henry Armetta is splendid in a burlesque of a symphony orchestra conductor. Directed by Ralph Murphy.—Universal.

★★ The Woman I Love

Almost throttled by an obviously old-fashioned and routine story, this falls short of the splendid drama it might have been. It is difficult to understand why a studio will borrow two such expensive and expert players as Paul Muni and Miriam Hopkins and put them into such threadbare surroundings.

Played against a background of the World War, "The Woman I Love" is a story of two men who love one woman. Miriam Hopkins, as the woman, is the central character. Wife of a lieutenant (Paul Muni) in the French Escadrille, she meets and falls in love with a young officer in Paris. When the young man goes to the front he is detailed to the squadron of the gal's husband. The two become fast friends and tell each other about the woman they love, not knowing they're speaking of the same young lady. The inevitable denouement arrives, according to schedule, but it will be no surprise to seasoned picturegoers. The film's assets, besides some fine air sequences, are splendid performances by Miss Hopkins, Mr. Muni and Louis Hayward in the principal roles. In the supporting cast, there is an admirable portrayal of Hayward's young brother by Wally Albright. Others outstanding are Colin Clive and Adrian Morris. Directed by Anatole Litvak.—R.K.O.-Radio.

banded together a highly competent group of young people, and together with the veteran Edward Ellis, they turn in a brace of fine portrayals which help make this good entertainment for all audiences. Story revolves about a young interne in a big city hospital. The city is run by corrupt politicians who grab what they can while the poorer classes suffer in pestilence-ridden slums. Into the young doctor's campaign to free the city from its grip of vice is woven a number of highly dramatic sequences which carry the story on its way swiftly and with considerable punch.

John Howard is admirable as the young doctor, adding another good performance to his growing list. Robert Wilcox, a newcomer, is fine as a fellow interne. This young man has a definite screen future. Edward Ellis is an excellent political boss. Nan Grey and Judith Barrett are more than competent in the romance department. Directed by Harold Young.—Universal.

★★ Think Fast, Mr. Moto

If you don't find Mr. Moto one of the most fascinating gentlemen you've met up with in celluloid in sometime, then we're—well, surprised and even disappointed. For Mr. Moto is to the Japanese what Mr. Chan is to the Chinese—a charming example of the race and a crack sleuth. Peter Lorre is a happy choice for this character and makes enough of the role so that you will no doubt be looking for his future adventures. The plot gives Mr. Moto plenty of reason for thinking fast, between straightening out smugglers, spies, murderers and a couple of young people who are madly in love but badly in need of advice. On board a giant steamer, all these intrigues are given a background which helps to build up excitement and suspense. Sig Rumann as the chief meanie and John Rogers and Murray Kinnell as assistant meanies do a good job of it, while Virginia Field and Thomas Beck satisfactorily, if not brilliantly, provide the romantic interest. Directed by Norman Foster.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ Good Old Soak

Here we have that familiar small-town character, Clem Hawley, played by Wally Beery, who, though saturated with home-brew, still retains an untarnished heart of gold. It is a role well-suited to Wallace Beery, who plays it for every laugh and tear that could be squeezed out of it. A harmless, good-natured souse, he's a constant source of exasperation to his wife, Janet Beecher, and his children, Betty Furness and Eric Linden. Everybody in town agrees that Clem is utterly worthless, but that there's something about the guy you can't help liking. And Clem finally comes crashing through with an heroic gesture which saves his son from prison, his wife from dying of disgrace and his daughter's heart from breaking. It's a fine, melodramatic climax that should wring even the toughest heart.—M-G-M.

★★ Pick a Star

Even the appearance of Laurel and Hardy, Patsy Kelly, Jack Haley (he has a streamlined singing voice), Mischa Auer, plus other dependables, does not make it the swiftly-moving, smartly-paced musical that it should be. The fault seems to lie in the plot and its treatment. The whole thing is a hokum view of Hollywood's oft-told tale: the quest for fame.

Pat Kelly's sister, beauteous Rosina Lawrence, has film aspirations. She wins a phoney contest in her native Kansas, the promoter runs off with the money, which sends her garage-man admirer (Jack

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

Haley) rushing to Hollywood to make her happy by snagging a film contract for her. Unsuccessful, he becomes a bus boy at a popular cinema night spot, hoping to contact a movie producer. Chance gives Patsy and her sister an opportunity to fly to Hollywood. It also serves to introduce Mischa Auer, playing a "ham" film Lothario and roasting the part to a delectable brown. Auer's work in the film is outstanding, although Laurel and Hardy, and the Kellys, add their hilarious moments, too. If you like slapstick overtones, you will probably like this.—Hal Roach.

★ Another Dawn

This opus is very brave, very British, and very dull. They've taken the age-old story of a woman torn between two men, one of whom is her husband, and they've neglected to give it a modern dress which might have covered its old and feeble bones. Story centers around one of those British army outposts at Dykat—good old Dykat—whose commandant, Ian Hunter, returns from a London furlough with a bride. The bride is Kay Francis, and she doesn't love her husband. She merely respects him, although she was decent enough to let him in on her feelings. There is, of course, the inevitable handsome young captain at the post. Errol Flynn is the dashing young man in the beautiful uniform, and Miss Francis immediately falls in love with him. From that moment on, the story drags along, while audiences sit back knowing that in the end Ian Hunter will follow the customary procedure and walk out of the picture, leaving the two lovers practically alone in the theatre.

Miss Francis manages to be quite effective in spite of her stilted dialogue and a couple of gowns in which she must have felt pretty silly. Ian Hunter is his usual capable self as the husband, and Errol Flynn is decorative as the young officer. Frieda Inescort is given nothing worthy of her talents. Directed by William Dieterle.—Warner Bros.

★★ As Good As Married

When a wealthy architect discovers he can save considerable money on his income tax by the simple process of getting married, he dictates a proposal to his secretary. The young lady accepts the business proposition, and the story gets under way. You know, of course, that the young lady has been in love with the handsome architect for some time, just as you know that eventually their strictly business arrangement will turn into romance. In spite of its rather obvious theme, this is amusing and entertaining mainly because it has been handled with a light touch and a sense of humor.

John Boles portrays the architect in an easy, gracious manner and shows improvement in his acting ability. Doris Nolan, while not at her best in light comedy, is attractive and completely believable as the secretary. Walter Pidgeon is excellent as a young man in love with Miss Nolan, and Tala Birell leers her way through the role of the villainess. Esther Ralston, looking young and beautiful, lends an expert touch to a role which should have been much bigger. Directed by Eddie Buzzell. —Universal.

★★ Dance, Charlie, Dance

This is the old George S. Kaufman play, "The Butter and Egg Man," slightly revised for screen purposes. With Stuart Erwin and Jean Muir in the leads, and the familiar Warner Brothers set of comedians in supporting roles, it is a light, wisecracking comedy which should please audiences who don't demand too much subtlety in their screen entertainment.

The plot concerns a couple of Broadway agents (Allen Jenkins and Charlie Foy), who have an alleged musical comedy on their hands and no money with which to produce it. A small-town gent with theatrical leanings (Stuart Erwin) takes over the show, and when "Dance, Charlie, Dance" emerges on Broadway, it's so bad it's an instant hit. Best performance in the picture is Stuart Erwin's portrayal of the ambitious young man from Athens, Illinois. Directed by Frank McDonald—Warners.

★★★ Make Way for Tomorrow

When Barkley and Lucy Cooper, after fifty years of married life, realize their home is about to be taken away from them, they call in their children and ask for help. The children, most of them married and with homes of their own, are no longer interested in the old people's problems, but after considerable wrangling they parcel their parents out—their father to one home and their mother to another. The two old people, after their years together, find a tragic unhappiness in their new life and in the realization that the years they sacrificed for their children were spent in vain.

That's the story, and it's told with such depth and feeling that most audiences will leave the theatre weeping. Its power lies in the fact that it is drawn from life itself, an honest portrait of many a family whose parents have grown too old. Victor Moore and Beulah Bondi make the old couple a tragic and lovable pair. Thomas Mitchell and Fay Bainter are outstanding as a son and daughter-in-law, and Barbara Read is splendid as a modern granddaughter. Directed by Leo McCarey.—Paramount.

★★ Internes Can't Take Money

You won't want to miss this one, for the story is interesting from first to last; it is well cast, and the players give admirable accounts of themselves. In the leading roles are Barbara Stanwyck and Joel McCrea, while the supporting players include Lloyd Nolan, Stanley Ridges, Lee Bowman, Barry Macollum and Nick Lucats.

McCrea is the young interne who has to turn down Gangster Nolan's thousand dollars in payment for an operation, since it is against the rules of the hospital to accept money. This is made doubly hard since Barbara Stanwyck, the girl Joel loves, needs just that amount so badly. Finally she resorts to stealing it from Nolan. The Stanwyck predicament is due to the fact that the underworld will only give her information C.O.D. concerning the whereabouts of her child. And thereby hangs the tale, for the aim of Barbara's existence, since serving a prison term, is to locate her missing child. Stanley Ridges, a big-shot racketeer, offers to lead her directly to the child for a thousand dollars—or else. It looks as if the latter were inevitable, and Barbara is just ready to take off with Ridges when one of the most dramatic rescues in celluloid is staged. Directed by Alfred Santell.—Paramount.

★★ Fifty Roads to Town

This is a delightful hour and a half in any theatre. It's one of those surprise pictures; you go in expecting an ordinary little comedy romance and discover you're witnessing a really hilarious piece of screen entertainment. The plot is one of those things you wouldn't believe if we told it to you, so we'll steer clear of it. You ought to know, however, that it co-stars Don Ameche and Ann Sothern, and that these two young people are a romantic team who should be seen together often. Mr. Ameche is a young man who thinks he's being frantically pursued by a process server, and Miss Sothern is convinced that Mr. Ameche is a gangster. Directed by Norman Taurog.—20th Century-Fox.

Luise Rainer is the biggest problem yet to confront the studio prop men. It seems that Miss R. has an appetite that would put a whale's to shame and that even cardboard cookies have been known to disappear on a Rainer set. In a scene from "The Emperor's Candlesticks" the other day, the cameras were grinding away as the dignified butler passed a tray of hors-d'oeuvres to Luise and then to Bill Powell. Bill groped all over the tray, then cocked that famous eyebrow at his leading lady. "Certainly strange, isn't it?" agreed Luise, turning on one of those melting glances that win Academy Awards and irate directors.

Kay Francis is becoming pretty difficult these days, it seems. She's practically impossible to interview, and then when lined up refuses to talk on anything to do with her private life or personal views. "If I'm married," she snapped at an interviewer the other day, "that's my business, and I can't see how it could concern anyone else." Well, our guess is that it might concern Delmer Daves.

Joan Blondell had her small son, Norman Barnes, Jr., on the set the other day. He was riding a kiddie-kar made by Dick Powell and proudly announced that when he grew up he was going to be just like his daddy. "I'm going to be a carpenter," he said firmly. Norman has evidently overlooked the fact that Papa is a movie star of sorts.

Who Done It? Dept.: What well-known star, estranged from his wife, recently phoned her at her home and requested her not to divorce him? It isn't because he wants to go back to the wife—he's afraid if she divorces him he'll soon have a brand-new wife on his hands, and he's enjoying himself too much now in his married-but-single bliss.

Just heard that the real reason for Connie Bennett's change of tactics on the "Topper" set was a threatened spanking. When Connie came to work on the picture she approached Director Norman McLeod. "I guess you know my reputation," she said. "What are you going to do about it if I'm temperamental on this picture?" "I'll take you across my knee and paddle you," announced McLeod. "Okay," said La Bennett, "it's a date." And the word is that the Bennett posterior received nary a whack.

Out on the "New Faces of 1937" set, the comedians aren't having much fun. The reason being that Parkyakarkus doesn't like Milton Berle, Milton Berle doesn't like Parkyakarkus, Joe Penner doesn't like Milton and Milton isn't crazy about Joe. Parkyakarkus and Joe feel that they really shouldn't care for each other under the circumstances, but can't get over a sneaking liking for each other that they've had for some fifteen years.

Don Ameche and his leadin' lady, Honore, step out a the Grove, too. Mrs. A.'s pretty enough to be his reel partner, but she'd rather play Mother to their two young heirs.

After deserting his screen fans for ages, Douglass Montgomery is back in the limelight, comforting Anne Shirley and her slightly bruised knee.

Bob Young and Missus sample the food at the Cocoanut Grove. Bob is Devoted Husband No. 1.

It's just recently that Ella Logan is beginning to look like a Promising Movie Star, as far as her wardrobe goes. For Ella wore the same suit every day for a month after arriving in town. Reason was that while in Chicago she had just accepted an offer to sing in a Florida night club, checked her trunks on the train, and was all ready to pull out when a wire came from movie moguls offering her a job here. Ella boarded a plane and headed west, while her wardrobe sped due south. Frantic wires after Ella finally collected herself were to no avail. The baggage had been mislaid, and it represented two thousand dollars worth of raiment that Ella had saved for years to buy. The day the studio signed her to a long-term contract with a fancy salary, the trunks arrived in all their pristine glory.

Marlene Dietrich's new dressing room is the last word in swank. All the walls and the ceiling are lined with mirrors; the furniture is white and silver, and the rugs white bear-skin. But despite all the grandeur, the lovely lady is unable to enjoy lunch in her fancy surroundings. It seems the food reflected in all those mirrors gives her indigestion.

Jackie Cooper and Judy Garland are at the hand-holding-at-soda-fountain stage. Which accounts for the completely dejected look on the freckled countenance of Mickey Rooney. But Mickey pulled a fast one at the studio commissary the other day. Jackie and Judy were interrupted in their soulful gazes at each other over malted milks when Mickey passed the table and yelled, "Hi, you kids!" On his arm was Sophie Tucker.

Here's one for the Crosby fans. In Hong Kong they have just released "Rhythm on the Range." The reason for the delay is that the Chinese theatre managers aren't so dumb. They waited until the festive season when the Sacred Cow is highly regarded by the people. Then great signs went up on the principal theatre, announcing the picture, "Starring prize Hollywood bull with Bing Crosby."

The cast of "I Met Him in Paris" claims that Hollywood has it all over Idaho, where the company was on location for winter sports. We watched Claudette Colbert and Robert Young out on the movie lot having a fine time on a sleigh-ride. A platform was mounted on rubber wheels and on this Claudette and Bob were merrily bouncing up and down, while Bob cracked a couple of reins over some non-existent horses. And from behind the camera, several prop men pelted the pair with great gobs of studio "snow," supposedly kicked up from the horses' hoofs. It all seemed like fun.

Francis Lederer arrived in town first, for his role in "Cape of Good Hope." It was just a matter of days until Margo planed in to start in a new film over on a rival lot. Asked about all those rumors concerning romance, Mr. L. just shakes his head and sighs, "Ah, if they were but true." You'd think that would get the gal, if nothing else could.

Elegance Note: We have it, from sources occasionally considered unimpeachable, that Helen Vinson is not one to lag behind when it comes to the little things which make for luxurious living. "Miss Vinson," according to the sources, "has installed before each of the several shower rooms located throughout her palatial new home, an electric beam which automatically starts the thermostatically controlled shower release as one enters the cubicle and which also stops the flow upon leaving."

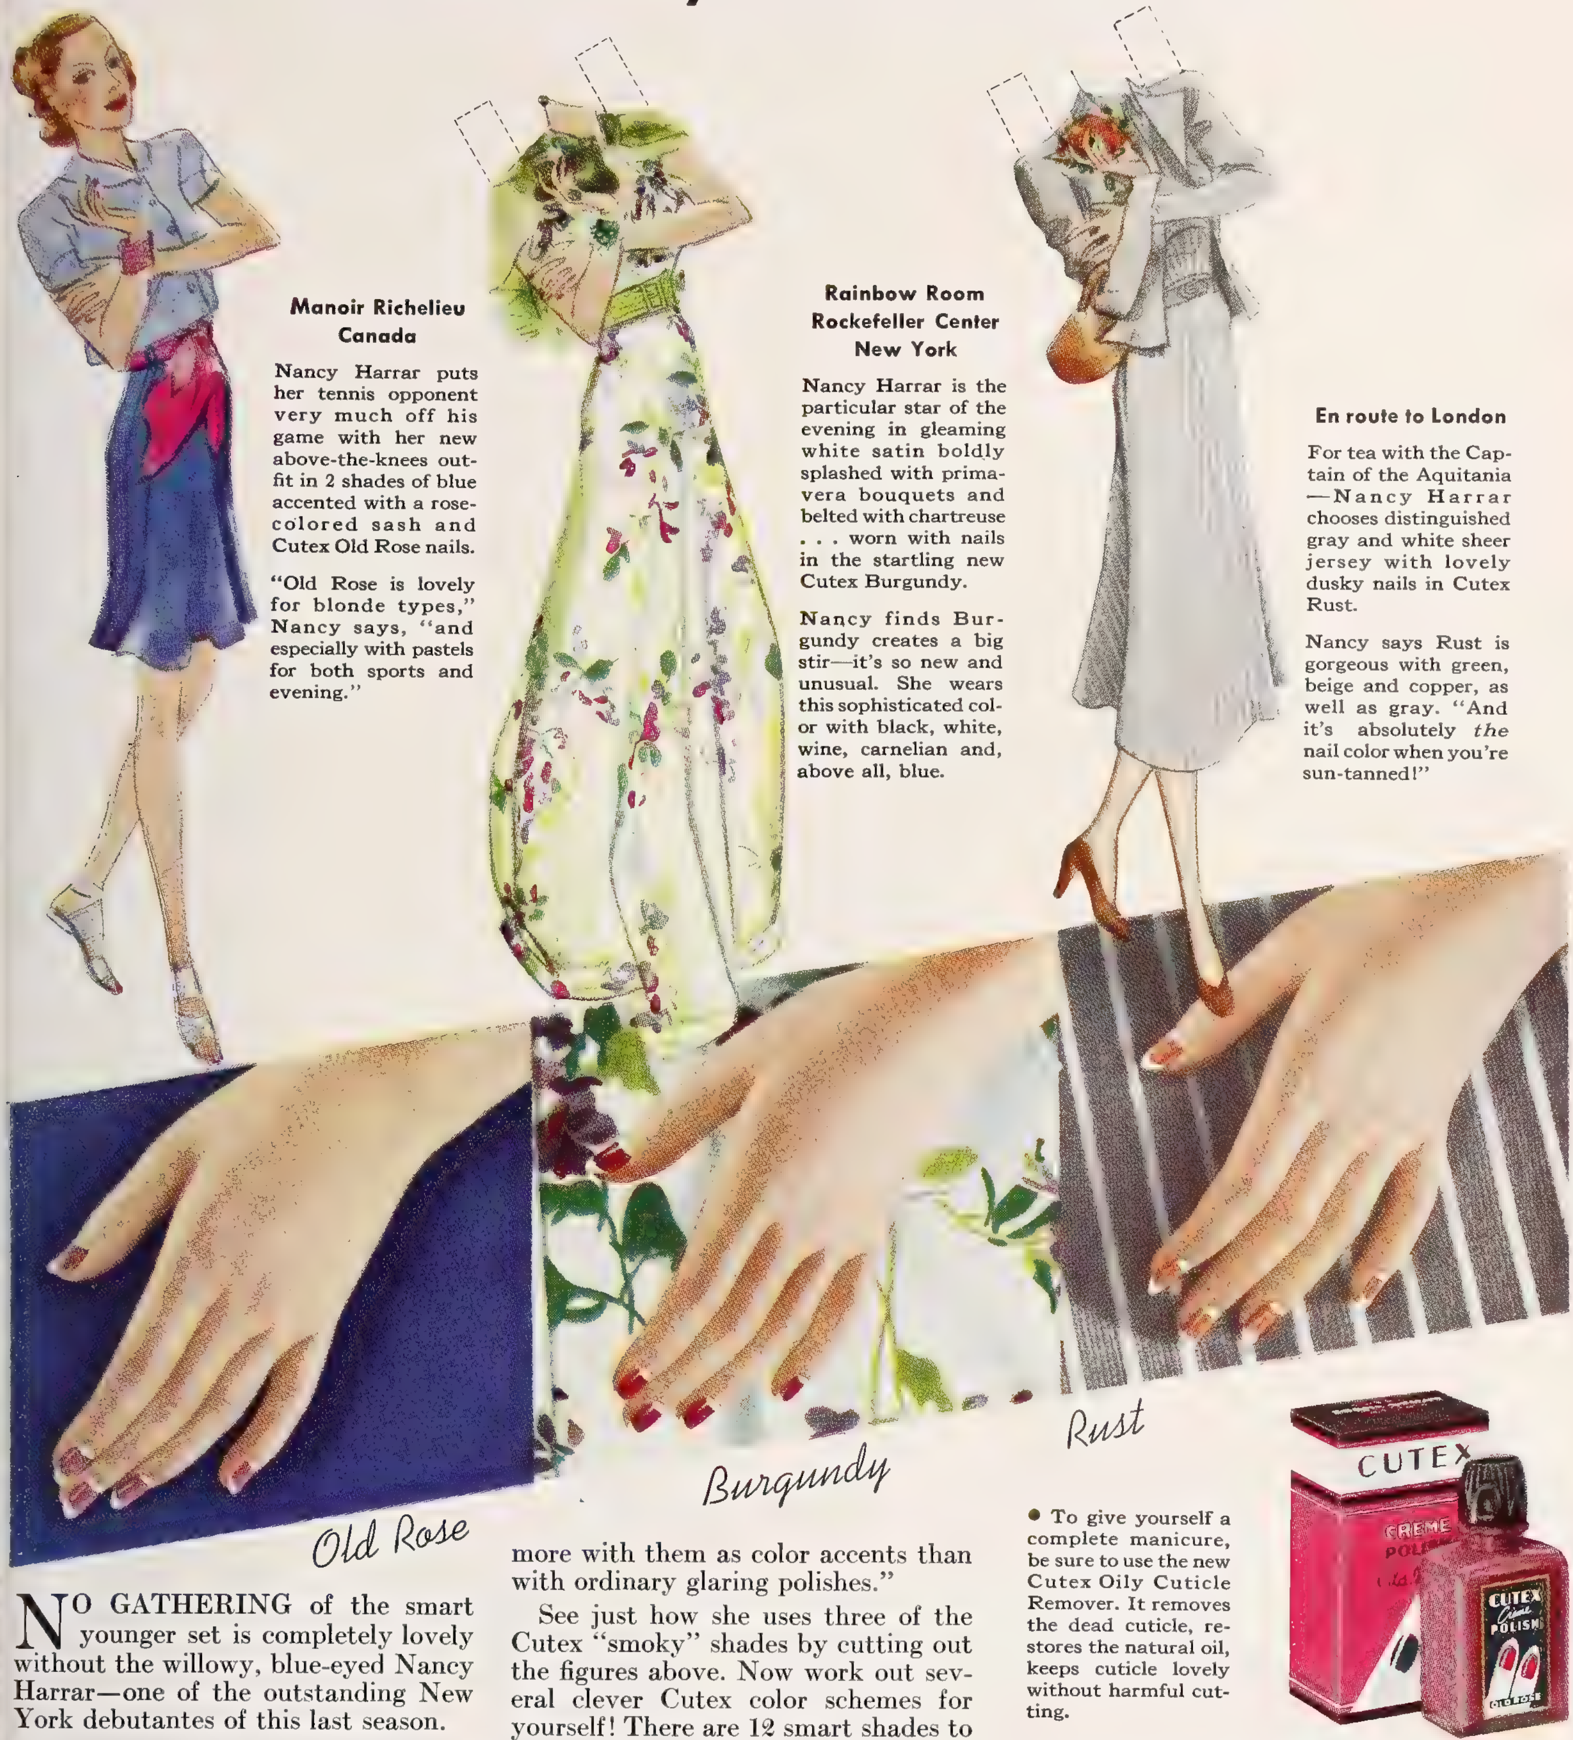
The New "Smoky" Nail Shades as Miss Nancy Harrar wears them



Manoir Richelieu
Canada

Nancy Harrar puts her tennis opponent very much off his game with her new above-the-knees outfit in 2 shades of blue accented with a rose-colored sash and Cutex Old Rose nails.

"Old Rose is lovely for blonde types," Nancy says, "and especially with pastels for both sports and evening."

Rainbow Room
Rockefeller Center
New York

Nancy Harrar is the particular star of the evening in gleaming white satin boldly splashed with primavera bouquets and belted with chartreuse . . . worn with nails in the startling new Cutex Burgundy.

Nancy finds Burgundy creates a big stir—it's so new and unusual. She wears this sophisticated color with black, white, wine, carnelian and, above all, blue.

En route to London

For tea with the Captain of the Aquitania—Nancy Harrar chooses distinguished gray and white sheer jersey with lovely dusky nails in Cutex Rust.

Nancy says Rust is gorgeous with green, beige and copper, as well as gray. "And it's absolutely the nail color when you're sun-tanned!"

NO GATHERING of the smart younger set is completely lovely without the willowy, blue-eyed Nancy Harrar—one of the outstanding New York debutantes of this last season.

Whether she's doing 18 holes of golf or playing Chopin for her friends, Nancy has the knack of making a charming color picture of herself.

Part of this glamour picture are her tapered musician's hands that she makes still more interesting with the new Cutex "smoky" polish shades. "Even the deep shades are soft and smoky," she says. "You can do a lot more with them as color accents than with ordinary glaring polishes."

See just how she uses three of the Cutex "smoky" shades by cutting out the figures above. Now work out several clever Cutex color schemes for yourself! There are 12 smart shades to choose from—Old Rose, Burgundy, Rust, Light Rust, Rose, Mauve, Coral, Ruby, Robin Red, Cardinal, Natural, Colorless. Cutex is more lustrous, too—wears for days, won't thicken up in the bottle, won't fade!

Start right now to accent your personality with 3 or 4 glamorous shades. Only 35¢ a large bottle, at any shop!

PRICELESS EYESIGHT WITH
G-E MAZDA LAMPS

Eyestrain begins when children are even younger than those in this picture ...and it persists throughout life. On an average, only 3 out of 5 children reach college age with normal vision; and only 2 out of 5 reach forty with good eyesight.

Protect your family: 1. Have their eyes examined regularly, and corrected if necessary; 2. Give them plenty of good light. A very important step in securing good lighting is to use only good lamp bulbs. Insist on MAZDA lamps made by General Electric. Look for the G-E mark on the bulb and you will be sure to get lamps that do not waste electricity and that STAY BRIGHTER LONGER.

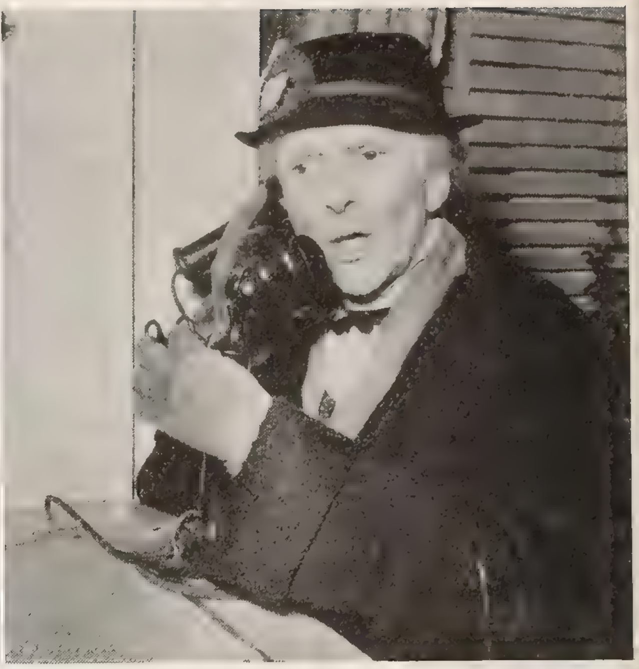
Yes, the young woman on the left and the older one on the right are the same person — Beulah Bondi.

Miss Bondi should win the Academy Award for her portrayal of Grandma in "Make Way for Tomorrow."



STAGE STRUCK

STAGE STRUCK, as a rule, is the term applied to those numerous youngsters who are severely bitten by the acting bug. But here indeed is a rare exception. Here's an experienced woman who would rather act than get paid. Yes, Beulah Bondi is stage struck after twelve years! Now, when you find a famous actress of the theatre, and the screen's most prolific portrayer of older women, stage struck, it's high time to wonder what it's all about.

To begin, Beulah Bondi is a young and extremely attractive woman. This may be news to her audience, for she has become famous for her character portrayals of women of sixty and over. She is one of the foremost exponents of charm, possessing the perquisites that are commonly considered to determine woman's power to attract. She is chic, without being obvious, delightfully refreshing and intelligent, with a wit and humor that would cause any man to be hard put to it to recall that she portrays grandmothers in most of her work before the camera. She is equally at home before the camera or behind the footlights.

"You know, I think the question that everyone, with few exceptions, has asked me is, 'Do you like the stage or the movies better?' Well, they might just as well ask whether I prefer cocoanut pie or turtle soup! They're just as different and just about as hard to compare as the stage and pictures.

"Of course, in my opinion, pictures—that is the technique—is far more difficult. In my twelve years of stage experience, I never had to work as hard to create the illusion of old age as I have in the last two characters I played for the screen. You know, on the stage, you have the benefit of lights and the set is at a distance from the audience, which helps immensely. With the screen, it's quite another matter, as the camera brings you uncompromisingly before your audience in close-up.

"It was very difficult for me to adjust myself to the movies. In fact, I've only recently become accustomed to them, and that, after three years of intensive study. Before I went to the Coast, I was scared half to death, but now I adore it, every bit of it, even to the outdoor life. I've become quite mad about the desert and spend every not-working minute off on a ranch.

"You know, I guess I love acting better than anything else. In my early days in the theatre, I used to think, 'If they would only pay me when I'm not working, they could have my salary when I'm acting.' The time I'm completely happy is when I'm doing a good day's work at the studio."

HOWEVER, let us pause to observe that these days if Miss Bondi were to be paid only when she isn't working, she couldn't be too happy, for Beulah Bondi has made seventeen pictures in the short while she has been in California and, if reports from her studio are accurate, she'll have very few spare moments in the future.

When asked how she went about the job of creating these realistic old ladies like Mrs. Andrew Jackson in "The Gorgeous Hussy" and Grandma in "Make Way for Tomorrow," she smiled and, with a twinkle in her eye said, "Truthfully, it's mostly imagination, although I do some research, too. First of all, there's one's voice. It must be old. An old voice is usually toneless. It's like a leaf. When a leaf is young, it's fresh and green and as it ages it loses color and gradually dries up. It's pretty much the same with people. They just relax and the diaphragm rests, too, the result being that old people speak on one key or in a monotone.

"I learned—speaking still of Mrs. Jackson—that there are different types of accents in the South. I had never known a woman from the hill country, so I had to use my imagination to 'get hold of' Andy's wife. Once I had her, I never let go of her until the last retakes were made, because it's much harder to get back into a character than it is to create one in the beginning.

"You know, since I was a girl I've been playing older parts even when I began in stock. I remember a time when we were playing an engagement in Indianapolis. I was quite young but was, as usual, doing an old lady. It was a dreadfully hot summer and one day the local paper remarked, 'The extreme heat we are having is very trying on the cast, particularly to the old character woman.' I was in my twenties at the time and it tickled me to death, because I knew then that I was convincing and there is nothing that makes me happier than to do a good job."

In case you don't know, and you should, Beulah Bondi was almost winner of the Academy Award for the best characterization in 1936.

By Robert H. McIlwaine

Meet Beulah Bondi, First Character Lady of Filmland

Most interesting of all was Miss Bondi's characterization of Lucy Cooper, the seventy-year-old grandmother in "Make Way for Tomorrow." And it's our guess that she will get the Academy Award for it—so we go on record with our crystal ball and present the winner for 1937!

"It was grand playing Grandma Cooper," remarked Miss Bondi. "Victor Moore is sweet to work with and everyone in the picture was so cooperative. It was my first chance at seeing how I could do an older part that ran through the entire picture and it took a lot of work. I never sleep much when I'm working and I think on 'Make Way for Tomorrow,' I slept even less.

"It was quite difficult for me to 'get hold of' Lucy Cooper and it was necessary for me stay in character all the time so as not to lose her for a moment. The hard part was that after I had gotten her down pretty well, I had to accustom myself to her moods and mode of living. She was a woman who had been married for fifty years, if you remember. That's where my imagination came in again, because I've never been married.

"The only difficult time I had during the picture was when two of my big scenes fell on the same day—the telephone scene and the one where I find the letter from the Old Ladies Home and have to tell my son that I want to go there. We did the telephone scene first and then began with the other. First, we did it from the angle that I was completely crushed. Then the director made it from the other extreme—that I was resigned and self-pitying. When this was finished, he asked me to strike a happy medium, which was the most difficult and was finally used.

"After that, I was anxious for a vacation but now that I'm away, I'm longing to get back to work! You see, I'm just as crazy to act as I was the first day I walked on a stage!"

Fred MacM. satisfies a he-man appetite in the commissary between scenes of "Exclusive."

FARE ENOUGH! SAYS FRED

MacMurray likes hearty meals whatever the season

By Marjorie Deen

THE SUMMER season always seems to cause a renewed interest in one of our favorite national pastimes. No, I don't mean baseball, I mean dieting! Come hot weather, every place you go women are discussing weight charts instead of food charts, and they no longer count the costs, but the calories!

I'd be the last one to criticize an interest in acquiring or keeping a trim and becoming-in-a-bathing-suit figure, but I'd like to remind those of you who have a man in the family to cater to that, though women must diet, men must eat! And eat they will, regardless of calendar and weather—a fact which was brought home to me forcefully the other day while lunching with Fred MacMurray in the studio commissary.

In spite of the heat, there was Fred ordering what would be described as a substantial meal any day of the year, while as a midsummer repast it would be considered bounteous. As a result, my interest in culinary matters returned with a bang, for which I was duly thankful, since I had almost begun to think that food was only one of those things you did without, to prove your strength of character.

EAT A square meal in summer? Dreadful! Obey that impulse and have dessert? Why, it just isn't being done. Oh, no? Well, just try and put that over on a man and see how far you get. It didn't take Mr. Fred MacMurray five minutes to convince me that a woman is indeed wise who gives as much thought to her summer menus as she does to those of other seasons of the year. For even though she herself may choose the "salad season" in which to diet, the man of the house still has a right to expect the hearty meals made necessary by his usual business and increased sports activities.

There's a deal of difference between hearty meals and heavy meals, as Fred pointed out, fearful that I'd make the mistake of recommending the sort of menu that neither he nor anyone else in his right senses would attempt when the days are hot and sultry. So, to make sure that I would not give Modern Screen readers the wrong impression, Fred and I went over some of his food preferences in the all too short hour allowed him for lunch between scenes of "Exclusive," in which he is co-starring with Frances Farmer.

The really enlightening results of our little cooking confab appear not only in the following paragraphs, but also in this month's Modern Hostess leaflet, in recipe form. The coupon on page 9 will bring you a copy of our attractive leaflet absolutely free. For the benefit of those who have never sent for our recipe folders before, let me say that as a reward for the small amount of effort expended, you receive home-kitchen tested recipes for the food favorites of your screen favorites. (Fred MacMurray's this month, for instance.) Time and temperature requirements are given, too. And if you want advance proof of how easy these recipes are to follow, just try the Bran Buttermilk Biscuit recipe given at the end of this article.

But I'm getting a bit ahead of myself. Let's see what you can learn from Fred on the subject of summer menus.

IN THE first place, every meal should have one substantial dish. Does that mean no salads, you may be wondering? Indeed not, for Fred is very fond of them. But they must be filling, something to sink your teeth into. Cole Slaw, Bavarian, for instance, served with rye bread, cheese and a few slices of cold meat, accompanied by a tall glass of cold beer . . . now there's a meal that would appeal to every man almost without exception. Well, you can serve just such a meal almost any day now, by sending for the leaflet which contains the recipe for that very special salad and for a cold meat idea as well.

This meat recipe should be welcome, too, for men want meat in summer as well as winter. Not hot stews, perhaps, swimming in too-rich, too-hot gravy, but some meat that can be sliced and served cold with an appetite-stimulating accompaniment of spicy mustard and crunchy pickles. In this particular case the meat recommended by Fred is Spiced Ham Loaf; easily cooked, highly seasoned and equally good hot or cold.

By the way, there's another Fred MacMurray favorite salad in the leaflet. It's Bermuda Onion Salad and a particular pet with Fred. They've actually found favor in my eyes, too, since I tried fixing them according to Fred's directions, which makes them decidedly milder. That's quite a concession on my part, so don't you turn up your nose haughtily, milady, until you've tried them.

"How about potatoes in summer?" was the next question I put to my luncheon companion. "Must you always have them for dinner?" I insisted upon knowing.

"Not necessarily," was the answer. However, Fred went on to admit a liking for at least one starchy food

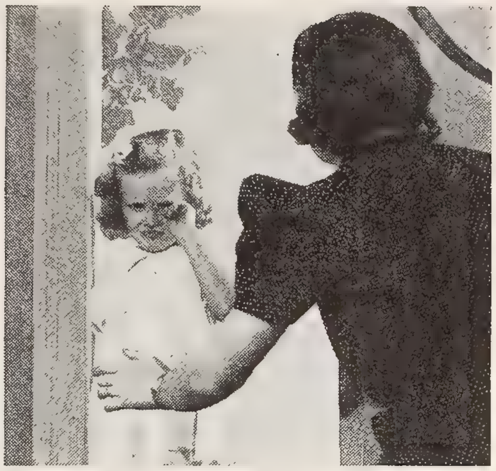
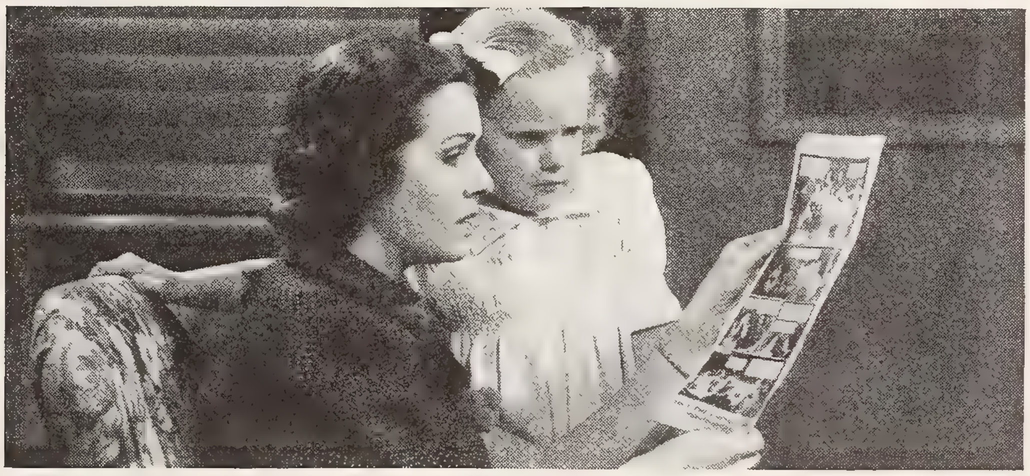
"It was worse than a slap in the face"



A few weeks ago, my little Ann came running home crying as if her heart would break. She said her playmates had been making fun of her clothes.

When the poor kid turned around, I almost dropped. Somebody had pinned one of your ads about tattle-tale gray on the back of her dress.



It was worse than a slap in the face. Where did those youngsters get the idea? Had they heard their mothers criticizing my washes? I felt like tearing that ad to bits. But luckily, I read it instead and found how the best housekeepers get tattle-tale gray in their clothes if they use a soap that leaves dirt behind.

So right away quick I changed to Fels-Naptha Soap — and am I GLAD! How those gentle suds of richer golden soap and lots of naptha hustle out every speck of dirt! My clothes lost that horrid tattle-tale gray in no time! So I made a big freezer-full of ice cream and gave those kids a "thank-you" party.

★★★ This Is My Affair

Based on a dramatic incident alleged to have occurred during the administration of President McKinley, this picture emerges as a lively and colorful highlight on the period in America when gals had hips and guys knew it. The story is concerned with a gang of bank robbers, whose activities so upset McKinley that he details a young naval lieutenant to become a member of the mob and find out the name of the man higher up who seems to guide their plunderings. The young man is Robert Taylor, who succeeds not only in getting into the gang headed by Victor McLaglen and Brian Donlevy, but in falling in love with Donlevy's sister, Barbara Stanwyck, a singer in her brother's "elite" beer hall. From this point on, effective drama is interspersed with rousing old-time vaudeville numbers in a manner that should please all types of audiences.

Robert Taylor turns in one of his finest performances, McLaglen and Donlevy are excellent as the villains, and Miss Stanwyck makes the most of her limited acting talent. Sidney Blackmer gives an astonishingly real portrayal of Theodore Roosevelt, and Frank Conroy is first-rate as President McKinley. In other supporting roles, J. C. Nugent, John Carradine, Douglas Fowley and Alan Dinehart are outstanding. Directed by William A. Seiter.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Kid Galahad

A rip-snorting, tough-guy melodrama, it's a story of the prize ring, and it's the best fight picture since Max Baer punched Primo Carnera for Myrna Loy in "The Prize-Fighter and the Lady."

All the elements of the Warner rough-and-ready epics are here: the rival managers who are also rival mob leaders, the clean young kid who gets into the fight racket, the worldly moll who falls for the kid but who knows he'll never love her, and so on and so on. The producers have taken these elements and built them into a picture which is fast, human and exciting. The prize-fight scenes themselves are excellent, and the young hero, for a change, actually looks at home in the ring. He is Wayne Morris, an athletic blond young man with a shy smile which will no doubt win him considerable favor with the ladies.

Eddie Robinson and Humphrey Bogart are the rival managers, and these two fine actors do their side-of-the-mouth stuff in the manner which has already put them in a class by themselves. Bette Davis plays the tough moll with all her expected skill. Jane Bryan continues to be one of the screen's most capable young ingenues, and Harry Carey is competent as Robinson's assistant. Directed by Michael Curtiz.—Warner Bros.

★★ There Goes My Girl

Perhaps one day the movies will make newspaper pictures in which the principals actually behave like newspaper people. Perhaps when they do, of course, no one will come to see them. At any rate, "There Goes My Girl" offers, among other things, a portrait of a newspaper gal who seems to write all her stories in her own luxurious apartment.

While we're about it, we may as well nominate Ann Sothern for "best-dressed reporter in the world," for she runs through a series of gowns that would make Kay Francis rush for the nearest journalism school. Getting back to the picture, it follows the goofy farce formula which seems to be so much in vogue these days. Miss Sothern and Gene Raymond are—surprise!—reporters on rival newspapers, and they are prevented from entering holy wedlock by Miss Sothern's managing editor, who goes to some pretty tiresome lengths to keep his star reporter from becoming Mrs. Raymond.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★★ I Met Him in Paris

Here is a completely delightful piece of screen entertainment which you can bracket among such top-flight romantic comedies as "It Happened One Night" and "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town." It is full of swell dialogue, bright comedy and nice people, and it will be liked immensely by all types of audiences.

Devotees of Claudette Colbert will be happy to know that their favorite turns in one of her most charming performances in the role of an American designer who goes to Paris for a bit of fresh air before returning to marry her rather dull fiance. In Paris she encounters Robert Young and Melvyn Douglas, a pair of upstanding Americans who immediately fall in love with her. Young wants to take her to Switzerland, so Mr. D. goes along as sort of a semi-chaperon. The snow scenes are hilariously funny, and the plight of the inexpert Bob Young on skis is something to behold. The picture drifts merrily back to Paris, where three of Miss Colbert's suitors get together and gang up on her.

Melvyn Douglas and Robert Young, in the male leads, are perfectly at home in their sophisticated comedy roles and Lee Bowman makes an auspicious screen debut as the staid fiance. Mona Barrie is effective in a supporting role. For an evening of riotous fun, try "I Met Him in Paris." Directed by Wesley Ruggles.—Paramount.

★★★ They Gave Him a Gun

When Franchot Tone, as a timid young farmer lad, is drafted into the army, he faints during his first bayonet practice. Spencer Tracy, a tough mugg from the city, prevents him from deserting, and tells him one man with a gun is more powerful than a hundred without one. The advice sinks in, and Tone goes to war and becomes a malicious killer, drunk with the power his gun gives him. At the front they both fall in love with a nurse (Gladys George), who marries Tone after she believes Tracy has been killed in action. Tracy turns up on Armistice Day, and the three of them return to America, Tracy to his old job of carnival barking and Tone, still a slave to his gun, becomes a minor racketeer. The tragedy of his existence is brought into relief to point out the tragedy of war. By showing the effect of a gun on the life of one man, this film is a bitter denunciation of war, which should prove more effective than a hundred thousand peace pamphlets.

Despite the fact one has a feeling it could have been much better, "They Gave Him a Gun" is still one of the most courageous pictures of the year. It is easily Franchot Tone's best picture performance, and Spencer Tracy, always excellent, adds another superb portrayal to his growing list. Gladys George again proves that the screen is indebted to the stage for one of the finest actresses seen in years. Directed by W. S. Van Dyke.—M-G-M.

★★ Hotel Haywire

An out-and-out farce which fits admirably under its goofy title, this little number offers no excuse for itself other than the fact that it's funny. Mixed up in it are a fake astrologer, a practical joker, who gets the tables turned on himself, an indignant wife and the inevitable pair of young lovers.

It all revolves about Lynne Overman, a respectable dentist who is given to perpetrating practical jokes on his friends. One night one of the worms turns, and Overman returns from a poker party with a pair of silk undies tucked in his pocket. Indignant wifie (Spring Byington) goes to Leo Carrillo, an astrologer who hands out phoney advice. Embarrassed hubby tries the same procedure, and the result is a series of near-slapstick comedy sequences which manage to be funny in spite of the fact that they can hardly be termed subtle.

Although Leo Carrillo turns in his usual expert performance as the mystic, it is Lynne Overman who garners most of the picture's laughs. It's the type of comedy role in which he excels, and he makes every line count. Spring Byington is effective as the wife, and Collette Lyons gets laughs as a phoney detective. Others in the cast are Benny Baker, Porter Hall, Mary Carlisle, John Patterson, George Barbier and Terry Ray. Directed by George Archainbaud.—Paramount.

SEND TODAY FOR YOUR CHART, GIVING HEIGHTS, WEIGHTS, AGES, BIRTHPLACES, ETC. OF THE STARS!

In keeping with its long established tradition of service, your Information Desk is inaugurating a new feature. Clip the coupon on this page, enclose five cents, and the Desk mails you a magnificent chart, complete with heights, weights, ages, birthplaces, real names, marriages, and children of every important star in Hollywood. Don't send any money in excess of your five cents. The Information Desk will defray all postage costs. To top the bill, the Desk plans to issue once every six months (starting January issue) an exquisite portrait of whichever star your requests have established as Barometer Leader over that period of time. Ensure getting a picture of your favorite by sending in requests galore . . . with or without coupons . . . each request counts.

If you'd like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, and, incidentally, help boost his or her standing in our Barometer, fill in and send us the coupon on this page, or, if that's too much trouble, just drop us a card. If you want the Information Desk's indispensable vital statistics chart, enclose five cents with your coupon. We answer general questions, too, either here or by mail. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

TYRONE POWER (last printed March, 1937. Total number of requests since then, 761.) Tyrone is one of nature's experiments in genius. It took a century to produce him. His father was a great actor, his grandfather was a great actor, and his great-grandfather, the original Tyrone, was a great actor. And now, Tyrone, with the aid of modern science, which spreads his stunning likeness all over the civilized globe, is rapidly proving himself the strongest branch of the family tree.

Give nature most of the credit, but reserve just a little for Tyrone, Sr., the great-souled father whose son was the apple of his eye. Let Tyrone tell you about the idyllic summer he spent with his dad, gliding down the tortuous path of a little crystal stream in Quebec, forgetting to paddle his canoe, as he recited Shakespeare, with Father Power making him repeat each line till perfect.

A pretty picture, but life had ugly, tragic pictures in store for the young Cincinnati boy. The father whom he loved was not to be with him much longer after that summer. When Tyrone and his dad entrained for Hollywood, where Power, Sr., was to do the title role in "The Miracle Man," it was the last ride they were ever to take together. On the set, in the arms of his son, the good man passed away. And with the passing away of his father, passed away Tyrone's chance to break into pictures.

For a while he lingered around Hollywood, too numbed by the tragedy to think of the future. Finally, after many months of indecision, he pushed off for Chicago, where he had the good fortune to land a job on the "Grand Hotel" radio program, which featured Don Ameche. After a two months' run in a Chicago play, Tyrone felt that he had sufficient experience to try Broadway.

The experience he had, but not quite the necessary bank-balance. There were anguishing months when he subsisted on five dollars a week, a proud boy, forced to patch his own threadbare clothes and live on coffee-pot rations, while he made his weary rounds of the disinterested producers. It was Katharine Cornell who discovered the young man. Tyrone played in two or three productions with her.

The name Cornell attracts Hollywood producers like flies. Hollywood attracts handsome young actors like flies. And so, before very long, Miss Cornell's company was on the market for a new juvenile, and Tyrone had signed a 20th Century-Fox contract. He was 22 then. Now he is 23 and a star. Very precocious in everything except self-esteem. That explains why the Sonja Henies and the Loretta Youngs of Hollywood flock about him, though there are those doubting Thomases who claim that the chiseled Gaelic poetry of his face, his raven black hair and his alert brown eyes are the real attraction. His next starring role is "Thin Ice," with Sonja Henie.

SCREEN'S NEW FAN CLUB DIRECTORY: A surprisingly large proportion of the mail addressed both to this Desk and to Between You 'n' Me is from young folks who'd like to join a fan club for a certain star, but don't know if such a club exists or whether it has any branches in their neighborhood. The Information Desk has already taken steps to put an end to that situation. We're plugging busily away at a Fan Club Directory which is going to list the name and address of every last club in the country. We'll then be able to provide a service that can find fan clubs for the fans and fans for the fan clubs. All in all, a magnificent service for any genuinely ambitious club. But we can't succeed without your help. Send us the name of your club, tell us all about your branches, and, most important, let us have your address.

DON AMECHE (Last printed January 1937. Total number of requests since then, 778.) You've probably read in a dozen different places that Amici (Don's family name before it was Americanized) means "friends." Or maybe you know Italian. But what you didn't know is that Don's name has been a symbol for the life he has lived—a life activated by the friends who did him services. Don undoubtedly inherits his faculty for making friends from his dad. Ameche the first, a Kenosha, Wisconsin, saloon-keeper, had so darned many cronies that he had to open three saloons to accommodate them all.

Don's first good friends were the four universities who refused to consider him seriously as a student. Had he graduated from any of the four, he might have become a lawyer, and that would have been a fine how-do-you-do. It was at Marquette University that he met Father Sheehy, the man who got him interested in dramatics—and in Honore Prendergast. Honore is the blonde girl to whom Don is now married. At that time, however, Don was much more impressed with dramatics than with Honore.

On Thanksgiving Day of the year 1928, a friend learned that the leading man of the local stock company had been badly smashed up in an auto crash. He recommended Don as a substitute. Don was given exactly four hours to learn a part he had never seen before. That night he made his first professional appearance.

Going to New York, he landed a Broadway job in three days, through a young actor he met on a bus. And when things fell off a bit in New York, and Don, just a trifle blue, lugged his suitcase back to good old Kenosha, another pal helped him pull through. Through Bernardine Flynn, who had known him in his stock days, he was auditioned for the "Empire Builders" program and went on the air in the fall of 1930.

Of all his friends, Don is probably most grateful to the chap who called him up one night about five years ago to ask him if he wanted a date. "Who is she?" Don wanted to know. "Don't think you know her. She's from some hick town back in Wisconsin." "Wisconsin?" Don's curiosity was piqued. "Yeah, Wisconsin. And her name's something like Pendergrass, or something. Blonde." "I'll be right over," yelled Don. Within two months, Father Sheehy, the guardian angel of their match, had married the couple. Since then they have had two sons, Donnie and Ronnie.

It was a foregone conclusion that so popular a radio figure as Don should end up in that actors' happy hunting ground, located in Hollywood. A little over a year ago, 20th Century-Fox cast him in "The Sins of Man." Don is now engaged in the business of making friends wholesale, and if his dad had a saloon in every town in Wisconsin, there still wouldn't be room for all the staunch "amici" his screen personality has won him. Don't miss "Love Under Fire."

The newest, loveliest colors....in perfect "skin-tone" harmony

BEWARE, YOUNG WOMEN! Unscrupulous flatterers of any hand are Glazo's beguiling modern "Misty" shades. Old Rose, Thistle, Rust and Russet, Suntan, Dahlia, Imperial Red ...these Complimentary Colors have a way with them...a way of adding new beauty to your manicure—and your pedicure.

But flattery from Glazo means honest admiration from beaus and escorts. So why resist its blandishments? You'll never suspect how fascinating your fingertips can be until Glazo's misty, smoky shades persuade you. That's why smart girls everywhere are losing their hearts and pledging their hands to Glazo.

A smooth article, all right, is Glazo—satin-smooth on the nail, for several extra days of wear. But for all that, a "sun-fast" friend, whose charm doesn't fade, whose flattery doesn't grow a bit "thick" with lingering in the bottle. And one that, at 25 cents, has a care for your pocketbook.

A Fan Watches a Star

Recently I had a front row balcony seat at the fights, and I not only got a splendid view of the contestants, but I had a perfect view of Bob Taylor. I was there to see two men fight it out, but when I spotted Mr. T., I watched only the high spots of the bout. . .

When the lights went out he was just as human as the rest of us; by that I mean that he didn't peer about to see who was there and just which exit he could take in order to meet the most likely autograph seekers. (I have seen some of them do it.) And when the lights were on, he was attention itself to—yes, you have guessed it—Barbara Stanwyck. Not in a showy way, but just as though he were any eligible and susceptible young bachelor taking any young and lovely lady out on a date.

After the bout I stood up and watched him, and he glanced up in my direction. When he saw me staring (and I was) he smiled, nodded, and then gently took Miss Stanwyck's arm to help her through the crowd.

When you watch a star under such conditions and discover such totally satisfying results, you have the real answer to a real test—a perfectly swell fellow with a perfectly swell future.—Angela McCormick Scellars, Los Angeles, Calif.

Gentleman Does Not Prefer Blondes

Vanity is part of woman's nature and is accepted as a matter-of-course; but the crass vanity of most of the female movie stars detracts most viciously from whatever talent as actresses they have.

No matter what the type of character portrayed, be it scrubwoman, a streetwalker, gun-moll, farm drudge, the story apparently must be so arranged to give the actress a chance to doll up and charm her public by her dazzling appearance.

The eternal, wearisome bleach-blonde is a natural result of this unfortunate vanity. In every age portrayed on the screen, from childhood to dotage, and in every type of character from kitchen drudge to princess, the glistening blonde and the permanent wave are there in all their deadliness to play havoc with realism. What a delightful relief it is to see a character with hair-colored hair once in awhile.

GENE AUTRY IN "NO CAN DO WRONG"
NOW PLAYING

Gene Autry is so-o-o popular with the kiddies, too, according to a young mother.

Spellbound

When you're at school, trying to eke out an existence on a minute allowance, money wasted on a poor movie is positively tragic. It was with clammy palms and a sinking sensation that I decided last month to spend my last forty cents on an historical movie, with a new young actor in it who meant nothing to me.

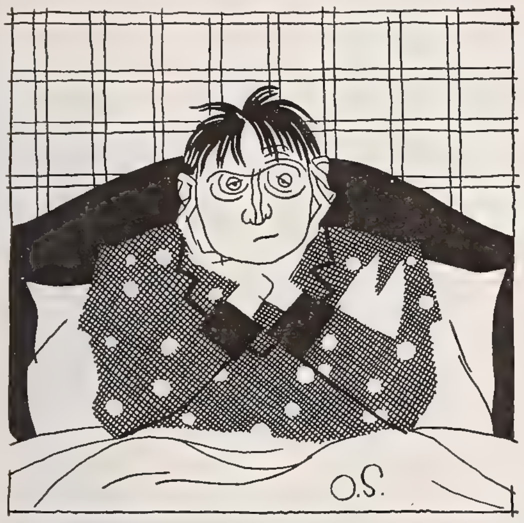
However, I emerged from "Lloyds of London" in a state of ecstasy. I loathe historical films, but it would take a heart of stone to resist the thrilling flavor of adventure which overhung Lloyd's Coffee House. English actresses leave me cold, but Madeleine Carroll's sheer loveliness left me speechless and green with envy. Unknown young heroes are usually the collar-ad type, with flashy smiles and pretty features, but Tyrone Power's superb "Jonathan" and particularly, Mr. Power himself, wove a spell around me that I am still trying to break.—Jean Rearick, Wellesley, Mass.



Movie heroes wake up looking dishevelled? Nope, it couldn't happen in pictures.

"Uncle Don" Gene Autry

Gene Autry is the one and only screen player who makes Western pictures at all endurable for me. His wonderful voice, naturalness and clean good looks are so refreshing that I don't dread a Western film anymore.

Perhaps you wonder why I attended a theatre where a Western picture was showing if I didn't like them. The reason is two youngsters who do like them and, as they are still too small to go alone, Mother naturally had to go along. I used to dread those pictures with their impossible plots, their wild shooting, using so many bullets and never hitting the broad side of a barn, until Gene's pictures came to this small town a year ago.

Now, I look forward to them as eagerly as the children do. His pictures have helped me more than I can say—to teach my children good sportsmanship, fair play and clean living, and I only wish I could thank him. My small son almost worships Gene Autry. All I need do is to ask him if he thinks Gene Autry would do this or that, and he is never in doubt about the right or wrong of an act.—Myrta Belland, Everett, Wash.

Real Guy

On a recent trip to California, we were staying at a Palm Springs hotel right next-door to Warner Baxter. We happened to see Warner and his lovely wife coming out of the hotel dining-room and went up to them. He was so gracious—signed autographs and asked us to join his little group, which included Marian Nixon. We declined, but appreciated the invitation so much. His hearty handshake is something one never forgets.

Next evening we were passing by as he came out again, and he spotted us and waved "Hello." When I told him he had been my favorite for over ten years, he said, "Please write to 20th Century-Fox. I'd love to hear from you," and it seemed sincere. However, when we passed through Hollywood, he was away on a fishing trip, and so we missed the pleasure of seeing him or his studio.—Catherine Thompson, Vancouver, B. C., Canada.

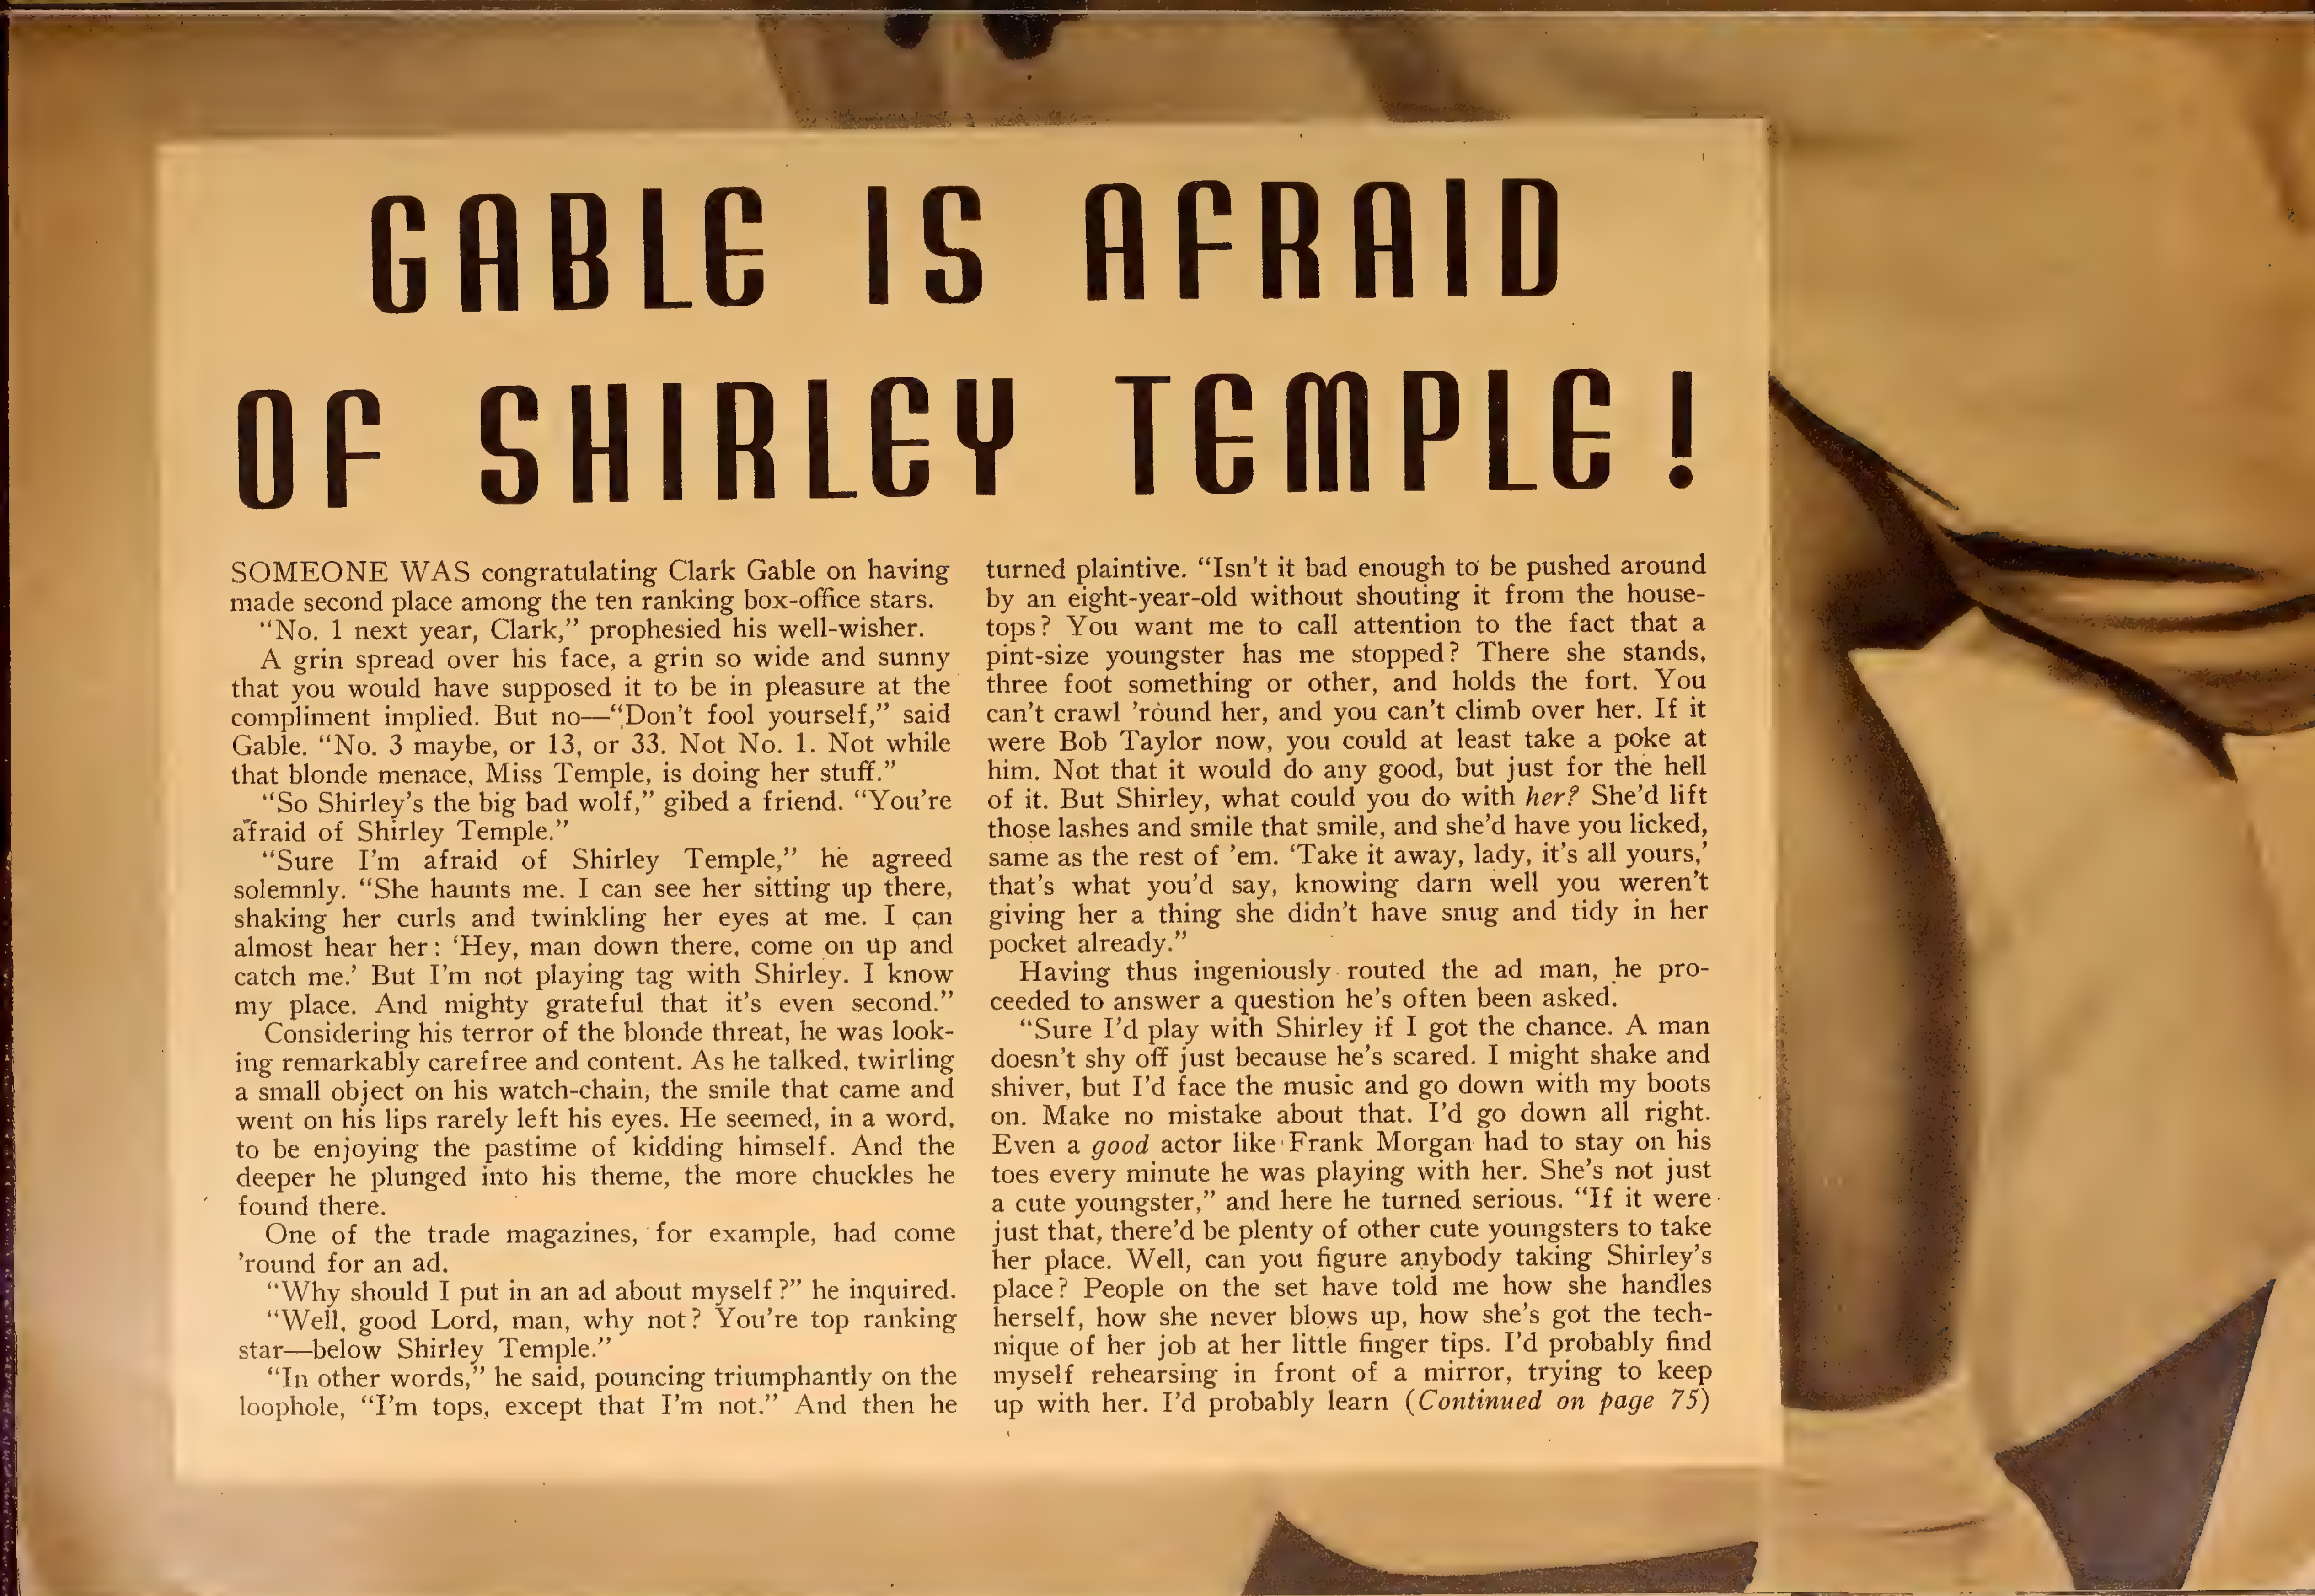
Would you believe that a big he-man is scared of a mop of curls and a dimple? Yes, and he admits it

By Ida Zeitlin

"You can take a poke at Bob Taylor," says Clark good-humoredly, "but what on earth can you do about Shirley Temple?"



GABLE IS AFRAID OF SHIRLEY TEMPLE!

SOMEONE WAS congratulating Clark Gable on having made second place among the ten ranking box-office stars.

"No. 1 next year, Clark," prophesied his well-wisher.

A grin spread over his face, a grin so wide and sunny that you would have supposed it to be in pleasure at the compliment implied. But no—"Don't fool yourself," said Gable. "No. 3 maybe, or 13, or 33. Not No. 1. Not while that blonde menace, Miss Temple, is doing her stuff."

"So Shirley's the big bad wolf," gibed a friend. "You're afraid of Shirley Temple."

"Sure I'm afraid of Shirley Temple," he agreed solemnly. "She haunts me. I can see her sitting up there, shaking her curls and twinkling her eyes at me. I can almost hear her: 'Hey, man down there, come on up and catch me.' But I'm not playing tag with Shirley. I know my place. And mighty grateful that it's even second."

Considering his terror of the blonde threat, he was looking remarkably carefree and content. As he talked, twirling a small object on his watch-chain, the smile that came and went on his lips rarely left his eyes. He seemed, in a word, to be enjoying the pastime of kidding himself. And the deeper he plunged into his theme, the more chuckles he found there.

One of the trade magazines, for example, had come 'round for an ad.

"Why should I put in an ad about myself?" he inquired.

"Well, good Lord, man, why not? You're top ranking star—below Shirley Temple."

"In other words," he said, pouncing triumphantly on the loophole, "I'm tops, except that I'm not." And then he turned plaintive. "Isn't it bad enough to be pushed around by an eight-year-old without shouting it from the house-tops? You want me to call attention to the fact that a pint-size youngster has me stopped? There she stands, three foot something or other, and holds the fort. You can't crawl 'round her, and you can't climb over her. If it were Bob Taylor now, you could at least take a poke at him. Not that it would do any good, but just for the hell of it. But Shirley, what could you do with her? She'd lift those lashes and smile that smile, and she'd have you licked, same as the rest of 'em. 'Take it away, lady, it's all yours,' that's what you'd say, knowing darn well you weren't giving her a thing she didn't have snug and tidy in her pocket already."

Having thus ingeniously routed the ad man, he proceeded to answer a question he's often been asked.

"Sure I'd play with Shirley if I got the chance. A man doesn't shy off just because he's scared. I might shake and shiver, but I'd face the music and go down with my boots on. Make no mistake about that. I'd go down all right. Even a good actor like Frank Morgan had to stay on his toes every minute he was playing with her. She's not just a cute youngster," and here he turned serious. "If it were just that, there'd be plenty of other cute youngsters to take her place. Well, can you figure anybody taking Shirley's place? People on the set have told me how she handles herself, how she never blows up, how she's got the technique of her job at her little finger tips. I'd probably find myself rehearsing in front of a mirror, trying to keep up with her. I'd probably learn (Continued on page 75)

By simply existing, this charmer, Loretta, mows men down. But so far the "hunters" haven't got her. What's the reason?

I'M NOT MARRIED BECAUSE—

Loretta Young, with beauty, fame and fortune, tells you why she's without a husband

A GIRL stood at the side of a ship, gloved hands resting on the rail. A puff of air touched the cape of her cinnamon-brown costume, turning it gently back to reveal a gay Paisley lining that matched the colors appliquéd on the shoulders. Her face was framed in a turban-like headdress of the same material, the scarf under her chin fastened at either side to a double-corded band that fitted over the crown of her head.

It was a striking costume, but once your eyes turned to the girl's face, you forgot what she was wearing. Looking at it, you felt stealing over you that sense of perfect contentment stirred by the sight of any perfect object. There was nothing you would have changed in that cream-skinned oval with its straight nose and full, sweet mouth and wide-spaced, dreaming gray eyes that seemed to hold all the serenity of the sea she was supposed to be gazing at. But the sea wasn't there, and the ship was moored to a set, and the puff of air was stirred by a wind-machine. Only Loretta Young was real.

By

"Cut!" called the director, and her quiet face broke into laughter. Don Ameche and Borrah Minnevitch, romantic and comedy leads in "Love Under Fire," had placed themselves safely outside the camera's range but within Loretta's, and were cutting fantastic grimaces at each other in some remarkable game of their own.

"You idiots!" she cried. They faced about, approached at a smart trot and stood before her, features contorted. She considered them both. "Borrah gets the award," she decided. "Sorry, Don, but you shouldn't compete with your betters. He's got the funnier face, to begin with."

Gay or tranquil, she remained utterly lovely, utterly desirable. And the question I'd come to ask her took on a more personal significance. It was no longer just a job, but something I wanted explained to myself. Here was a girl who, by simply existing, must mow men down. Every turn of her head, every change of expression spelled enchantment to the senses. How had she escaped the hunters? Why wasn't she married?

It wasn't an easy question to ask, but once it was out, she made the rest easy. A moment's reflection, then she nodded her head. "Yes, I think I can talk about that." Having agreed, there was no backing and filling. What she wanted to say, she said in straightforward fashion, without flustered reserves or coy hesitations. What she didn't want to say she kept to herself. She made it easy, too, because she's intelligent. She doesn't babble. She doesn't dish out hooey that she learned from a copy-book or thinks may sound well in a magazine. At one time and another she has searched her own mind, learned to know herself, to be honest with herself. She'll give you the honest fruit of that self-knowledge or she'll give you nothing.

"The whole thing can be summed up in a sentence," she said slowly. "I don't want to marry—I won't marry—till I meet the man I feel I can't live without.

"I'm a normal girl. I've fallen in love. If it were just a question of that, I'd have married long before now. But falling in love isn't the whole of marriage. And with me marriage has got to be for life. I can't say, 'I've made a mistake. Divorce!' My ethics, my religion, my whole outlook forbid it. When I marry, I've got to stay married. I have no choice."

With the headdress removed, her face looked lovelier than ever in its natural frame of soft brown hair. The eyes she lifted to mine had a little smile in them, but it wasn't a merry smile.

"I know what you're thinking, what anyone would be thinking at this point. About my first marriage. You see, I wasn't married to Grant Withers in the Church. It was a civil marriage and, therefore, to the Church, no marriage at all."

She paused for a moment, putting her thoughts in order; then she went on. "I don't want you to misunderstand what I'm going to tell you now. I wouldn't for the world say a word to hurt my former husband, and the whole thing isn't too easy to explain. But if I'd had to marry Grant within the Church, I might not have done it. Not that I didn't love him. I did. Not that he wasn't marvelous to me. He was.

Upon finishing "Shall We Dance" (right), Ginger Rogers makes good her threat to try drah-ma again. "Stage Door" will be the film.

SONG AND DANCE MAN

By Gladys Hall

So you won't talk, Mister Astaire? Well, there are those who will and, what's more, do—about you Will Harriet Hoctor replace Ginger as Astaire's dancing partner? Your reception of her in "Shall We Dance" and "Damsel in Distress" will undoubtedly tell.

FRED ASTAIRE is the most honest actor in Hollywood!" That's what the men who work with him—publicity men, cameramen, directors, prop men—say. And they, surely, are in a position to know. When I asked what exactly they meant by "honest," they related two anecdotes which illustrate the integrity of the man, even in matters which any other actor would consider inconsequential. Here they are:

A few days ago some informal pictures were being made of Astaire. It was suggested that he be photographed with his secretary. "But," Mr. Astaire pointed out, "my secretary isn't here. He's at home." That didn't matter, said the publicity men; they'd just use one of the boys on the set, caption the picture, "Fred Astaire and his secretary," and who would know the difference? No one. And no one would have known the difference, of course. Ah, but Mr. Astaire would have known. And he didn't make the picture. He will not "cheat" even in details.

Another time he was being interviewed. He was asked to name his favorite dish. He said noodle soup. His interrogator raised pained eyebrows and suggested that it would read better if Mr. Astaire were to say something fancier. But Astaire repeated, with that unfailing honesty of his, which does not know how to dress itself in little painted lies, "But noodle soup is my favorite dish."

THE ONLY song and dance which Fred Astaire cannot give you is a song and dance about himself. Honesty is the best policy, there's no denying that. But for purposes of interviewing it's about as helpful and comfortable as an icy shower in a sub-zero climate, sand down your back, a nail in your shoe or a leaking hot water bottle in bed.

Not that Mr. Astaire isn't all he seems to be on the screen. He is. His grace, his courtesy, his charming diffidence are not assumed along with the greasepaint. They are the inherent qualities of the man. But when you begin, matter-of-factly, to question him about his wife, his son, his home, his personal friends, the brand of toothpaste he uses, his secret sorrow, if any—any of the topics which actors from Valentino to Freddie Bartholomew have enlarged upon so verbosely and obligingly—well, you meet Astaire all right. You meet—a stare.

Fred Astaire doesn't know how to talk about himself. This is the crux of the reason why Astaire will not give folksy, intimate interviews. It isn't that he won't talk; it's that he can't. He is much too well-bred to be deliberately unobliging about anything, particularly to a lady. He said to me, half a dozen times during the three hours I spent on the set of "Shall We Dance," "I wish I could be of more help to you." He meant it, too. He has never "gone Hollywood" in the art of making glib self-revelations, confessions, chummy confidences for the public prints.

EVERY MAN on the set, from prop-man to director, calls Fred Astaire "Fred" or "Freddy." There is absolutely nothing high-brow about Fred. He isn't aloof. He isn't painfully aristocratic, despising to soil his hands in the ink-pots of the hoi-polloi.

I was reminded of the time, a number of months ago, when Adele Astaire (Lady Cavendish) was visiting in Hollywood. Acquaintances Lady-Cavendished her all over the place. It was "Lady Cavendish this" and "Lady Cavendish that" until, at last, Adele stopped all the bowing and scraping by saying, with a hearty laugh, "Not Lady Cavendish, please—Delly-Welly to you!"

Fred himself told me that one of the most interesting times he has had in pictures was when they went to the railroad yards on location for "Swing Time." He said, "I had a swell time chatting with box-car tourists. Some people would call them 'bums.' They didn't strike me that way. Most of them were intelligent chaps, good stuff in them. Down on their luck, in some cases, or inoculated with an incurable

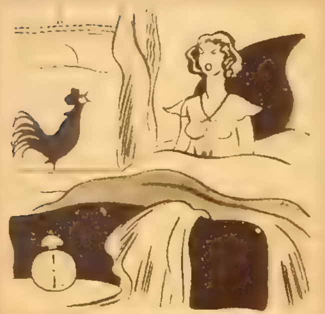
SO YOU'D LIKE TO BE A STAR?

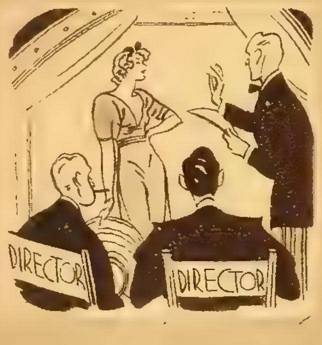
By Faith Service

Myrna Loy shows you what is back of Hollywood's glamor front

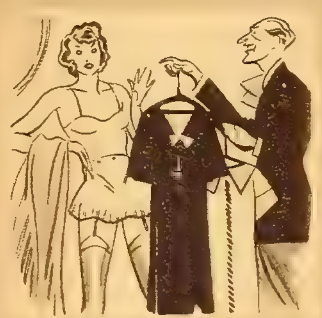
Here is a celebrity's typical routine



6 A.M. The world's asleep, with only a rooster and Miss Movie Star to greet Old Sol.



Bosses to left of her, bosses to right of her. What can a poor gal do but take it?



The first hundred fittings may be hardest, but the hundred and first is no cinch, either.

MYRNA LOY was, ostensibly, talking to me. At least I was the only person in her suite at the hotel where she and her husband, Arthur Hornblow, were living while they awaited the completion of their new home in Cold Water Canyon, Beverly Hills.

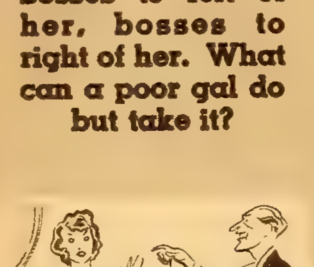
Yes, Myrna seemed to be talking to me. Actually, she was talking to you, Mary, to you, Sue, to all of you little Marys and Sues and Sarahs who wish you could be movie stars, who see them through rainbow-colored glasses—immune from the pains and problems of the workaday world.

"If they only knew," sighed Myrna. She stood there, guileless of make-up, looking very unstarrish and young-wifely, serving me and herself bread with lime marmalade and tea.

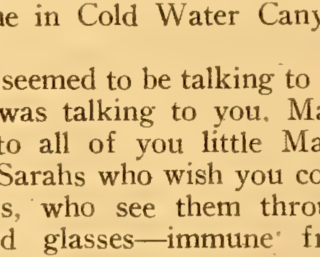
"Girls write me," Myrna explained, "like this: 'Day after day I have to sit at my typewriter. I am a secretary. My boss is a hard taskmaster. I have to do everything perfectly, or else. All I can do is take orders and like it. But you lead a glamorous life. You're paid for being made love to. Do you wonder that I envy you, who can be your own boss?'

"I'd like to tell that girl," said Myrna emphatically, "I'd like to tell her in good plain English that I am not my own boss. I'd like to tell her that I serve not one boss but several million. For my boss is—the Public. My boss is that very girl who writes me herself and thousands like her. It is the Public that first hired me, and it is the Public that can fire me. The Public criticizes me, praises me, reprimands me. If you've got any sound sense and adaptability, you can manage to please one boss. But millions! And after the Public there is the producer, the supervisor, the director, the script writer, publicity department, cameramen, sound men. I am not my own boss, girls. I am top-heavy with bosses.

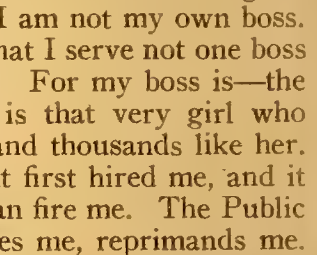
"Then there are the girls who write me like this: 'I work in a store, selling lingerie. I go to work at nine A. M. If I'm late, if I stay out a day with a cold, there is the deuce and all to pay. At five-thirty



Her working days are appointment-bound. At last a vacation? No! She's hauled back for retakes.



Even that lettuce leaf, she so carelessly ate for lunch, shows up on the fiendish scales.



"You go to such glorious parties. You're paid for being made love to. You don't have to punch a time-clock. Do you wonder that we envy you?" girls write to Myrna.

I have to punch the clock and go home. How would you like a life like that—you who can loll in the sun, plunge into swimming pools, lunch at places like the Brown Derby, the Vendome and other spots I've read about?'

"I'd like to tell such young ladies," said Myrna grimly, "that my work is nine parts drudgery and one part thrill and glamor. There is nothing I know of that is quite so exhausting as working under hot lights. It is tiresome, undoubtedly, to stand behind a counter all day or sit at a typewriter pounding the keys, but at least these girls don't have millions of watts pouring into their faces.

"I'm going to tell Sue and Sarah just exactly what I have to do to earn the glamorous reward of being a moom pitcher star. The behind-the-scenes facts, not fairy-tale publicity. Let's take 'Parnell,' my latest picture, and do a case history on that.

"Well, weeks before the actual shooting began, there were the preparations. I read twenty books on Parnell and his times. I conferred with the son of Kitty and Willie O'Shea. I wear fifteen costumes in the role of Kitty O'Shea. That meant the making of innumerable sketches by Adrian, over which he and I conferred for hours. Materials were tried and approved or rejected. There were one hundred and fifty fittings. There were the hats, hundreds of hats. There was the jewelry. That had to be just right, not only for the period, but also for me. There were the shoes. I had to practice standing and walking. Kitty O'Shea didn't stand or walk as does the girl of today.

"When we began to work I got up at six every morning, as I always do when in production. It takes from two to three hours to dress, get to the studio, have my hair dampened and waved every single morning, get into make-up and costumes. I make myself up. I can't stand having anyone fussing over me. It took me twenty minutes to get into each gown I wore. And then the set and work. Comes lunch hour. But, my dear good women, no Vendoming, no Derbying for little Myrna. No. Lunch served in my dressing-room, eaten from a tray and, usually, an interview or a conference with the director or lines to be learned (Continued on page 77)

HE WANTS TO BE ALONE

Bill Powell, eligible bachelor, becomes Hollywood hermit!

By James Reid

DEAR BILL POWELL:
Won't you please stop being a hermit for one evening and come to the party that we're giving on the fifth? It will be informal, and you will know everyone there. We have invited Jean. Couldn't both of you arrange to arrive at seven, before the others appear? It's been ages since we've seen you socially!
Love from———

That was the note the producer's wife penned. This was the reply she received:

Dear ———
I am flattered, as usual, to be asked to one of your festive gatherings. But, as usual, I must extend my regrets—and for the same old reason. I am afraid to accept.
If I should attend, I should be running the risk of alienating the affections of a number of other people whose invitations I have not accepted. Having persisted so long in being a hermit, it looks as if I am fated to continue.
Sincerely,
Bill

The producer's wife, reading Bill's note aloud to her husband, said, "This is the third time in a year that Bill Powell has dodged one of my parties. He's the most disillusioning man I've ever known! A man-about-town who always stays home. What's the matter with him, anyway? He wasn't always like this. What's changed him? Is he trying to become a man of mystery? Is he tired of seeing people? Is he bored with life?"

"Why," asked her husband, "don't you ask him?"

The lady lacked the courage. So I asked him for her. A reporter dares enter territory where producers' wives fear to tread.

I found Bill on the sidelines of "The Emperor's Candlesticks" set, regaling Luise Rainer with a story. It hardly looked as if, on the set, Bill persisted in being a hermit.

Luise was called off the set. Bill was left alone, alone and vulnerable. Before he could escape, I was upon him. He was taken unawares. But did he show it? Not Bill! With all the cordiality at his command, and that's considerable, he shook hands. He insisted on my having a chair, while he insisted on standing.

"I can think of answers faster on my feet," he said. "An old carry-over from my school days. 'Twas a rare teacher who could pin a crime on me, if I had a chance to scramble to my feet before she reached for my ear."

I TOLD him that I had searched him out to solve a mystery even more baffling than anything Nick Charles was ever called on to explain.

On the screen, he is the epitome of the man who gets out and around. Off the screen, he is the Invisible Man. Why is this so?

"I want," he said, with elaborate airiness, "to be alone."

"Absolutely alone?"

"Well, reasonably alone."

"You have no ambitions to be aloof?"

"None whatsoever. Just alone. That's all."

"You aren't bored with life?"

"No."

"Or tired of seeing people?"

"No."

"Your arteries aren't hardening prematurely?"

"They're as soft as jelly."

Bill sighed, beginning to wear under my restless grilling.

"You're sure you want my story?"

My answer was the one you would have given.

"I'm not sure I can tell it as it should be told," he said. "I haven't interviewed W. Powell on this particular subject yet, myself. I haven't exactly thought myself into privacy. It's just grown on me, like hair.

"I suppose it could be traced, indirectly, to the roles I've played. It's been my fortune, the past few years, to play a succession of clever fellows, all a bit on the smooth side. Nick Charles, for example.

"Now, there was an amusing fellow, the kind of fellow you'd like to have around. I enjoyed being around him, myself. He was eccentric, but witty and debonair. Or, if you like, a word that I loathe, 'suave.' But he has been a bit of trouble, too. You see, he looks like me. And, because of that, there are actually people who think I'm Nick, or vice versa. Hundreds of them, thousands of them.

"You should have a look at some of the fan mail. Some letters have even warned me that I'm in danger of losing Myrna's love, shaking so many cocktails. You see, they don't know William Powell. They know only that fellow on the screen. They don't suspect that I'm practically a teetotaler, that is, compared with Nick. They don't suspect that Myrna Loy really is married to someone else.

"It's flabbergasting when you first discover that, in trying to make a character natural, you've given people the idea that you're really playing yourself.

"Then, next, you discover that people expect you to exhibit those same characteristics when they encounter you in person. If you don't, they say that your directors must be geniuses, to get you to do those things on the screen. And if you do exhibit them, then you've taken to acting twenty-four hours a day, offscreen and on. (Continued on page 86)

Bill has his private reasons for demanding privacy. C'mon, eavesdrop with us and get in on the low-down.

THE INSIDE STORY

FROM THE beginning, on March 16, 1932, until the end, on April 29, 1937, one adjective was used to describe the marriage of Joan Bennett and Gene Markey. The adjective was "ideal." Even the headline that heralded their parting read, "Rift Climaxes Ideal Screen Marriage."

That headline appeared with an unexpectedness and suddenness that stunned all except those close to Joan and Gene. Those close to them were prepared.

But for five years, as far as the outside world was concerned, there was nothing to hint that the marriage of the Markeys was not everything that it appeared to be.

Until very near the end, no gossip marred the illusion. There were no hints of quarrels, no intimations even of the usual temperamental differences of the usual husband and wife. They were not exactly labeled as recluses, but everyone was convinced that they preferred their own home life to Hollywood party life. There were no outward symptoms of restlessness or discontent or incompatibility. There was no more doubt of their love for each other than there was of their love for their children —Diana, Joan's child by her first marriage, whose name had been legally changed to Markey, and the baby, Melinda.

Whenever Joan gave an interview, she did something that few actresses (thinking of their box-office appeal) had the courage to do. She talked of her husband and her children. There was something infinitely appealing about Joan, the glamorous young movie modern, also being Joan, the girl-wife and girl-mother. She became Hollywood's most radiant example of a two-career girl. Her happiness became legend.

Now, suddenly, the legend has exploded. Joan and Gene have rung down the curtain on the saga of love, in the middle of the second act. The show won't go on. They feel that they can't give convincing performances any longer. They are "incompatible."

Incompatibility is Hollywood's most popular, most polite and least convincing explanation for divorce. In the case of Joan Bennett and Gene Markey, it satisfies no one.

Joan may owe the public a fuller explanation, after all those interviews stressing her happiness; but she will give none.

The real explanation is so simple—yet so blunt, so difficult to make. . . .

It does not strictly follow the familiar Hollywood pattern. Joan's marriage has not conflicted with her career. If anything, her marriage to Gene, the dramatist, has made her a better actress.

It is not a case of wife becoming more important than husband. Gene has never suffered the title "Mr. Bennett." He has never earned less than Joan. He has never ranked lower in the Hollywood scheme of things. Today he is a producer—and, as such, controls the destinies of stars.

Neither is it a case of violent clash of temperaments. The Bennetts—Joan included—have earned a reputation for being unpredictable, but Gene's mordant sense of humor has never allowed temperament to be one of his weaknesses.

The explanation is, simply and bluntly, that Joan—who is said never to have been really in love with Gene, as he has been in love with her—has found someone else. The "someone else" is a big name in moviedom.

Ironically, it seems as if Joan Bennett has not really been in love with either of the men she has married.

The first time, that she repeated a bride's responses, Joan thought she was in love. She was sixteen at the time. She had a lonely, (Continued on page 84)

. . . DON'T LET IT

By Mary Marshall

STRUGGLE AS I do to keep any top-lofty, preachy element out of these articles, I often feel, upon rereading my printed words in a nice, fresh issue, that I haven't succeeded too well. Here we sit, we beauteh scriveners, in our fine, comfortable offices, at our fine, comfortable typewriters, and run off at the mouth about how easy it is to be beautiful.

It's oh, so easy—for the girl who makes twelve dollars a week and out of that must pay rent, board and all the rest of it. Oh, so easy—for the girl who must turn over a huge slice of her earnings to the old folks at home. Oh, so easy—for the woman with five children and no help, for the folks who live on farms and rise at dawn and work like sixty all day. They should find it quite simple to take twenty minutes out now and then to do some exercises or manicure their nails. Yes. Well, I know. Some of you may well think I have my nerve with me to talk to you about "being faithful to your beauty routines."

This article is an effort to take such people into consideration. Even if you're handicapped by money, time or trouble (a lack of the first two, and an over-abundance of the third), please don't let it get you down!

Now, so help me, this isn't publicity drivel, but the solemn truth. The four girls on these two pages had their share of woe in the early days, but something—determination or a driving ambition—kept their spirits up. But I don't wish to speak about them right this minute. After all, it's you I care about. Let's go into a ways-and-means huddle and see what can be done to get around financial beauty problems.

First place, don't fall for the bargains on the drugstore counter. You know—the come-ons which bid you buy a box of such-and-such powder for a dollar, and they'll throw in a dollar-size jar of something else which you don't exactly want. Pare your cosmetic needs down to a minimum. Buy what you need in the standard-size jars, and use things sparingly.

For instance: you can get a large jar of a good cold cream for under a dollar. A huge box of cleansing tissues for thirty-one cents. The cold cream will last at least six months. A good economy trick is to use your lipstick as face rouge—very little of it, of course, and carefully blended in. You get a perfect match this way, too. A good box of powder—you can get many brands under a dollar and if you're a little stingy with it (as one can be with powder), it will last nearly a year.

Even if you're handicapped by lack of money or time, movie

If your eyes need mascara, buy the ten-cent size. You need a deodorant—price, something under fifty cents. This isn't a vital necessity—that is, you can live without it—but it's next most important, and that's a hand lotion of some kind, which will also serve as a powder base. Heavens, I don't know when I bought my last large bottle of hand lotion. I have to have my hands in water quite a bit and use the lotion after every washing. It seems to last forever.

There, my darlings, are the average necessities, plus a brush and a comb, a nail file, an orange stick and some hairpins and bobbie pins. The trouble with so many of us is that we clutter up the bathroom shelf and the dressing table with things we don't need and seldom use, after the first fine flare of experimentation. Some of these things are all very good, and some of them are out and out rubbish, but the point is that we waste our money on them because they're cheap or kind of cute, and then we haven't the dough to pay for something we really need.

As you are able to add to your cosmetic store, I'd say that cosmetic necessities come in this order: manicure tools and preparations, a wave lotion, if you need it, a good tissue cream for dry skin, or a good astringent for oily skin, depending on your skin type. Then maybe a body brush, preferably of the long-handled variety—not only because it gets your back good and clean, but because, used "all over," it does such wonders for your circulation and makes you feel as though you'd just had a high-priced massage at some high-priced salon. It doesn't pay to buy cheap brushes, though—remember that. They get spongy and useless after one or two scrubbings. Then you might break down and buy some inexpensive, delicately scented bath salts or bath powder.

Oh, you can cut the corners in so many ways. You can make yourself a shampoo out of good white soap. Less troublesome and more pleasant if you can buy a prepared shampoo product, but I'm just telling you what you can do. If you must watch every penny, your cold cream must serve as a manicure preparation. (Continued on page 80)

A MAN IN LOVE

By Martha Kerr

Francis Lederer discusses Margo, his present love, and his affection for the women who have figured in his past

"If any man can be sure he's in love, I'm that man," says Lederer, speaking of Margo.

MARGO," SAID the man who is in love with her, "has that rarest of all qualities in a human being, the quality of absolute, how shall I say it, absolute purity. It is a quality that impresses you with the divinity of human nature."

The man in love is Francis Lederer. The debonair Francis Lederer of so many gay roles. Lederer, the sleek sophisticate, the idol of two continents. The tall, dark intellectual, emotional, and yet earthy Czecho-Slovakian to whom women of all nations have given their favors.

"I first saw Margo," Francis was saying, "in 'Crime Without Passion.' And instantly she came on the screen, I knew that here was someone completely alone and apart. She does not say words as other people say them. Her emotions she expresses so entirely in her own way. Of pure Spanish blood, she was brought up here in Hollywood by her grandmother. It a little explains Margo that she was reared by a lady very old and very wise. She was unhappy when she was first here as a child," said Francis, "because she did not speak as other children, because she was affectionate and showed her feelings. She was laughed at. And so she has what you call 'conformed' outwardly. She will kid with you, be very regular and standard at first. Then, because that is Margo, that sense of her as something rare, something very pure and very naïve comes through."

I said to this tall, slender young man, "How do you know that this is love? What test do you apply to make sure that it will last—forever?"

"If anyone can be sure," Francis said, "I should be that one. I have known so many women. Not only the exciting women of my own profession, in all countries, but also women in diplomatic circles, in society, in all the walks of life. I have seen, I have tasted so much of life, it sometimes does not seem possible. There are so many extremes of living and of loving for me to weigh, one against the other. For prior to my stage and screen experiences, the frothy life of Vienna and Berlin, Paris and London, there is my background as a child.

AT HOME, in Prague, my mother and father were divorced when we were very young, my two brothers and I. I stayed with my father; my brothers went with my mother. My father, grandmother and aunt reared me. They were stern folk, very severe. My discipline was rigid and without imagination. They did the best they knew how. It was the worst for me—save for one thing. It did give me an austerity of viewpoint which, in my later worlds, stood me in firm stead. It did toughen my morale. It did make my discriminations fast to their moorings. I was not, for instance, allowed to read anything but my textbooks. No poetry, mythology, fairy tales. I used to secrete such books, read them as I walked to and from school, hide them as I reached my house. I did not go to parties. I was unused to pleasure. When I finally did break away from that life I was shy, inhibited, frightened by the warm, luxurious and loving world. Even the first things I did on the stage were timid, unassertive things.

"I am the man born of that child. I believe that we are, all of us, the children of our childish selves. For instance, when I was about ten, I attended a temperance lecture at school. My instructor showed us the brains and bodies of human beings who were the victims of alcohol and nicotine. I resolved then that I would never smoke or drink—I never have.

SHE HAS A SYSTEM

By Ruth Rankin

When Barbara Stanwyck plans an informal party, beware! There's apt to be method in her madness

Barbara has a knack of picking the picture plums. "Stella Dallas" is the latest on her imposing list.

IT'S A great system Barbara Stanwyck has. She makes someone else do it—and like it. Breathes there a man with soul so dead who wouldn't like to do things for Barbara!

Vital energy fairly tingles to the ends of her red mop of hair. She has to be active all the time. So Barbara figures, quite neatly, that others must be happiest when they are busy. It works. It even works with her gentleman friend. And there's a tip for you, Mary. Give him a paintbrush or a hammer when he comes calling. He'll have such a good time you can't lose him. If he doesn't, you don't want him anyway.

As you may have heard rumored about, there is a lad in Barbara's life by the name of Taylor, Robert Taylor, Bob for short. He may be the most handsome dream-man on the screen to you, but he's also a darn good fence-painter, and that carries a lot of weight with the lady. Clark Gable paints a mean fence, too. So do the Marx Brothers. Not to mention Carole Lombard and the Missus Marx. Leave it to Barbara to discover what a lot of hidden talent there is around town.

Barbara and Mrs. Zeppo (Marian) Marx have bought an estate, consisting of 130 acres, out in the San Fernando Valley, where they are preparing to breed and raise the finest Kentucky-strain race horses. Marian is an expert horsewoman. She has handled her own spirited animals in horse shows all over the country.

Well, to get back to the Stan-Marx ranch, the stables and paddocks are being built first, which is the way persons who love horses do things; and after awhile Barbara and Marian will get around to a pair of farmhouses to bed themselves down in, and tie on the nosebag. Barbara is planning an Irish farmhouse, all except the mud roof which might leak during one of these good old tropical California saturations. Marian's will be an American farmhouse. They are going up on two hillcrests near each other, facing a magnificent view of the entire valley.

While the stables are being built, the Kentucky babies are boarding in Pomona, and naturally Barbara and Marian are pretty anxious to get them in their own home. Possibly rising at four-thirty in order to arrive at Pomona at six and see them work out every morning has something to do with it. Anyway, they put in the rest of the day, when Barbara isn't making a picture, at the valley ranch.

The paddock fence went up—five miles of fence—and not a painter in sight. So much construction is going on in this valley, you can't get a painter for love or money. That statement will have to be amended; it turned out that Barbara landed a group of rare painters, but not for money. We assume they did it for love, since five miles is an awful lot of fence.

Very off-hand, one Saturday, she called up Bob, Clark Gable, Carole Lombard and several others, and in the most hospitable manner she invited them to come out and see the ranch on Sunday.

"Of course," explained Barbara (but not to them), "there was absolutely nothing to see but fence."

They arrived at one o'clock, and after a decent interval to let them sort of get a breath, Marian gave them the old Huckleberry Finn build-up. Naïvely, little Miss Stanwyck plucked a paint brush out of thin air. Same for Mrs. Zeppo. Cans of paint appeared mysteriously. They began painting—you know, as if it were all a lark and such fun, and look at what you are missing.

THERE'S something hypnotic about painting," is Barbara's version. "You see someone waving a brush, and pretty soon you want to be painting, too."

And pretty soon, all of five minutes later, Bob said, "Here, let me do that for you." Sort of as if it were a big, noble, generous impulse and he couldn't bear to see the little woman slaving that way over a hot stove, when all the time he was just dying to paint.

Miraculously, paint brushes and paint appeared all over the place. Women and children were practically trampled in the stampede. And as if such eager enthusiasm for her deep-dyed plot were not enough, Mrs. Simon Legree Stanwyck thought up another one. If she started them side by side, they might chatter on the company's time. So she placed them half a mile apart. Are there no limits to this charming creature's bold cunning? She even named it a "paddock party."

By the end of the first quarter, there were a few grumbles and faint cries of dismay (Continued on page 74)

when you—not what you wear—are most important

By Ann Wills

WHENEVER I think of Anita Louise, I recall that delirious broadcast of a picture premiere where a fashion expert had been detailed to describe the stars' gowns for the listening audience. Terse and accurate, she gave a perfect pattern in words of Marlene's mysterious floating chiffons, of the tiers of fringe that made a dance of Ginger Rogers' every move. As star after star walked by, the fashion commentator reported wide-shouldered, slim-hipped ermine jackets, taffeta panniers, circular flounces of Spanish lace on regal satin. And then Anita Louise approached and the fashion expert went into a daze. "She is exquisite, she is like an April breeze—" or words to that effect. "But tell what she is wearing," the gruff stage whisper of the announcer ordered.

"Her dress is the yellow of Jersey cream, and it looks as if it were poured on her. It is perfectly simple and, oh, she looks so utterly right," the fashion reporter burst out. An accurate description as far as it went, but hardly definite enough to guide eager fingers miles away in making a copy.

And I am willing to bet you that it would be equally futile to try to describe any of the clothes in Anita Louise's private wardrobe. The girl has an uncanny knack of always dominating her clothes. Don't think that that just happens because she is an extraordinarily beautiful girl with a willowy figure and a radiant, freshly-tubbed look that makes her seem fresh as mint. It is the result of knowing her own type and selecting her clothes accordingly.

Let others crave the honors for originality in dress. Let them be the first (and the last for all she cares) to wear hats like vegetable baskets brimming over with carrots and tomatoes. Let someone else be the first to think of putting the family crest on slipper buckles. Let them go about swathed in the mysterious chiffons of an E. Phillips Oppenheim adventuress. Anita Louise knows she is not the type, and what is more important, she does not want to be. While others make (Continued on page 72)

HIS COLUMBUS COMPLEX

After years of buttling—on the screen, of course—Blore turns hotel manager in "Shall We Dance" with Ginger Rogers.

Like good old Chris, Eric is ever out for adventure.

By Virginia T. Lane

HE'S THE man with the beak, Eric Blore. A bally Briton. An ex-balloonatic with a batty right eye that won't behave. It gets you. When he rolls it, it rolls you in the aisles. But don't get him wrong. He's a clown with a Columbus complex.

Eric Blore's search for adventure has never ended. It never will. Under that comic front beats a heart that taps to thrill-time. And it's led him into many a strange by-way. Up mountains, across seven seas, from facing footlights to Minnie guns.

Blore was not overly fond of Minnie. He still maintains the English war office gave him the air on purpose. They put him in the Balloon Service. It was kind of a jumping job. You wore a parachute and jumped for your life. But Blore fooled 'em. He got so he could hear an enemy plane when it took off from the ground. Then it was a simple matter of ordering his balloon pulled down before the German showed up. But one time he forgot to listen. A Prussian pilot sneaked up in the clouds over him, and his own side opened up a barrage of anti-aircraft fire from below. A warmish situation. And right in the middle of it his ground phone rang. Would he be the guest of the South Staffordshire regiment at dinner that evening and afterwards give a concert party?

"I can't say with any certainty," said Blore. "Right now," ducking another bullet, "the odds are distinctly long!"

In the end the score was: no hits and one run (by the enemy plane). So Blore gave the concert. Between shots he'd written a skit called "The Disorderly Room," which later was to run for seven years on the stage. At the time, however, all he wanted was a laugh-getter for the Tommies. That was his work, entertaining the infantry at night and observing from the air (Continued on page 88)

aboard S.S. Conte di Savoia

YOUNG Mrs. Hammond, daughter-in-law of the former Ambassador to Spain, is an international figure in the world of society. She was educated in Rome. Made her début in New York. Traveled extensively. Mrs. Hammond is an enthusiastic traveler and swimmer. As she herself remarked, when photographed (right) at the Conte di Savoia pool: "I'm on board my favorite liner; I'm enjoying my favorite sport; I'm smoking my favorite cigarette — a Camel! So I'm happy. Camel's delicate flavor always tastes good, but especially so after a swim. Camels give my energy a cheering lift!"

These distinguished women also prefer Camel's mild, delicate taste:

Good digestion at sea too! Clear-skinned, radiant, Mrs. Ogden Hammond is a vision of charm and well-being. "Camels certainly help digestion," she says, adding, "I've smoked Camels for six years, and they never get on my nerves." Throughout the dining rooms of the Conte di Savoia, Camels are much in evidence. Smoking Camels speeds the natural flow of digestive fluids — alkaline digestive fluids — so indispensable to mealtime comfort!

BOY GETS GIRL

Eleanor Powell, first lady of the tap, is teamed with America's first gentleman of heart-throbs, Robert Taylor, in "Broadway Melody of 1938." In this opus of twinkling tunes and gay romance, the ardent Taylor both sings and dances. Line forms on the right, girls!

A movie star has no privacy at all, what with our Frank Muto totin' his camera all around Hollywood! However, Anita Louise seems to enjoy being "caught" informally.

The game's about to start, and Errol shakes his opponent's hand. Don't be deceived by the velvet clasp. There's iron in that thar forearm.

And now he swings into action. They say in Hollywood he's even better at tennis than he is at reporting a Spanish war.

GONE WITH THE-JOB

Tch, tch, Honey, Sheila Barrett would like to play Scarlett!

When Sheila Barrett, famous impersonator, learned that just about everybody was up for the role of Scarlett O'Hara in "Gone with the Wind," she decided to tackle Director George Cukor (right) for the job. And, to make it tough for him, she pictured the heroine as movie stars would portray her.

Howz about (1) Simone Simon of Paris and California—pout and all—skipping through the cotton fields jest a-tryin' an' a-tryin' to get her man? Or, (2) Honey Chile Garbo, of the Camellias, who tanks she gets Rhett. Or, (3) that south'n belle, Zasu Pitts, who'd just love to win her man in the movies—or anybody else's? And then, (4) "I'm Scollitt —oi-yoi!" Yep, Fannie Brice!

Just because she likes swing music, a lot of rumors have been popping up about Jean Harlow. She enjoys a hot trumpet and Bill Powell doesn't, so she's been dropping in on one of Hollywood's better known swing salons with Don Friede, her literary agent. (Miss H., as you know, has written a book. It may not hurt the sale of "Gone With the Wind," but still it's a book, and a couple of studios are dickering for it.) To the tune of "Basin Street Blues" Jean dreams her dreams and perhaps whips up an outline for her next novel. At any rate, she must have won her point, for one evening we dropped into the swing palace and found her there with a gent who couldn't have been anyone but Bill Powell.

Jean and Bill, incidentally, celebrated their third anniversary last month. It was the third anniversary of the day they first went out together, and three years of keeping steady company is something of a record in Hollywood. Personal to Miss H.: Why don't you two get married?

Papa Bing Crosby took four-year-old Gary Evan Crosby on the "Souls At Sea" set the other day to meet another famous Gary—a Mr. Cooper. "My!" said Mr. C. "What a fine little man. What's your name?" "Gary Crosby," replied our little man. "And who were you named after?" continued Cooper. "After you," responded young Mr. Crosby. "That's fine," said Gary. "And what does your daddy call you?" "Bucket Pants," said our hero.

Gene Autry almost lost his horse, Champion, during a recent personal appearance tour. It was in a small-town theatre, where Gene and Champion were letting the patrons see them in the flesh. Following their act, Gene removed his make-up and sought out Champion, but his screen pal was missing. Since it's pretty hard to lose a horse in a theatre, our hero decided to search the place before he looked elsewhere. Well, they finally found Champion out on the stage, watching the feature picture. Asked for a comment later, Champion stated he prefers high comedy to drama, although a good musical is not to be neighed at.

Bing Crosby has gone in for horse-racing in a wholesale manner. On July first he opened his new track at Delmar, where, according to the advertisements, "the turf meets the surf." It's all very fine, except that Mr. C. is afraid that if his own horses win at his own track—well, what would you think?

Garbo has gone democratic on us. For years the Silent One clung to a dressing-room in her studio's old dressing-room building, even after the rest of the high-priced gals on the lot had been moved into newer and fancier quarters. A couple of months ago, however, she suddenly packed up and moved into the new building. So now she has a dressing-room done up in red and white, and her two closest neighbors are the noisiest gals on the lot. They're Myrna Loy and Jean Harlow, and they're noisiest because they both have phonographs which they keep constantly employed when they're around. We wouldn't be surprised, one of these days, to see the new Garbo come trucking out of her dressing-room to the tune of one of the Harlow swing records.

ring. The scene is shot and lunch is called. Before she leaves for the commissary Peggy slips the ring off her finger and hands it to Jean, but Jean returns it. "Wear it to lunch, Peggy," she says. "Maybe you'll do yourself some good." So Peggy rushes off to startle her friends, and Jean turns to us. "I'll bet you didn't know," she says, "that we're going steady."

There's a young man who has a fine long-term contract, all as a result of the work he did in a picture in which nobody saw him. He is Buddy Clark, and the long-term contract came after the swell singing job he did for Jack Haley in "Wake Up And Live." The picture, as you know, turned out swell, and Jack Haley was so good that the studio promptly signed up Buddy Clark.

The Gable-Lombard romance rolls merrily along, and after all these months they're still one of the town's happiest pairs. A gal must be in love when she'll give up a day for a busman's holiday to watch the gentleman friend work. Carole spent a day on the "Saratoga" set recently, giving the critical eye to the Gable emoting. The word is that she highly approves.

On the "Double or Nothing" set, all is confusion. For two hours Andy Devine has been trying to toss a marshmallow into Martha Raye's mouth. The marshmallow is supposed to be a golf ball, so don't tell anyone. You'd think with such a target Andy would have no trouble at all, but, for some reason or other, every time he hits the mark, the marshmallow bounces out. "I can get it in the trap," he finally wails, "but she won't spring it."

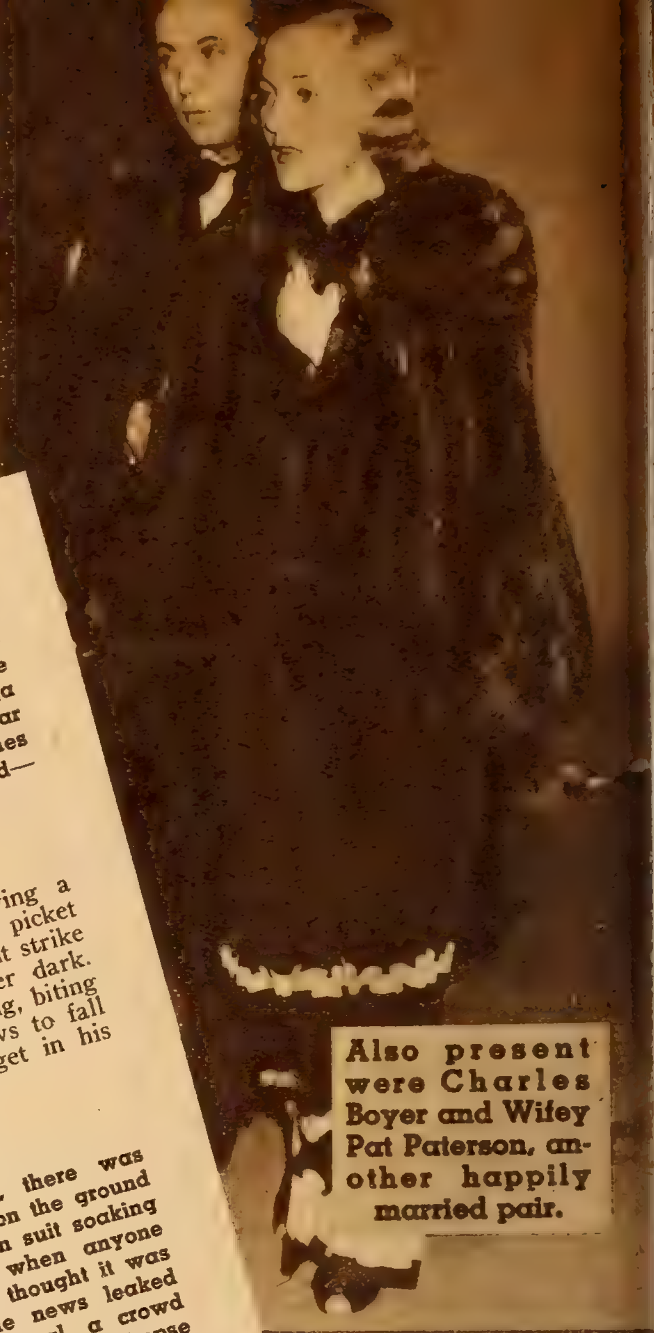
Adolphe Menjou escorted the Missus, Verree Teasdale, to the preview of "Captains Courageous."



Also present were Charles Boyer and Wifey Pat Paterson, another happily married pair.

On "That Certain Woman" set, they were doing a scene in which Henry Fonda sees his son for the first time. The boy was being played by four-year-old Billy Johnson. The scene had been rehearsed many times with Fonda grabbing the boy to his breast and murmuring, "My son, my son!" But just before the final take, the director had an idea. "Why not say, 'Do you know who I am?' as you grab him," he told Henry. Cameras went into action, lights turned on and they were ready for the take. Fonda grabbed the boy in his arms and said, "Do you know who I am?" "Sure," said Billy, "you're Henry Fonda, ain'tcha?"

A Damon and Pythias pair these days are none other than Clark Gable and Robert Taylor. For a couple of years the two have been polite toward one another, but seemed to have no desire to become old pals. But the Screen Actors' Guild has brought them together, for Clark is an ardent member of the organization, and when Bob broke down and joined forces the other day, he suddenly became Taylor's most ardent fan.

The latest young-men-about-town who have had to install private phone numbers are Billy and Bobby Mauch. Believe it or not, the twelve-year-old Mauches are so besieged by the girls that they can hardly call their lives their own any more. On that recent trip they took, the boys were met at every station by crowds of high-school girls clamoring for at least one autograph.

No star in Hollywood is watched over with such great care as Sonja Henie. Her health, her looks and her valuable limbs are the constant concern of a corps of people who travel everywhere with her—even to the corner drugstore for a chocolate soda. And they all were on the verge of nervous prostration when Sonja made her last appearance in the L. A. Polar Palace. For she had been at the polo matches the day preceding, and had caught a cold—after some fifteen years on ice!

And Edward Arnold has been having a terrible time. He was so afraid of the picket lines around the studio during the recent strike that he wouldn't go home until after dark. Sat in his dressing-room every evening, biting his nails and waiting for the shadows to fall over the studio gates, before he'd get in his car and brave departure.

Outside Garbo's dressing-room, there was noticed every morning a blanket on the ground and a blonde stretched out in sun suit soaking up some vitamin D. That is, when anyone bothered to notice, for everyone thought it was Garbo's stand-in. The day the news leaked out that it was really the Original, a crowd gathered at the fence, hoping to get a glimpse of the mystery woman. On the dot of eleven, just as the sun hit the blanket, the door of the dressing-room opened and a blonde in a sun suit appeared. But this time it was Garbo's stand-in—with the real article thoroughly enjoying the joke through the window shutter.

GO IN FOR LUXABLES

Ida Lupino tells you why

"MEN LIKE LUXABLES!" declares Ida Lupino. "There's something appealing about bandbox freshness that few men can resist. It's no trick to have things always spick-and-span—a swish through Lux and they're lovely as new!"

Leading Hollywood studios insist on this safe care for all delicate washables. "Lux protects colors," says Frank Richardson, wardrobe director at Paramount. "We're convinced it makes fabrics last longer."

Lux has none of the harmful alkali many ordinary soaps have. It eliminates cake-soap rubbing, too, that may fade colors or damage threads. Remember, anything safe in water is safe in Lux.

- On a vacation from "Artists and Models," her new picture for Paramount, Ida Lupino wears Hollywood's beloved slacks. Crisply tailored Luxables fit perfectly into any vacation plans from Maine to California.

- White organdy, fresh as a sprig of mint, was made for heart throbs. Lux care will keep your feminine washables romantically lovely all summer long.

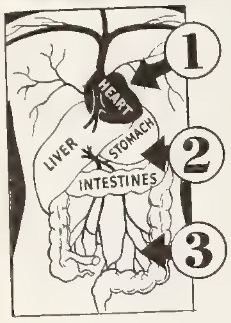
THIS NEW 3-WAY TREATMENT HAS PUT ON SOLID POUNDS FOR THOUSANDS OF SKINNY PEOPLE



Rich red blood, necessary to properly nourish and build up every part of the body, is especially promoted by this new discovery where iron is needed.

A healthy digestion which gets ALL the good out of your food requires an adequate supply of Vitamin B. This new discovery supplies this element.

Normal, regular elimination to remove poisons and thereby promote health and growth calls for adequate Vitamin B. This is the third purpose.

QUICK GAINS OF 10 TO 25 LBS. REPORTED WITH NEW IRONIZED YEAST

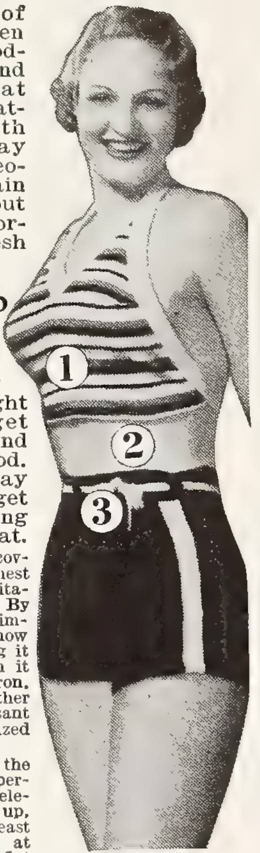
NOW thousands of skinny, rundown men and women can say goodbye to bony angles and unsightly hollows that rob them of natural attractiveness. For with this new easy 3-way treatment, hosts of people who never could gain an ounce before have put on pounds of solid, normally good-looking flesh —in just a few weeks!

Why it builds up so quick

Doctors now know that the real reason why many do not gain weight is that they don't get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Without these you may lack appetite and not get the most body-building good out of what you eat.

Now scientists have discovered that one of the richest sources of health-building Vitamin B is English ale yeast. By a new process the finest imported English ale yeast is now concentrated 7 times, making it 7 times more powerful. Then it is combined with 3 kinds of iron, pasteurized whole yeast and other valuable ingredients in pleasant little tablets called Ironized Yeast tablets.

If you, too, are one of the many "skinny," wornout persons who need these vital elements to aid in building you up, get these new Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist at once. Day after day watch flat chest develop and skinny limbs round out to normal attractiveness. Indigestion and constipation from the same source quickly vanish, skin clears to normal beauty. Soon you feel like an entirely different person, with new charm, new personality.



Posed by professional models

Money-back guarantee

No matter how skinny and rundown you may be from lack of sufficient Vitamin B and iron, try these new "3-way" Ironized Yeast tablets just a few weeks and watch the marvelous change. See if they don't aid in building you up, as they have helped thousands. If not delighted with the results of the very first package, your money instantly refunded.

Special FREE offer!

To start thousands building up their health right away, we make this absolutely FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out the seal on the box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Dick Arlen's planning a garden party for our vacationers.

By Jack Smalley

HOLLYWOOD'S CALLING

FROM CHICAGO to Hollywood and back in ten days—that's the speedy vacation tour sponsored by Modern Screen, which leaves Chicago August 15. Only a few reservations remain, so this is your last call for "All Aboard!"

Richard Arlen will be host for this merry junket to the land of the movies. A big garden party at his Toluca Lake home to meet the stars, in person, will feature this streamlined visit to Hollywood.

Although this is a shorter vacation than the two-weeks' trips, described in previous issues of Modern Screen, leaving July 11 and August 1, it has the same four-day schedule of Hollywood events.

Here's the schedule for those who must plan a brief trip this year, and there's a full portion of excitement packed into every minute:

Sunday, August 15, leave Chicago at 10:20.
Monday, travel through Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico.
Tuesday, stop off at Grand Canyon, dinner at Bright Angel Camp.
Wednesday, arrive in Los Angeles, first trip through Beverly Hills.
Thursday, out to Universal Studios to see movies in the making, luncheon on the lot.
Richard Arlen's "Melting Pot" party at his home.
Friday, individual explorations. (Cont'd on page 67)

This ten day vacation trip offers you a chance to visit the movie stars

WHY NOT MAKE IT A Complete VACATION?

GOING traveling in New England? Week-ending? Vacationing? Then why not leave care behind and relax in air-conditioned comfort—in a New Haven streamlined coach or luxurious Pullman?

You'll travel faster, safer, of course, and happier. And save money, as well—for train fares are lower this summer. They actually are less than you pay for traffic-ridden highway travel. If you're pleasure-bound, make your pleasure complete. Sink into a comfortable seat. Dine as you travel, leisurely and well. Chat, or read or rest. And arrive refreshed and happy.

The train's the thing, this season. And New Haven train travel rates high among the splendid service offered by most American railroads in 1937.

at a meal. In his opinion, though, rice, noodles and spaghetti can substitute for potatoes with excellent results.

An excellent example of a tasty spaghetti combination is the one you'll find among the MacMurray favorites. Actually, it's just a rich meaty sauce that you pour over your favorite brand of canned spaghetti. Baked and served in a casserole, it supplies a one-dish-meal suggestion that you'll doubtless have often, once you've tried it.

Now at last we come to desserts. I found that he and I share the opinion that, with most men, the success of a meal often is judged entirely by the quality of the sweet with which that meal ends! Give a man a rich cake and a cup of clear, steaming coffee, and chances are he'll overlook any other shortcomings the meal may have had.

You don't like to bake in hot weather, though, do you? Well, cheer up, there's an easy way around that difficulty—one which is daily becoming more popular, judging by the requests we keep receiving for "something new in Ice Box Cakes."

These, as you know, can be made with homemade sponge cake, if you're really ambitious, but are just as successful when packaged sponge cakes or lady fingers are used. So don't fail to fix up the very dressy Alaska Ice Box Cake favorite of Fred MacMurray's. (You'll find it pictured on this page.) It's one that he never fails to order when it appears on the menu at the commissary. The chef gave me the recipe, which makes it possible for me to offer it to you. Even though you'll find the recipe in the leaflet, I do want to take time out to describe it for you here before taking up still another "sweet" subject.

This cake, you see, deserves an extra word or two because it's pretty special and decidedly unusual. As the name suggests, it is first cousin to a Baked Alaska—that very dressy ice cream dessert with which hostesses in the Gay Nineties used to mystify and amaze their guests. Only in this instance you don't have to fuss around with melting ice cream. You simply start off by making a very grand, very rich Ice Box Cake, according to the recipe on one of this month's cards. It can be made up a couple of days ahead of the moment of serving it, if you choose. Tucked away into the cold interior of a good refrigerator, you can rest assured that it's both safe and handy whatever the weather.

This particular cake calls for six egg yolks, which, you might think, would leave you with six whites to be disposed of. Not at all; you just save them in a covered container in the refrigerator until almost time for the dessert course. Then you whip and sweeten them, according to directions given in the recipe, spread them over your icy-cold cake and—here's the trick—bake them quickly to form a hot meringue topping. Serve at once to the admiring "ohs" and "ahs" of the diners, particularly the masculine contingent.

That about finishes what I have to say here about recipes in the Fred MacMurray leaflet. The rest is up to you. You can have your copy by asking; you can follow the recipes with the greatest ease; best of all you can serve to the Fred MacMurray of your own heart and household the same substantial summer fare recommended by this popular favorite.

There's still room to add a couple of words about two favorites that men always enjoy, biscuits and shortcakes. You see, I belong to the school that believes a shortcake should really be a short biscuit liberally covered with sweetened fruit and topped with whipped cream. Them as wants a real cake as a base can have it, but I join the men in clamoring for biscuits every time.

You can use your own favorite biscuit recipe for the type of shortcake just recommended, adding a little sugar and considerably more shortening. For a welcome change, try the Bran Buttermilk Biscuits given here. They're marvelous for shortcake and shouldn't be overlooked either when you're seeking something new in the hot bread line. I suggest, however, if you plan to use the recipe to make biscuits rather than shortcake, that you omit the sugar and use only one quarter of a cup of shortening instead of the third of a cup specified here. Be sure, for shortcake purposes, to follow the directions given below, on cutting out and baking, as I think they provide the quickest and easiest shortcake-making procedure I've ever used.

BRAN BUTTERMILK BISCUITS FOR SHORTCAKE

½ cup all-bran
¾ cup buttermilk*
1½ cups flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
½ teaspoon soda
1 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar
⅓ cup butter or other shortening

Soak all-bran in buttermilk while combining rest of ingredients. Sift together flour, baking powder, soda, salt and sugar. Cut in butter until mixture is like coarse meal. Add soaked all-bran. Stir in with a fork until dough will follow fork around bowl. Toss onto floured board, and knead lightly with floured fingers, for a few seconds. Roll out or pat to half-inch thickness. Cut with floured biscuit cutter. Place one half of biscuits on lightly greased baking sheet. Spread the top of each of these biscuits with softened butter. Place second biscuit on top of each. Brush top biscuit with milk. Bake in hot oven (450°F.) to a golden brown—about 12 minutes. Spread sweetened berries (or sliced peaches or sliced bananas) between the biscuit halves and heaped over the top. Add whipped cream, sweetened to taste, garnish with whole berries and serve while biscuits are still hot.

*Sour cream may be used instead of buttermilk with excellent results.

Saturday evening, leave on return trip.
Sunday, Aug. 22, arrive in San Francisco, spend day, enjoying sights, looking at the new bridge.
Monday, en route through Nevada and Utah.
Tuesday, stop in the Colorado Rockies, dinner at Troutdale, famous resort.
Wednesday, arrive at Chicago 7:50 P. M.

ON this party, Richard Arlen, Columbia star, and his wife, Jobyna Ralston, will open the gates to their lovely estate in the Valley to entertain us.

So bring your kodaks and autograph books, because you'll meet dozens of stars. In addition to the big party at Dick's home, we'll visit NBC Studios, see pictures in the making at Universal, go sightseeing through Beverly Hills and enjoy all the thousands of delights that make California the world's playground.

The cost of this trip is amazingly low—only $139.50. You can't afford to pass up this opportunity to see Hollywood as a privileged guest, rather than as a tourist. Write or wire today for a big, illustrated folder, describing the tour, or better yet, fill out the coupon below and be sure of a reservation aboard the special train to Hollywood.

KEEP OUT OF THAT HOT KITCHEN!

Serve the Delicious Spaghetti that makes quick Summer Meals Possible

BUT be sure it's Franco-American Spaghetti you use. There is a real difference between Franco-American and ordinary ready-cooked spaghetti. Well, there ought to be! First, in taste! There are eleven savory ingredients in that world-famous cheese-and-tomato sauce — there's no imitating that! Second, in nourishment. The selected top quality durum wheat that Franco-American is made from—rich in proteins and carbohydrates — there's no improving on that! Franco-American is an appetizing, delicious food that saves you money. It usually costs only ten cents a can — three cents a portion!

When a hot day comes along and you dread cooking—DON'T! Just serve that delicious Franco-American Spaghetti as a main dish—with a crisp green salad, milk, and fruit. It's on the table in no time. And your family will say: "Gee, this is swell, Mother!" Or if you've leftovers you want to use up, Franco-American's rare and tasty flavor makes a dish of leftover meat taste like the proud creation of a French chef. Serve Franco-American!

Turn to our Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. It's a valuable guide in choosing entertainment. Instead of giving the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

peramental, say the campaigners; nope, everything she does is as reasonable as a geometry book. Sure, and if Simone were left to herself, she'd wear high-button shoes and join the nearest Bible society.

Take it from me—it ain't so! Simone wasn't born in Marseilles and raised in Madagascar for nothing. She comes to Hollywood from another world, a world of intense contrasts, strong passions, the makings of temperament. She carries that world in her soul. And you can't whitewash a soul.

She has worked hard, but hasn't ever planned. What you sow has nothing to do with what you reap, is her credo, and she sticks to it. You can't blame her. For instance, in all the twenty-three years of her life, she never had twenty-three seconds' dramatic training. That didn't prevent her from becoming a star in a day because some director liked the shape of her mouth.

When she came to Hollywood early last Fall, she was cold-shouldered. Hollywood felt that it had outgrown temperament. Simone sulked. But when "Girls' Dormitory" was released, the boys and girls wanted to play with her, and Simone trotted out the old smile, the dimple in her right cheek went into action, and she was happy. She likes Hollywood and will like it, just so long as it continues to provide her with world-beating playmates like George Gershwin, Jimmie Stewart, William Wyler, to mention a few of the chaps who've dated her. Yes, she likes Hollywood—and she likes men. Men, too, have a sneaking admiration for this puckish, 5 foot 4 inches tall, blue-eyed little girl. That makes her what we fonney Americains call "beeg boxoffees." And that reminds me; you'll soon be standing on line for tickets to "Danger—Love at Work."

GENE RAYMOND (Last printed August 1936. Total number of requests since then, 462.) Gene Raymond is that confirmed bachelor who just got married. It seems that when you're built like a Greek god, with crisp platinum locks and dancing blue eyes, you can give romance the run-around just so long and no longer. Gene should know. He wore a bullet-proof vest against Cupid's arrows and maidens' glances—and look what happened to him. He always had a different alibi on tap for the interviewers. Even when Jeanette MacDonald came along, Gene wasn't swept off his too solid feet—not until she convinced him of the truth of his self-created myth of bachelorhood. Jeanette had to prove it was all a hoax.

Not that Gene was ever girl-shy. As a boy, he went to school with Marguerite Churchill and Helen Chandler. It was a Professional Children's School, and Gene learned all the funny things actors learn. How to do a brogue, ride a horse, sing and fence, and occasionally there'd be a call for acting. It was in the latter part of his curriculum that little Raymond Guion (the French Huguenot name with which Gene was christened) excelled. And, every now and then, he'd play hooky from school and sneak in a few stage appearances. In 1913, at five, he wowed his public in a small way in a production of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch."

His first big-time wowing assignment was in "Young Sinners." That was in 1929. The show stayed on the boards for two years. Raymond played the role of a chap called Gene Gibson. When the show was over, and he was called to Hollywood, he hurriedly took the Gene from the Gibson, added the Raymond of his own name, and so the star you know today was born.

Just born, though. He had to take care of growing up all by himself. Paramount refused to cast him in anything but weakling roles—Milquetoasts of every description. At the close of his first contract, Gene said nix on a renewal and went free-lance. Since then he's made a big name for himself in the light comedy field. His next is "There Goes My Girl," with Ann Sothern.

Found: A Second Valentino

When Rudolph Valentino passed on ten years ago, romance went with him. When he was living, the world seemed such a wonderful place to be in. I saw "The Son of the Sheik" eleven times. I think more of him today than the day he died.

Until recently I rebelled against the thought of anyone taking his place. But now I feel that Don Ameche is the only logical person to carry on where he left off. I'm sure Rudy is looking down from Heaven and agreeing with me.

I will live for the day when I can go to the theatre and see Don Ameche in "The Sheik," "Monsieur Beaucaire," and all the other films that Rudy made worth while. —Mrs. Edith Conklin, Bellefontaine, Ohio.

To Henry Wilcoxon

If Egypt's Queen bent her proud knee
And gave her heart to Antony—
If Berengaria did cling
To Richard, the Crusading King—
If then two Queens can thus be won,
Oh, what a man is Wilcoxon!

A wrestler, diver, painter, he,
This son of British sovereignty;
A banker, schemer, athlete: See
The President's great Mystery.
A hero with virility,
Wilcoxon, here's success to thee!

Though gay, gallant and debonair,
Brave Duncan lost his Alice fair.
But, Henry, don't be in despair,
You would have won had I been there!
And now I'm waiting patiently,
To see you soon in "Souls at Sea."

One More Dig

Cartoons have been drawn, articles have been written and comedians have ribbed the subject of the manner in which film stars sleep—that is, on the screen. But it's always worth one more dig.

I sigh with envy when I see one of our cinema lovelies waking up in the bright sunshine—not in the cold gray dawn, the blankets and sheets all smooth and even—not twisted and wrinkled, her hair smooth and perfectly in place—not snarled from sleeping on it the wrong way.

Have we not an actor or an actress who can wake up slowly and painfully to untangle himself and stagger into the shower and come out with his eyes still half shut? All the time we're watching this picturization of one of our vaguest pipe dreams, we're thinking how hard it's going to be to have to get up at 7 o'clock tomorrow morning. — Margaret Hansen, Cleveland, Ohio.

Nelson Eddy's Childhood

According to articles I've read recently, "Nelson Eddy has had no childhood; he has never been young." Really?

As one who has known the Eddy family for years, I want to say that Nelson had a childhood that might well be the envy of a great many children. He had devoted parents, grandparents and great grandparents. When very young, he spent much of his time on the large farm of his great grandparents in Acusnet, Mass. He never had to spend a summer in the hot city, for his parents always took him to the shore.

It has also been said that his father moved about from place to place, so that Nelson had no home. His father has always been a hard working man. When Nelson was young, Mr. Eddy worked nights, aside from his regular job, that his family might have extra luxuries. For the past 22 years, Mr. Eddy has worked for the U. S. Government at the U. S. Naval Torpedo Station at Newport.

If Nelson had not had this normal childhood, he would not be able to hold down a three-man job as he is doing today.—A Family Friend, Providence, R. I.

A Discovery

No reason for writing this, except the right of every normal woman to complain.

Whoops! A prankish breeze nearly causes cute little Juanita Quigley to lose her top-piece. Don't you love the handbag clutched firmly and the amused expression?

You see, we've been spoiled because of such stimulating movies as "Mr. Deeds," "Come and Get It," "Theodora Goes Wild," "Great Ziegfeld" and "Camille," to name but a few. Give us a couple of poor or even slightly mediocre pictures, and we make the startling discovery that most movies are awful! It's all the fault of the producers really for giving us films that are remarkable when they can't hope to continue with the same formula.—Mrs. H. S. Bailey, Hampton, Virginia.

Speaking of Voices

It seems to me that an actress should have a voice far better than that of an ordinary person. And a starring actress should have an even finer voice.

I saw Ruby Keeler in "Ready, Willing and Able." During certain scenes her voice was so weak and slow that the audience started stamping their feet. She makes one feel like going up there to help her talk. She sounds so helpless and hopeless. Why doesn't she put some pep into her voice? She doesn't seem to have any spunk or vitality. Of course it isn't necessary to do a Martha Raye, but I wish she'd show more life.—Jane Stephens, Chicago, Ill.

Hangover

Last night I saw "Maytime" and this morning I have a hangover. The glorious voices of MacDonald and Eddy stay with me. I could go on offering adjectives indefinitely, but instead I want to state that I and the rest of the audience, from all indications, were in great danger of getting off to a bad start. I sat, suffering and sympathizing with my comrades in distress, whose moans were breaking my heart. Then and there I decided to do my duty as a citizen and write to you.

Please, why must our beautiful young heroines change to cane-thumping old ladies before our very eyes? It isn't right and we don't like it. Let us admire our truly old ladies but no more grey hair and wrinkles for the younger stars if you would spare our illusions.—Alice R. Langton, Rushville, Pa.

Goodness, Gracious

Surely everyone likes to see new personalities on the screen, but I'm sure no one anticipated anything quite like Martha Raye. She must have looked up humor in the wrong dictionary, for her chatter certainly isn't comedy. I have recently seen "Hideaway Girl" and previous to that "College Holiday," and in my estimation Miss Raye contributed nothing to either picture. She has no figure, and her singing is worse than her jokes; in fact she has nothing outstanding except a big mouth and surely we don't want to pay to see that.—Grace Meyers, Valley Stream, N. Y.

Indifferent to Barbara

Barbara Stanwyck doesn't seem to inspire either admiration or active dislike. And that's really the way I feel about her, utterly indifferent, so long as I don't have to see her ruin an otherwise good picture. But I do hate to see anyone who is no better an actress than Miss S. rate the publicity and important productions she does.

Actually, she can play but one role, and that goes for whether she is chorus girl, society girl or anything else; whatever she is, she is always loud-mouthed and coarse. For my part, her hard-boiled, tough manner gets on my nerves. If she were beautiful, one wouldn't mind, but her plain face is too much.—Mrs. H. Bowers, Dallas, Texas.

Kingfish, No. 1

No wonder the movie-world pays tribute to that Great God, Publicity, Movie's Kingfish Number One. Why not? He took a pretty boy from little Pomona, carefully shook the hayseed from his hair, sent him to a tailor and then gagged gossip writers with those too, too precious personal items and that special-made-to-order romance. You bet the public read about him. They had to—or stop reading. —Florence Ridge, Canton, Ohio.

Watch Your Kisses, Bob

I did not like the way Bob Taylor kissed Greta Garbo in "Camille." It was an insult to her. I like the way he kisses Barbara Stanwyck much better. I suppose it's because he puts more feeling into his kisses to Barbara.—Janice Love, Bronx, N. Y.

Taylor Champion

I'm sick and tired of the abuse Bob Taylor has suffered of late. In my opinion, the letters sent in branding him as a movie lover with no claim to acting come from young Misses who feel that they are obtaining originality when they spurn the obvious popularity of a new screen rave. It happened to Gable, now Taylor, and Tyrone Power will probably be next.

Why, anybody with half an eye should realize that the final scene in "Camille" was the undisputed result of magnificent acting on the part of Taylor as well as Garbo.—E. G. Grandis, Brooklyn, N. Y.

a frantic and often ludicrous effort to look exotic or glamorous or merely different, her aim is to look suitably dressed. Always, above all else, she looks well bred. Just between you and me, it comes naturally to this Warner favorite, but that is no reason why some of us more brash and impulsive and gadget-loving gals shouldn't deliberately try to acquire some of her delicacy.

LET'S take a look at the clothes she is wearing in the pictures on Pages 40 and 41 and see if we can't discover what it is that gives distinction to her very simple clothes—the sort that you can find in your local stores, if you will just insist to the saleswoman that you would rather give the effect of a single glowing pearl than that of a three-alarm fire. Tell her you think it would be rather nice and terribly original to dress like a lady. It is the most daring form of originality these days.

First, let's analyze the dark, sheer, two-piece frock, because that is the sort of dress that every girl needs in her summer wardrobe, unless she is spending her entire time at the beach or in the mountains. If you are living in town, it's practically indispensable, because it looks so cool and suave. It is non-crushable and won't wilt.

You have probably seen some hundreds of two-piece dark sheer dresses in the past two summers, but this doesn't look like the others, does it? The blouse is shorter, the tiny round buttons are a pleasant change from big, fancy ones, but it is the collar that really does the trick. The collar is of stiffened faille in summer-sky blue, shaped like big flower petals.

Incidentally, a dress like this is very effective in black or in that very dark walnut brown, or even in Dubonnet red if you are so subdued in coloring that you need the build-up of deep colors in clothes. Anita Louise wears it in Navy blue, which is not only the ideal choice for her, but is usually the best choice for either blondes or brunettes, if they are blue-eyed.

All of her accessories are plain dark blue, you notice. Not a trace of fancy stitching on hat, handbag, shoes, or gloves. The effect is to concentrate every bit of attention on the one bit of trimming that relieves the inky darkness of the outfit. And that bit of color, you will notice, comes just where it frames her face. When Anita wears this dress, no one's attention will waver even momentarily from the most important part of the costume, which is the girl in the dress.

I know you are impatient to get on to the evening dress, because it is just the sort of fragile, floating creation that can make you the undisputed belle of the country club or resort hotel dance. And I bet you have caught on already to the repetition of Anita's trimming-at-the-neck trick. That soft, fluffy collar is formed of white organdie roses massed together.

Anita likes Navy blue for summer evening dresses. They are charming for a girl of her coloring. She keeps her ivory-like skin and glossy spun-gold hair in spite of the California sun. If you are the outdoor type and get a glorious tan in summer, dark evening dresses are not so good. They make your skin look dingy. Oyster white or the new lime green or canary yellow or the very palest of blue or pink will set off your glowing complexion better.

Because summer entertaining is usually unpretentious, Anita thinks it more suitable to wear a dress made of crisp cotton fabric than the more sumptuous organzas or tulle. Dotted Swiss is ideal, because it is firm enough to be fitted in sculptured lines, soft enough to be gathered very full without looking bulky and yet filmy enough to float enchantingly when strolling or dancing.

I DON'T believe that Anita ever sat down and figured out a deft psychology of clothes. Ask her to talk about clothes and she looks at you all dewy-eyed and surprised and a little bit ashamed, as if she were letting you down. Hesitantly, she will tell you that she just wears what she likes. Lucky girl to be born with such unerring taste.

Probably you have noticed that lately there has developed a change in public taste. Out of the pandemonium of swing music, breakneck sports and continuous wisecracks, a vast public is beginning to turn toward gentleness and tenderness and delicacy. The brash hoyden is headed for the role of comic relief only. The tremendous success of "A Star Is Born" is attributed to the compassionate consideration of the leading characters for each other, and many people look on it as an indication that we are all going to stop pretending to be hard and make it smart to be softies.

Fashions in dress follow swiftly on the heels of other trends, and soft prettiness is due to supplant tailored sleekness and boxy lines. In that case, Anita Louise, who doesn't pay much attention to fads and fancies, will find that while others have been racing to keep up with fashion, fashion has been catching up with her.

The white shantung dress she is wearing is typical of the newest fashion trend. Instead of boxy lines, kick pleats, and widened shoulders, it has a more dainty air. The skirt is full, but plain. Incidentally, Anita doesn't refer to this as a tennis dress, or a spectator sports dress, or anything of the sort. She calls it a house dress. It is what she actually likes to wear around home. Slacks, pajamas, culottes are all right for those who like them, but Anita isn't the athletic type or the languorous type. Her hours at home are spent practicing on her harp, and I feel sure she could never approach her stately instrument without feeling hilariously incongruous if she were wearing slacks.

In many offices throughout the country, the old rule of wearing dark clothes even in midsummer has been discarded amid cheers, and many a girl now goes to work wearing a simple white dress. This one would be entirely suitable, as it doesn't make the wearer look as if she were headed for the golf links or the beach and just wandered into an office by mistake. Shantung is the ideal material for such a dress, for it won't wrinkle and it is dust-resistant. It looks unrumpled and fresh even after being shoved through crowds in subways and buses.

Although Anita has twice visited Paris, she likes American-made clothes best, because they are so practical. When she is shopping for clothes, she always thinks of the occasions for which she wants them. She doesn't just buy a strictly-tailored suit because store advertising proclaims that tailored suits are the current vogue. She buys clothes that are comfortable and suitable for her to wear as she drives to and from the studios, goes to a preview, or lunches with friends at one of Hollywood's favorite restaurants.

Restaurant-lunching is one of the occasions for which the dress designers have let us down pretty badly ever since the vogue for sports clothes swept the country. Between flowered chiffons which are apt to look pretty tacky, and trim little crepe suits which seem a little subdued for a party, there just isn't anything. Anita Louise has solved the problem of how to get a touch of elegance into a simple daytime crepe frock, though. She wears an exquisite soft brown lace blouse, a rippling ruffle down the front, with a bolero-jacketed beige crepe suit. With this she is wearing dark brown gloves and carrying a brown bag. Her hat is of brown taffeta stitched in beige.

We haven't said a word about shoes, but wouldn't you know that she would select the classic pumps that go so well with everything? The only burst of flippancy she indulges in is her choice of cutout sandals to wear with her house dress. And those are on the conservative side.

Because Anita ignores all the exaggerated lines and gadgets of swiftly-passing fashions and consistently dresses in clothes that are simple, supple and dainty, one always remembers her softly-glowing beauty, not what she was wearing. Her choice of clothes would not be right for a girl of neutral coloring, a girl who was dashing and reckless and flamboyant, or the sleek, sophisticated type. They are utterly right for her, and if you have golden hair and creamy skin and blue eyes like hers, if you have a willowy figure and gentle manner, if you have natural delicacy of temperament, you can make the devastating impression on people that she does by following her lead in selecting clothes. Even the girls who shouldn't wear her type of clothes can learn a lot from her.

The secret of being effectively dressed is this: Know yourself, then be yourself.

from the Lombard—if your imagination will embrace a faint cry from Miss Lombard. But la Stanwyck fixed that all up, too. She kept score in her little red book. Everyone who does a stint on the ranch gets a lunch checked up against the future.

It works in Pomona, too. "Howz about watching the horses race tomorrow morning?" invites the seductive voice of Barbara. "I'd love it," says Bob and half a dozen others. Even when she springs that four-thirty A. M. on them, they still fall for it.

So they had a lot of fun, watching the education of these beautiful spirited babies since they arrived in blankets from Kentucky. At first the stable boys walked them around the track gently. Next came the ceremony of saddling them. Now the horses have a workout each morning. They bolt and run the wrong way at first, all over the field.

Barbara is right up there in her favorite spot on the stable roof, enjoying the show. But she hops down when the horses are brought in. A little job of Huckleberry Finning is waiting for her.

You walk a hot horse until he cools off, a man to a horse.

"Here's a horse for you, Bob. One for you, Clark." They must be walked for half an hour at a slow pace, and they don't always like it much. They want to run. The horses do—not Bob and Clark. They would probably just as soon be back home in bed. Instead, much to their surprise, they are out in Pomona at what amounts to dawn, saying, "Whoa, horsie!" and getting a pair of sore hands hanging onto a gee-gee who wants to go the other way.

YOUNG Dion, Barbara's son, going on five, is the inspiration for the ranch and horses. Barbara feels that this is a very important and formative time in his life, and that he has been too much with women in her manless household. He is now in the fireman stage, ready to graduate into a cowboy any minute. A hearty, handsome little golden-head, Barbara's plans are pretty much governed by Dion.

Way back last Thanksgiving, Barbara pulled a Huck Finn that was one for the book. Did little Babs clutter up her culinary department with a big Thanksgiving dinner and invite all the folks in to be stuffed? She's done that for many a year, but this year she had a better idea. She suggested, within hearing of the right ears, how it would be just lovely to have a barbecue out at the new ranch, if only they had something to have a barbecue with. Which gave Carole Lombard the perfect opportunity to fling one of her epic shindigs. She sent out a crew to build a barbecue pit with all the fixings. When the party arrived everything was complete. even to the Roman couches.

"First time I ever ate Thanksgiving dinner lying on my stomach," Barbara says, "but it turns out to be the ideal way to cope with a barbecued steak."

AFTER the steaks and baked potatoes, etc., the party all fell asleep in the sun, which was surely different from the conventional turkey-at-home where you are perishing to go off and lie down awhile. but there are too many visiting relatives around. Don't you think someone ought to organize a campaign for naps-after-Thanksgiving-dinner? Let's see now, who'll make the speeches? How about Barbara?

Her very best Huckleberry Finn is the way she does about marriage. She just sits back and smiles and lets the newspapers do it for her!

"Sure, they get you in love, engaged, and married. You don't have to do a thing about it yourself," Barbara smiles. "Just appear in public twice with the same man, and everything is eggs in the coffee."

"After you saw your engagement announced in the public prints, without knowing about it yourself, how did you feel next time you saw Bob?"

"You feel like a darn fool, to tell the truth," Barbara said. "It's terribly embarrassing. You think, does he expect me to expect him to make good on it, and you wonder if he's figuring the same way. At first you feel self-conscious and embarrassed, then the only way out is to laugh it off. Fortunately, Bob and I both have a sense of humor. We are very frank and kid each other about it, which is the only out."

"And so?"

"Absolutely nothing definite. We have no plans and no intentions. Just having fun."

"If you go out and get married before this story appears, I'm going to be vexed with you," I said sternly. But not too sternly, because if Barbara wants to change her mind in favor of a grand old institution like marriage, I'm all for it. Especially if she happens to marry Bob.

plenty from her, too. I have—from all the women I've worked with—Loy, Garbo, Shearer, Lombard, top-notchers, the lot of 'em. Be kind of fun, at that, to go to school to No. 1.

"Of course," he went on, still gravely, though the twinkle had reappeared in his eyes, "Miss Temple has two strikes on me from the start. I'm big, and she's little, and who wants to look at a lunk like me when he can look at Shirley? I'm dark and she's fair, and the gentlemen still prefer blondes. The ladies?" He thought fast. "Well, show me any lady in the land who could resist Shirley." He seemed pleased at getting out of that one.

"How about dimples?" I inquired, though fearfully. "You're even there."

"When you say that, smile," he warned me. "She's got what belongs to her. I've got what doesn't. The very word wrecks a man. What guy wants to go around with a hole in his face? But Shirley—" He forgot for a moment his role of indignant plaintiff. "Those two little stars chasing themselves 'round her mouth. Cute as the devil, aren't they?" And his smile was like the smile he turned on Claudette Colbert, after she had sobbed herself to sleep behind the walls of Jericho.

"Then," he went on, returning to character, "there's the great ear problem. Now I've never had the pleasure of seeing Miss Temple's ears, though I go to all her pictures. The only time I ever saw her in person was at the Academy Award Dinner last year. She's a beautiful baby and kind-looking, and if I'd asked her politely for a peek at her ears, she might have shown them to me. But to tell you the truth, it never occurred to me. If I'd known this story was coming up, I'd have made a point of it.

"ANYWAY, they're probably small and shell-pink, like the rest of her. But suppose, for the sake of argument, they weren't. Suppose, for the sake of argument, they were something like mine. Would anybody know it? Would they stand naked and free to the wind, like some I could mention? No. She's got a head of golden curls to hide 'em under. She doesn't have to hide 'em, mind you, but she's got the curls just the same. Mine ought to be hidden, and I haven't got the curls. Not that I want 'em, heaven forbid. But the least they could do is send me up on a picture to Alaska, where I could wear earlaps—and do some big game hunting at the same time," he added as an afterthought.

"And Alaska reminds me of beards. When we started 'Parnell' there was some talk of a beard. We compromised on sideburns. With Shirley, the question would never come up. If it did, she'd laugh and stick it on and think it was some fine new kind of game she was playing. What's more, she'd look just as sweet with that face of hers poking out over it. Well, the beard would look just as funny on me, but the face would take punishment. And then there's clothes. Put Shirley in a frilly dress, and she looks grand. Put her in overalls and she looks just as grand. Put me in a frilly dress, and see how I look. I just don't have the range," he grinned.

"Finally, there's this all-important question of time. Movie stars don't generally last more than five years, so you're told. Well, that's where Miss Shirley has it all over the rest of us. And I'm not kidding this time. That baby's twined herself so fast around people's heartstrings, that I don't believe they could get along without her. They'll want to keep right on seeing her, same as their own kids. They'll want to know what happens to her from one year to the next. They'll want to watch her growing from a little girl to a bigger girl. They'll be interested in every stage, when she ties back that mop of curls with a ribbon; when she begins to lengthen out like a long-legged colt; when she goes in for roller-skating and bicycles; when she starts being interested in boys and goes to her first party in her first party dress; when she graduates from school; and then when she really grows up and falls in love.

"Sure, they'll only see it on the screen, but they can imagine her doing the same things in her own life. There'll be all that change, all that variety, while the rest of us stay the same, except that we get a little older each year. People get tired of seeing the same faces all the time. I know I do. But I've got a hunch they won't get tired of Shirley, because they've adopted her. She belongs to them.

"I can see it going on and on forever, till she's playing grandmother parts, with her white hair still curly and the dimples still chasing each other 'round her mouth. And the fans still loving her.

"Nope," he concluded, folding his hands behind his head. "I'm not in her class. Not the grandmother type," he amended, with a flash of white teeth. "So the smart thing for me is to get out before I've tumbled so far that Shirley won't even think I'm worth haunting any more. That's just what I intend to do in four years, when my contract is out. By that time it'll be a relief to all concerned.

"I'd like enough money for security and not a penny more. Five hundred a month will do. I wouldn't cross the street to make more, if I had that much. Then I want to travel while I'm still young enough to enjoy it. I want to see all there is in this world to see. I want to go on that big game hunt in Alaska and to Africa on another, where I'll only have No. 1 lions to wrestle with instead of No. 1 movie stars. I don't want to wait till I've reached the age when I can't lie down on the ground without getting lumbago. I don't want to wait till doctors start telling me: 'Better not fly, old man. Your heart won't stand it.' I'm going while I can do all the things I want to do as I want to do 'em.

"Then, if I still feel that way, I'll build a little house here in California. I don't want estates with stables and pools and tennis courts. It's not what I've ever been used to, and I don't like it. Just a small house where I don't have to have a flock of strange servants walking around all hours of the day and night, or a lot of rooms that nobody uses.

"But plenty of ground where I can keep animals. Two hundred acres, maybe. And I don't have to live in San Fernando Valley, where they soak you six hundred an acre for land. Drive out from Hollywood an hour or two, and you can get it for twenty-five or fifty. I'd like to combine the background and atmosphere of a ranch with a New England landscape, with lots of trees and grassy meadows and a stream.

THE house could be almost anything that was practical and comfortable. Only not Spanish; I don't like Spanish architecture. Early American, maybe; and one story. I don't go for two-story houses. And not to run over ten thousand dollars. I'd have gas and electricity and all those things put in. I don't care for the fancy stuff, but I do like a certain amount of comfort.

"There'd be one big living-room, probably running the entire length of the house, with a huge fireplace at one end, the kind you could get a good big log into. I might almost make it a combination living-room, dining-room and playroom." He was warming to his theme now, as the house grew under his eyes, eager as a boy's. "You could sort of whisk the dining-room away, when you'd finished eating, like those fellows in the fairy tales. I'd do the whole room in knotty pine, with a ceiling of big timbers, and, instead of board floors, I'd have this tile you can throw rag rugs down on. So if you're out riding, you can come in with mud on your feet, and so can your dogs, and you don't have to worry about what'll happen to the Oriental carpets. Just run a mop over it, and there you are.

"I'd like plenty of gay color around, but none of this wild stuff—what do they call it? Surrealist? Can you make head or tail of it? No? Me, too. Oh, and brass; I like brass bright and shining by the fireplace and anywhere else I can stick it.

"Not over three bedrooms; a couple for my friends, because the latchstring would always be out. Not too big a kitchen; and a cellar under the whole house, where I could store things like potatoes and apples. Bathrooms are the one thing I might go haywire on. Probably spend more money on them than the rest of the house put together. I hate a shower that sprays out a measly trickle or two and stops. I want them full, with lots of pressure behind them, so they make you sting.

"Then I'd have a little cottage on the grounds for the help, man and wife, if I could get 'em. When I'm in a house, especially a house that's small, I like to be able to close the door and know that I'm the one in it. I hate," he said with an almost fierce intensity, "the sense of people pussyfooting around.

ANIMALS? First of all, two or three horses. I'd want to take care of them myself, and I couldn't take care of more than that many. Probably a cow, because I like the milk. No, I wouldn't milk her myself," he laughed. "Not that I don't know how. But I wouldn't want to tie myself down to a cow. When milking time comes, you've got to be right there. And there were too many times I had to go home from school to do that very thing, when I wanted to be playing baseball.

"Let's see, what else? Chickens, for eating. Oh, yes, and a cat," he said suddenly, with the air of being slightly startled at himself. "You know, I used to think I didn't like cats. Well, the fellow at the stable where I keep my horse has one running around. I was amazed when I saw how he jumps over this guy's arm and comes running like a dog when he whistles. I've kind of fallen for that cat. He knows me now, and we get along fine. Yes, decidedly I want a cat. And dogs, of course, plenty of 'em, all kinds, any kind, mutts and near-mutts and maybe a snob or two, provided they don't stick up their noses at the others.

"Will I miss the movies? Well, you see, I'm just a farmer at heart. I'll be building fences, pruning trees, making improvements, working out my horses. I'll be too busy to miss anything—even Shirley.

"Maybe some day," a quizzical blue gleam shot from under his black lashes, and the hole in his face deepened, "when I'm rubbing down Southern Son, a little lady with fly-away golden curls and a frilly dress'll pass by. Maybe my horse'll be curious enough to want to know who she is. Maybe she'll be fourteen or eighteen or twenty-one. That won't make any difference. I can still tell him: 'That's the little lady who once kept your old man hopping. That's Shirley Temple, No. 1 actress in the movies.'" or a photographic sitting to be okayed.

AND these things must be done. We can't go temperamental, either, and scratch the paper off the walls or slam down our make-up boxes and take off. You, Sarah, can tell your boss off, slam down your desk or bolt of ribbon. You shouldn't, but you can. If you do, what happens? At the worst, you may get fired. That may be pretty bad but, at least, only your boss and the office force and a few of your friends need know about it. If I should get fired, the whole world and every producer in the industry would know about it.

"It would be blazoned in the headlines. The Finger would be on me. At the worst, your huff would be put down to a scrap with your boy friend, and a casual 'what's eating her?' would be the end of it. But I would be branded as hard to handle. You may be able to pound the keys or sell merchandise with frazzled nerves, but you can't go before the camera that way. The camera catches everything.

"Perhaps a great many of you girls feel abused when your boss asks you to rewrite a letter. Perhaps you groan when you make a typographical error, have to take the sheet out of the machine and start all over again. I can feel for you, but I doubt that you have ever felt for me. For we, in pictures, 'take the sheet out of the machine and start all over again' ten, sometimes twenty times, before we complete a 'take.' Perhaps we fumble a line, perhaps someone sneezes or a bumble bee buzzes in, and then we have to do the whole scene over again. Perhaps it is the biggest love scene in the picture, a deathbed scene, something that makes far greater emotional demands than rewriting a letter. Whatever happens, I have to wear a bright, brave smile and pretend it doesn't matter.

"I just don't dare have a cold in the head. I have to be far more careful of myself than I would be, left to my own devices. After all, a gal from Montana isn't exactly a hot-house plant. I'm a pretty sturdy specimen. But I have to behave, most of the time, like a fragile orchid. For if I should catch cold, get a dose of sunburn or contract a nice dose of poison oak—well, if anything happens to me while I'm working, it isn't only my face that burns. It would cost the studio thousands of dollars while I held up production. It might keep hundreds of people, extras and so on, out of work. I'm not my own man, girls. I daren't take chances with Myrna Loy, for she isn't my property.

"Other girls," Myrna went on warmly, "write me like this: They say, 'What is there for me to do after hours? My boy friend and I may have dinner together or go dancing. Or my girl chums will come over and we'll talk about our boy friends or, if we are engaged, our coming marriages. But our parties, Myrna, would seem tame to a girl like you. You go to such glorious ones, don't you?'

"Hah!" said Myrna, "I'd give away two years of my life to be able to get together with girl friends and talk about my marriage and new house which are, naturally, the most thrilling topics in my life. If I could be the plain Myrna Williams I am at heart, instead of forever figuring out what Myrna Loy dare and dare not say,

I'd talk about Arthur and our romance and marriage and new home. I want to, right now. I can't. It wouldn't be in good taste. It might sound like bragging, in public, about private matters. The studio mightn't like it. It would also be offensive to Arthur, who doesn't wish to be included in my publicity. So, I can't have any of the he-sez-to-me and-I-sez-to-him chummy sort of talk that other girls can. You think that's fun? It isn't.

"I have to be self-conscious most of the time. The most normal, insignificant move I make may be magnified in the public prints tomorrow. As when, recently, I was knitting bootees for my maid's expected baby and read everywhere that I was not knitting bootees for my maid's baby—ah, no. Well, it happens that I was knitting them for my maid. You'd think I'd know better by this time than to be seen manufacturing 'little garments' in public. But I haven't learned yet.

"WHEN I go home at night I can't have the fun of dining out or dancing or going to a show with my husband. We do all of our socializing over the week-end. Other nights, I'm too tired to know for sure whether I'm Myrna Loy, Mrs. Arthur Hornblow or Kitty O'Shea. I'm not much good as a wife, a hostess, a goer-outer. I just stumble into bed if, by some miracle, I don't have to memorize lines for the next day's takes. Fortunately for me," Myrna said, "Arthur takes the greatest possible interest in my work. He certainly doesn't want me to give up my career. And he understands perfectly the demands made upon me, which is the only way in which marriage to a screen player is even possible.

"I'm not interested in clothes as other girls are and should be. In fact, I hate clothes. I'm dressed up to the nines all day and every day on the set, every detail perfect, every hair in place, a mirror poked under my nose every time I turn around. I'm tired of looking my best. I loathe the very mention of shopping. I feel ill when anyone mentions fittings. There's nothing I'd like better than to slip into something loose, whether it fits or not, and relax. I can't. That's one reason why we built our home in the comparative wildness and isolation of Cold Water Canyon, so that I can wear slacks and shuffle about in slippers.

"I can't go anywhere when I'm working. Too tired even to go to a neighborhood movie or to the corner drugstore for a soda. I couldn't go even that far without looking 'right,' you see. Not because of any personal vanity, but because the studio has spent millions of dollars on the personality known as Myrna Loy. And I can't let the studio down by slipping off my expensive mask of glamor. I've got to be, on all public occasions, the personality they sell at the box office.

"It's a shaky business, too. A good break is likely to get you in, in the first place. And a bad break is just as likely to get you out. And if you're out, you're out. Then there is always someone coming along from the outside, someone newer, more colorful, more talented. Or you may have two bad pictures, fail to get the right material, and you're gone with the wind.

"'If I had the money you make!' girls write. Yes, for a limited time. On the premise, too, that the more you make the less you can keep. And also, what good is money unless you can spend it? And if I hate clothes, prefer to hike rather than roll about in cars, can't entertain much because of being too tired, can't get away from the studio to make trips, have to guard my home and possessions as though I were ashamed of them—well, so what?"

Myrna rose and walked to the windows, looking down on the Hollywood which she, a schoolgirl from Montana, has so triumphantly conquered. She turned to face me; her mouth was smiling. But there was something deeper than laughter in her eyes.

She said, "It's nine parts drudgery and fear and heartache to one part thrill and glamor. It's all the things I've said it is, and more. And I love it—I love it."

I was only seventeen, and I thought marriage would be a step into paradise. But even at seventeen, if I'd had to say to myself, 'This is forever. Are you sure?' I might have given myself time to realize that I wasn't sure and saved us all a lot of heartache."

She was speaking slowly, choosing her words, intent on presenting the facts in their true light, a light that reveals not heroes and villains, but the blundering humans most of us are.

"YET I'm glad we married. Or perhaps I should put it this way. I'm sorry to have made my mother unhappy and Grant unhappy. But I'm glad for the lessons I learned—that marriage doesn't just work of its own accord, that it's got to be made to work. All humans are selfish, and we in this business are probably more selfish than most. We're pampered and fussed over. At first we're grateful, and then we begin to accept these things as our right. 'Why should I stand this, and why should I stand that?' we say and take that attitude with us into marriage. Of course it's ruinous. Of course you've got to give and take.

"Well, Grant and I may have hurt each other—not may have, we did—but only through youth and inexperience, not through ill will. There's no bitterness in my memories, and I hope and believe he would say the same. But if I hadn't learned about marriage through that one, I might have stepped blindly into another that would have been bitter. Which is why I'm glad. It may be a selfish reason, but there it is. An actress friend of mine who waited till she was almost thirty to marry, once said to me, 'I waited because I wanted to be sure of what I was getting into. If I had to do it again, I'd do the same thing. And I'd train any children of mine to do the same thing. The only one important thing when you marry is to be sure he's the man you want to live with for the rest of your life.' That's what I didn't realize at seventeen. Now I do. And now I'll wait till I am sure."

A little relieved at having finished with that, she reached for a cigarette, then somewhat inexplicably murmured, "Salamander," and folded her hands demurely in her lap. I followed her warning eye to where a blue-uniformed guard had strolled on the scene. "No smoking," she explained. The guard smiled like a father and went his way. Miss Young stuck the cigarette back into its pack. "Be a good girl, Loretta," she admonished herself. "Don't betray that trusting grin. Anyway, wait until the effect's worn off."

I asked her if she carried in her mind any picture of the man she might one day marry. The answer came promptly, as if it were a matter she'd given thought to.

"Not a picture, no; but two things he's got to have. Moral courage and breeding. I can't stand a leaner. I don't want my husband to be my baby, too. Oh, in little ways, yes, but not in the essentials. If there's any leaning to be done, I'm old-fashioned enough to think the woman should do it. I'm no clinging vine. I'm used to being independent. I'm not one to hang fondly on a man and get a thrill out of being a slave to petty authority: 'Darling, you smoke too many cigarettes,' and so on. But I want to know that if I do feel like leaning all over him, I can, and he'll stand firm. Any woman wants that. She may love the other kind in a pitying way. But I want to love my husband plain, without pity, without feeling I have to apologize for him, even to myself—least of all to myself.

"And by breeding I don't mean a line of aristocrats behind him. There's a breeding of the heart, an instinctive good taste that aristocrats sometimes don't have and hod-carriers do. It includes a certain fastidiousness of mind and body. I don't like dirty finger-nails and uncouth language. He's got to be literate. I don't care whether he's a college graduate or not. He's got to love education for its own sake—not for the sake of some letters after his name, but because it opens new worlds and trains you to make the best of what you've been born with.

I HOPE I'm not sounding smug, making demands, as if I were a paragon of all the virtues myself. After all, they're not unreasonable demands, are they?" she pleaded with comic wistfulness. "Character and a certain degree of culture? And perhaps I can redeem myself by stopping there. The rest doesn't matter. I don't care what he looks like. Handsome or ugly, it's all the same to me. Of course, I'd be pleased if he weren't a Dracula. I'd be pleased if he were beautifully attentive and considerate and thoughtful of me. But if he weren't, I'd soothe my vanity by putting it down to absent-mindedness. Sometimes I think I'd like him to be in the motion picture business, and sometimes I hope to heaven he knows nothing about it.

"I'd be pleased, too, if his tastes were something like mine. For instance, I adore dancing. I studied it for eight years, and it's a passion with me. Well, when Albertina Rasch gives a recital at the Bowl, I'd like him to enjoy it with me. But if he'd rather go to the Stadium for the fights, that would be all right, too. When we got home, he could tell me who knocked out whom. And I could give him an imitation of one of the Rasch girls dancing. That would probably amuse him.

"Money? Yes. Frankly, money is important. But only to this extent—that he should be able to make enough to keep his own self-respect. A million dollars has no attraction for me. The more money you have, the more you worry about it. I've got enough for myself. But for his own sake, I shouldn't want to marry a man who would have to take from me. If he were out of luck, I'd give with both hands. But however generously you give, taking humiliates a man—makes him feel inferior—which must never be. It's fatal to any marriage." Her kindling eyes softened as she said more quietly, "I couldn't bear to see my husband anything but proud."

Then again she sought relief in lightness. "I forgot," she smiled. "There's one more must. He must not be a practical joker. I can't stand a man who thinks it's funny to embarrass people—to electrify a chair, for instance, and then go haw-haw-hawing all over the place, as if he'd done something really noteworthy. I always feel like bashing him one," said the fragile-looking Loretta and eyed the slender hands in her lap as if to weigh their possible bashing power.

"And when I marry my non-practical joker," she went on, "I think I'd like to retire. I don't know, mind you, whether I will or not. I may feel quite differently about it tomorrow, and I've lived long enough to discover that keeping a flexible mind saves you a lot of self-torment. But if I feel as I feel now, I'd like to retire. Not because I believe marriage and a career won't mix. That's a subject I have no theories on. Whether they'll mix or not depends on the individual. But for myself, I'm inclined toward a normal home life, children and the rest of it. I'd like to run my house, work in my garden, be there when my husband comes home at night, look after my babies myself.

THERE'S always the danger, of course, that I'd miss the excitement and stimulation of this business. I've been in it for eleven years. I know how it's crept into my blood, become part of me. I know it would be hard to give up. If my husband were connected with pictures and came home and talked about them, I'd probably quiver like an old firehorse to get back. If he weren't connected with pictures, I'd feel cut off from all that's been most colorful in my life. Still," she said, thoughtful-eyed, "I do see the danger, so I might be able to avoid it.

"Because—and in relation to anything else I've said, you'd have to print this in letters a mile high—the only real happiness I've ever got out of life is contact with the people I love. Nothing else matters. Not money, not clothes, not looks, not being flattered and run after. All that's pleasant, but empty. If you had it all and lost your family and friends, it would just be a heap of nothing that would sicken you. Loving your own and being loved by them is the only happiness there is. If I know anything in this world, I know that. So it seems reasonable to suppose that a husband and children you loved more than anyone else would manage to compensate for the lost thrill of work that you love. After all, you can't love work as you love people.

"I've got a fair notion of how I'd feel about my own children, because I adore my niece and nephew so. D'you mind if I turn into a doting aunt? Try and stop me," she laughed. "James Carter Herrmann is only four months old and mostly sleeps. But Gretchen, my namesake, is all of ten months. I generally stop by from the studio to call on her. She's rather a high-strung baby, not especially calm except with her father and mother and nurse.

"Well, Sally and I look quite a bit alike, and the other day she mistook me for her mother. She cooed and gurgled, and she has a trick—when you stick your lips out at her, like this, she sticks her own right back—and she patted my face with those little hands of hers. If there's any lovelier feeling in the world, I haven't met it. I tell you I had the most wonderful time of my life. I try to get there every day now before Sally comes home, so the baby'll make the same mistake. Low trick to play on your own sister, isn't it? But she doesn't mind.

"She said to me the other day, 'Gretch, there's nothing like it. To feel the absolute dependence of that little creature on you. To know you're the one person in the world she trusts instinctively, turns to for everything. To feel her hands clinging to you. I can't describe what it does to you—makes you humble and strong and reverent all at once, so your heart almost bursts, and you want to get down and pray that you'll never fail her. I don't want to get maudlin over it,' Sally told me, 'and I've had thrills before. But this kind of quiet thrill it tops them all.'"

Her long, lovely hands, on which a blue sapphire gleamed, were lying in her lap again. Her gray eyes were serene, as when they'd been gazing out toward an imaginary sea. Serene, but illumined with such tenderness that she might have posed for a young madonna as she said, "That's a thrill I hope life isn't going to cheat me of."

Don't Let It Get You Down

Rub a little into the cuticle and push back with the orange stick. Vaseline is better. If your family uses olive oil in cooking, there's nothing better than a little warm olive oil for both the dear old nails and the dear old scalp—before the shampoo. I admit, it doesn't smell very nice, and the prepared business sold on the drug-store counter is much nicer to use, but never mind.

Olive oil, vaseline or castor oil will groom and thicken your lashes and eyebrows. And there's the starch manufacturer who puts out the customary household starch in a lightly perfumed modification—cheap as can be and so nice that many women who could afford something more elegant prefer it to bath salts.

CLEANLINESS is a big problem when one is good and gol-dinged poor, and I hope I'm not treading on any sensitive toes when I say this. But I know. I know the problem of none-too-plentiful hot water, and how in the heck can a person get a good bath without hot water? Many is the household where the gas and oil bill must be watched like a hawk. Well, darlings, one can, by golly, gradually accustom oneself to bathing in cold water, and that sounds pretty heroic, but it can be done. And you can remember that, though it's lovely and luxurious to sit in a tub way up to your ears, you can get just as clean in half a tubful.

Then, too, there's the dress cleaning problem. That's why I advise you to put a good deodorant way up on your necessity list. And, for heavy dresses—anything made of wool, and sweaters, of course—pay out a quarter for a pair of arm shields. Print dresses that may run, if you perspire, should be protected with shields, too. Learn to use a cleaning fluid successfully, and get small spots out as quickly as you can. Here's a trick if you get grease on a dress: take your powder puff and slap powder onto the spot, right away. Leave the powder on for, say an hour, maybe—to absorb the grease, and then brush gently. You'd be surprised how many times I've used that emergency method and saved a cleaning bill. And here's a trick for your good woolen things—your heavy coat and your good tweed skirt. Hang them out in the rain. That's what I said. But remember, I said good things. Cheap stuff would shrink. But there's nothing softer than rain water, as you may have heard. And if a garment is just generally dusty and non-fresh, but not spotted, a day out on the line in a mild rain will clean it beautifully. You'll have to remove any fur or trimming, of course.

Here I've switched from the beauty theme to the clothes theme, but it's all part of the same problem, anyway. However, to return to other handicaps to the business of being beautiful . . .

There is the handicap of too little time, as well as the handicap of too little money. Too much work, too many responsibilities. The handicap, also, of a rather blah state of health, you know the feeling. You're not actually sick enough to go to bed, but you're not well enough to be much use. You manage to pull yourself together to do absolutely necessary things, but beyond that you say phooey.

There is the handicap of disapproval and ridicule . . . haven't I seen this with my own eyes in families where daughter is honestly making an effort to improve face and figure, while the entire family sneers or scolds. Mother says, "Now, all this dieting nonsense is ridiculous. Eat those potatoes, Miss Prissy!" Pop says, "Always fussing in front of the mirror!" There is often a younger brother to make everything just dandy, who says "Ooooh, my, it's Jean Harlow we have with us! Or is it Garbo you think you look like with them eyebrows? Nuts!" Yeah, it's kinda tough.

For the blah state of health, I have to fall back on the old advice about diet. Fruits, vegetables, lean meats; raw vegetables, especially raw cabbage and raw carrots. Nine times out of ten, constipation is at the root of this evil. Fight it intelligently. Take a mild saline laxative, and visit your doctor, if the condition persists. Take time for daily attention to this problem, and let household or other interference wait, by heck.

Also, for that rather pepless feeling, try salt baths or salt rubs, or both. Take a handful of common salt and moisten it, then rub your body with it, or simply toss it into the tub. Remember that a shower is invigorating, and tub baths are apt to be enervating; if you're mixed up on the meaning of those words, the first means swell for you, and the second means lousy for anybody lacking in pep. If you haven't a shower, you can order an attachable one from a mail-order house or buy parts in the five and dime store.

For the very busy girl or woman, the only way to handle the beauty problem is to plan ahead and plan intelligently. With a bunch of kids and a house to tend, you must set aside time to beautify yourself as systematically as you set aside a day for washing and ironing. With a job that keeps you stepping every minute of the day, I well know that at the end of that day you want one of two things: to fall into bed without so much as washing your face, or a date that will make you forget your weariness and the pressure of your responsibilities.

However, you can set aside, say, Thursday night, for shampooing, a thorough manicure, and odds and ends of sewing for yourself. You can take time for a beauty bath, a really luxurious soaking. While you're soaking, your face should be smeared with cream. You can wrap your fingernails in olive-oil soaked cotton and let them beautify while you loll in the tub. One night—out of seven—into bed early, feeling relaxed and beautified, with, maybe, a thin film of the cream still on your face; with, maybe, your freshly shampooed hair set with lotion and bobby pins and protected by one of those ten-cent silk mesh caps; with, maybe, your poor tired feet anointed with foot balm and raised up on a small pillow; with, in short, whatever particular beauty treatment you need.

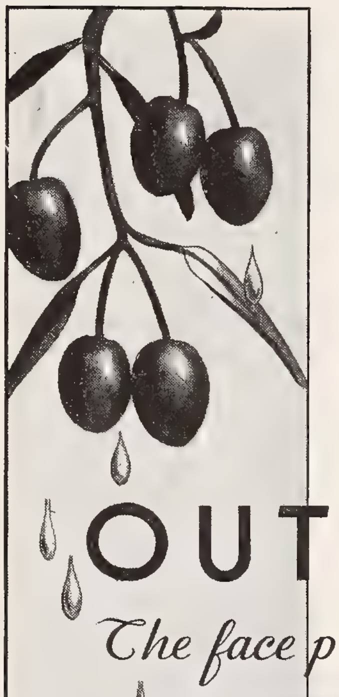
Returning to what I said about disapproval and ridicule, I get many letters which say, "My mother won't let me diet.

Don't let Summer-Drought get You!

Fields that were fresh and green in the springtime become parched and dry as summer sun burns up their life-giving moisture.

In this same way, the tender skin of your face, exposed to hot sun and drying wind, loses its fresh radiance and youthful attraction. Don't risk this tragedy! There's a way to guard this vital skin moisture.

Protect your allure this magic way—with Outdoor Girl Face Powder, which brings you the tried and true beauty aid—Olive Oil!



Olive Oil is a "Fountain of Youth" for your Skin . . .

Just as thirsty plants welcome drops of rain, your complexion craves the protecting touch of olive oil. Guard against destructive "Skin-thirst" with Outdoor Girl Face Powder — each fine flake carries a tiny particle of Olive Oil to keep it from "sponging-up" the natural moisture so essential to a youthful skin.

What should I do?" Blessed if I know how to answer them. If daughter has been going in for some screwy diet scheme, which doesn't give her enough to eat, I can't blame mama. But if mama raises the roof over daughter passing up the bread and potatoes, when daughter weighs a hundred and sixty, I can't blame daughter. I do feel that both mothers and daughters can be intelligent about this thing. After all, a sensible diet gives anybody enough to eat. If necessary, go to a doctor and get his O. K. on what you want to eat.

At the beginning of this article there are pictures of four people who have overcome all sorts of handicaps. I thought of Janet Gaynor's early days when I saw her in "A Star Is Born." Janet worked in a shoe store—a dreary, tiring job. She has never been particularly strong. I don't mean that she's suffering from any mysterious ailment, but you have only to look at her tiny body to understand that she's not made for wearisome physical effort.

In those early days, Janet's biggest trouble was eating. She didn't care a great deal about food. But she wanted to be a movie star some day—just like Esther Victoria Blodgett in "A Star Is Born"—and she forced herself to keep her skin clear and fresh and her small frame rounded, by sensible eating. Oh, to be sure, she had next door to no money, but good cream soups come in cans, for ten or twelve cents a can; a bottle of milk doesn't cost very much; if one hasn't the facilities for cooking fresh vegetables, the canned ones are excellent. Janet remembered these things and didn't fall into the working girl's villainous habit of snatching a quick bite in a drugstore, temporarily filling but lacking in nourishment.

It's strange to think of the aloof Garbo being up against it for the necessities of this world. But Sweden, even though a neutral country during the war, nevertheless felt the international pinch that seizes upon money, food and jobs in such times. Greta Garbo counted herself right lucky to get a job in a barber shop, lathering faces! Dreary, menial work that, for the woman who is now the world's Number One Siren. She didn't, when the first break came, suddenly leap into world acclaim, as the meagre information on her sometimes leads us to believe. She took any job that came along. One of her early movie ventures took her to Istanbul on a salary one needed a magnifying glass to see. When she came over here with Mauritz Stiller, it was a wild gamble. Perhaps you remember early pictures of Miss Garbo. The teeth that had to be straightened. The good, solid one hundred and forty-five pounds that covered her bones. Oh, yes, Miss Garbo has had a handicap or two to hurdle in her life.

Bette Davis and her mother and sister came down to New York from Boston. Bette and sister were going on the stage. The three of them took one room; they couldn't afford more. Mrs. Davis slept on two chairs, with suitcases placed between. Her girls slept in the one bed. It was they who needed the good night's rest, so that they'd be rested for tomorrow's job-hunting. Bette would boil a saucepan of water over a Sterno flame and then carefully steam the creases out of her good skirt. She had one pair of nice-looking pumps. She kept them shined and crackless by smearing them with cold cream and polishing them with plenty of elbow grease and an old cloth. She had long golden-brown hair in those days, and she gave it one hundred strokes with the brush before piling into bed.

Eleanor Powell's mother took a job as a waitress so that she might pay for ballet lessons for her daughter. Some famous dancer had said that Eleanor had a great deal of talent, but that a thorough training in ballet was essential to all dancers, no matter whether they wanted to toe dance, tap or truck. So Eleanor, who was pretty tired from dancing twice nightly in an Atlantic City club, would faithfully get up early and practice the twirls and leaps that, today, make her body as graceful as her feet are swift.

wanderlust. One young fellow talked to me for an hour. He was headed back to Pittsburgh, his home town. The only thing that stopped me from paging the city and asking someone to look him up and say hello and welcome home for me was that his name was 'John Smith.' They might have called the wrong chap."

Most of us, Fred Astaire said, have known days when luck wasn't exactly spelled "limousine." There was the time when he and Adele were in vaudeville, playing in Lafayette, Indiana. "One of the other acts on the bill," he said, "was a dog act. Adele and I were really the star act. But the dogs couldn't climb a ladder, so we had to climb the ladder to get to our dressing-room. The dogs got the star dressing-room!"

There was the time, too, though he didn't tell me this one—Ginger Rogers did—when he was refused admittance to the public ballroom at Santa Catalina Island. As a rule he doesn't care much for ballroom dancing, but being on the Island he wanted to see the big dance hall. He was dressed in sports clothes and the management refused him admittance because he was not wearing a necktie. Instead of announcing himself as the great Astaire, bringing the gray hair of the manager in shame and terror to the dust, he said nothing at all, went back to his hotel quietly, put on a tie and returned to the dance hall.

Fred Astaire simply doesn't play the Hollywood game. He doesn't play politics. He doesn't entertain the "right people," producers, directors, members of the Press unless they are his friends. And when they are his personal friends, he doesn't talk about them for publication. He said, "It might sound as though I were trying to get publicity out of my friends' names."

He drives about town, to and from the studio, in a station wagon. He drives himself. He eats lunch in his dressing-room. Sometimes Mrs. Astaire joins him there for lunch, other times it's a member of the publicity department or his director.

When he built his new home in Beverly Hills, he did not build a palace-sized place. It is a comfortable home with comfortable rooms, not museum-like. "They are rooms we can live in and talk in without using megaphones."

The servants in the Astaire menage are needed for everything they do. They do not crawl out from under rugs or dangle from the chandeliers, rendering superfluous services. Mr. Astaire likes to swim, so he has a swimming pool. He likes to play tennis, so he has a tennis court. Usable things. Fred doesn't "train" in the technical sense of the word. He keeps in condition all the year around by swimming and playing tennis, eating in moderation, never dieting, smoking very seldom.

He isn't superior about Hollywood. On the contrary, he said, "I have no desire to leave Hollywood or to go back to the stage. I don't think I ever will. Nor have I any desire to play 'Hamlet.' I am completely content to do what I am doing and to do it as perfectly as I can."

THERE is none of the artistic temperament in Fred Astaire—at least none of the brand which expresses itself in flare-ups, rages, walk-outs, strange disappearances. If he believes in the importance of an issue, he will go to bat about it. A few months ago he went into a clinch with his bosses about the number of pictures he should make a year. The studio wanted him to make more pictures. Astaire wanted to do fewer pictures, not because of the hard work more films would involve, but because he believed that too much of him would wear the public interest thin. His greatest gratification was not that he won his point, but that the studio saw his point, agreed with him, conceded that he was right and said so.

He never loses his temper on the set with anyone except himself. I witnessed such an occurrence only recently. Fred and Ginger were doing a song number for the fifteenth time. Everything was going smoothly, camera, sound, lights. And then Fred blew a line. He snapped his fingers, which was illustrative of his impatience with himself, and then he began all over again. If the cameraman flukes after he has done a difficult routine, if any other member of the cast misses a step or goes up on a line, the Astaire surface is smooth, unruffled, smiling.

He can't "make things up" about himself, his work, his life. He cannot pose or pretend. These are elements which were simply left out of him.

The young man who works most closely with Fred Astaire explained this, "Sure most actors talk about themselves, but Mr. Astaire is not 'most actors.' He isn't like the rest of them. I was an actor myself once, and I know the breed. Many of them are of the 'dese, dose and dem' variety. Not Mr. Astaire. He never really rubbed elbows with his fellow actors. When he began, at the age of eight, his mother and Adele were with him every minute. The very instant they came off the stage, she was there to take them off with her. He was never one of the gang. And there isn't a finer man living. I," said this earnest young man, "would give up my job for him if he wanted me to. There isn't anything I wouldn't do, gladly, for Mr. Astaire."

HE was only a little shaver of eight when he first went on the road, into the grind of vaudeville. He never played marbles, baseball or football, went on picnics, climbed trees like other little lads. Perhaps that wistful look in the Astaire eyes, that something plaintive in his laugh, may be the residue of a longing for things he never had.

"When I was a kid," Fred said, "I was mad about baseball. I wanted to see all of the games. The nearest I came to baseball was collecting the little books about it the other kids collected, too. I didn't have time, you see.

"I would have liked to go further in school. I couldn't do two jobs then. I can't do two jobs now.

"I wish I had been able to study music. It's an ambition of mine to write a real hit song some day, a tune everyone will be playing and humming. The songs I have written, and had published, weren't so hot," Fred said, with that rueful smile of his. "My favorite among 'em was 'Not My Girl,' but Adele thought 'Blue Without You' and 'Tapping the Tune' the best of the lot.

"I always liked to play the piano. I still do. When Adele and I were in vaudeville, a musician who knew my weakness would occasionally let me fill in for him while a picture was showing. I'd sit down there in the pit and have a whale of a time banging out martial airs while the cavalry rode to the rescue, or playing soft moonlight-and-roses melodies while the hero made love to the heroine. I'm sure I played Irving Berlin songs. If anyone had prophesied then that the time would come when I'd be dancing on the screen to Berlin tunes, I would have thought the prophet mad."

When I asked him to explain why he can't talk about himself, he said, "But I have. I've told everything there is to tell —where I was born, when and why I first went on the stage, my theories of the dance and how I came into pictures—everything."

He honestly believes that he has. He believes that his work is all that is of interest to anyone. The only song and dance which Fred Astaire can never give is a song and dance about himself. He's one of Hollywood's most unique citizen.

The Inside Story of Joan's Divorce

uneventful, self-conscious childhood. From the cradle forward, she had led a wallflower existence, subdued by the glamor of two older sisters. At long last, she had been sent away to school. And there, she had ceased to be neglected on the sidelines. People noticed her, liked her. One boy—his name was John Fox—said that he loved her.

All of her life she had had one recurring daydream of an escape from loneliness. A daydream of meeting someone who would understand her instinctively, without words—love her—want to be always with her.

With all the headlong impetuousness of sixteen, she told herself that John Fox was that someone. He told her that he loved her and would always love her. She told herself that the attraction that he had for her was not girlish infatuation; it was love. They eloped.

HER surprised family talked of an annulment action; after all, Joan was under age. Her mother finally decided against any interference. Joan's life was her own, and Adrienne Morrison Bennett trusted her to make the most of it. Perhaps the marriage would last; perhaps it wouldn't. But Joan had the right, her mother decided, to find out for herself.

Joan soon discovered that what she had thought was love was, instead, a delusion. She hoped that the coming of a baby might change all that. Countless babies, countless times before, had brought happiness to couples who had not been particularly happy. That was another self-delusion. Motherhood gave Joan only mother-love.

By the time she was eighteen, she had been a wife, a mother and a divorcee. She had made a mistake which could be charged off to youthful inexperience. All right, she had admitted her mistake, but she would not ask anyone else to pay for it. She wanted no alimony for herself. And she would not ask her own family to support her.

Joan had not been trained for any career except that of a society girl. But acting was in her blood. That was one thing at which she might be able to earn a living and insure small Diana's future, if she tried hard enough.

"Trying hard enough" absorbed her completely for the next three years. Her life revolved around her career and her child.

She established herself as an actress. Her income passed the point where worry about Diana's future was necessary. Joan relaxed. She began to notice the life about her. She began to go out, meet people, join in parties. Then the unexpected happened. She fell in love. Head over heels in love.

All except those who knew Joan in those days have forgotten that—or never heard of it. Yet, more than anything else, it explains why the Markey-Bennett marriage was destined, eventually, to founder —even if no one else ever happened along.

This love was not a case of self-hypnosis. It was the real thing. Joan had never known before what love was like. Now she learned, for the first time, how quickly and quietly and surely it can pick you up, lift you to the clouds, dazzle you with the shining brightness of the world, then shake you into a forgetfulness of self so completely that you are conscious only of your heart, which alternately aches with loneliness and pounds with joy.

And Joan Bennett found that kind of love, only to lose it.

She became one side of a dramatic triangle. The other two sides were John Considine, forging ahead as a young producer, and Carmen Pantages, beautiful brunette daughter of the theatre magnate, Alexander Pantages.

It was no secret to those close to Joan that she was unmistakably in love. It was no secret to those close to Carmen that she was just as unmistakably in love. No one knew which Considine favored. He was attentive to both. No one had dared to prophesy which girl he might marry—when his engagement to Carmen was announced.

Joan took it very hard—so hard that friends worried about her health. Then, suddenly, she had reason again to be happy. The Considine-Pantages engagement was broken. John was attentive to Joan again. But only briefly. Only a few weeks after their public cancellation of all wedding plans, John and Carmen were quietly married.

At the time, Joan was in a hospital with a broken hip—an injury incurred in a fall from a horse during the making of a movie scene. There were rumors that her screen career was over, that she would never walk again. And her friends were convinced that Joan cared little whether the rumors might be true or not. Life hardly seemed worth the living.

ONE day, a friend calling on her in an effort to cheer her up, brought along a friend of his, whom he introduced as "Gene Markey, the writer." Gene entertained her; she liked him. He more than reciprocated.

The next day, she received a little note from him, which read, "Dear Miss Bennett—When you are feeling better, I hope you will allow me to call."

She laid it away with other get-well notes and might have forgotten about it completely, if she had not received constant memoranda in the form of flowers. And when she was finally discharged from the hospital, he was one of the first to call on her. He became one of her constant callers. He was unmistakably in love.

When she could walk well enough again to get about a little, Joan wanted to do just one thing: go away, take a long trip, escape from the scene of her heartache.

She sailed for New York. Gene saw her to the boat—to give her a going-away message that he loved her.

During the long, lonely voyage to New York, she was deluged with radiograms from Gene. When she arrived in New York, she received daily phone calls from him, amusing wires, flowers. He wanted Joan to marry him.

She married Gene on the rebound from a broken romance.

Joan had not known, when she married the first time, what love was. She did know when she married the second time. So perhaps she deserves condemnation for marrying a second time, with that knowledge; perhaps not. You or I might have done as she did, in her place. Joan, after all, was honestly convinced that if she ever could fall in love again, Gene Markey was likely to be the man.

The ironic part of it was that Joan, who had loved someone who did not love her in return, was now in the position of being more loved than loving. The tragic part of it was that, to Gene, their union was not an affectionate companionship which might become something greater. To him, it was already love.

Joan tried to repay him for his devotion. She hoped, as in her first marriage, that the coming of a baby might give her something that was lacking in her life. Something intangible, indescribable, important. She interrupted her career to bear Gene a child.

The years passed. Joan knew fame and wealth and popularity. She had a beautiful home. She had two lovely children. She had a husband who was brilliant, fascinating, devoted. She had every outward reason to be happy. But always, despite all that she said in her interviews and tried to believe herself, something was missing from her happiness. In her heart of hearts, she did not have the love that every woman lives to have.

The day Joan Bennett admitted that to herself, that day she knew that her marriage would not endure. It could not.

THE Markeys have moved in one of the most exclusive social Hollywood circles. And so, the Markey-Bennett divorce will split that tight little circle wide apart. For, two of the members of that little group have discovered that they should be married to each other. They are in love. It is late for them to make such a discovery. But, perhaps, not too late. The pity of it is that, in clearing the way to their own happiness, they have to hurt someone else.

But—if they cannot be happy except with each other—what other recourse is there? They have tried to convince themselves that this is not love; that their futures are with their present mates. The efforts have failed. The announcement of Joan's divorce has been on the way for at least six months. Those close to the inner circle have seen it coming.

Gene has taken it very hard. Last Valentine's Day, he sent Joan a heart-breaking Valentine, written by himself, and saying that once she had loved him, and now she didn't and why couldn't they be happy as they had once been happy?

That Valentine arrived too late. Joan's efforts to be happy except with the man she loved had already failed.

What brought the actual announcement of Joan's divorce plans? There was no final dramatic scene. There was only an accumulation of small irritations on both sides—irritations extending over a period of months, mounting to a point where "incompatibility" did describe their disharmony. Until finally Joan—always a realist—asked herself, "What's the use of our even pretending to be happy any longer?" She called her lawyer and told her press-agent to release the news to the papers.

That is the inside story of Joan Bennett's divorce.

"One time I was invited to a 'small dinner party.' Only a horde of fifty people finally showed up. During the course of the party, the hostess said coyly, 'When are you going to say something funny, Mr. Powell?' Then she turned to the rest of the table and said in her quaint falsetto scream, 'I've heard that Mr. Powell saves all his bon mots for the screen; but who believes such a thing?'

"That," Bill cocked one eyebrow eloquently, "goes to show you what can happen, if you try to be yourself and go out in public, too."

BILL paused, considered a moment. Then he continued: "Of course, if you don't go out, you run another kind of risk. People misunderstand your motives.

"Cultivate solitude and quiet and a few sincere friends, rather than mob merriment, noise and thousands of nodding acquaintances, and you're called a hermit. They suspect you of having a grudge against the world, or going high-hat, or being afraid your 'art' will be contaminated by contact with the common herd.

"So far as I know, I haven't been accused of that yet. That's where Nick Charles and 'My Man Godfrey' and some of the other boys have done me a good turn. No one would accuse them of being stuck-up. So I'm not accused.

"But people do wonder why I spend so much time by myself. They can't understand it. Here you are, wondering yourself.

"It's all very simple. Painfully simple. It all comes down to this: More actors have been ruined by the cry, 'For he's a jolly good fellow,' than by all the poor roles in the world. The charity lists are full of them.

"You can live on hey-hey for awhile, but it's a diet that tears you down, instead of building you up. I know; I've had a try at it. We all have a try at it when we first feel our oats and are showing off a bit.

"On one of those 'mornings after,' you awake with a cracking head and an ache to get away from it all. It's inevitable. You ask yourself how many real friends you have among all the good-time Charlies. You wonder if you haven't had a one-sided education, concentrating on parties and night-clubs. You wonder if you aren't missing something. You wonder if there isn't something in books, fine music, outdoor life, travel.

"In short, you grow up. You go into solitary confinement, just for a change and find it the least confining life you've ever known."

Bill paused, grinned, said, "A serious guy, this Powell!" His mood changed, and again he was light.

"Then there's another thing. I have an uncontrollable urge for old clothes. That's what wearing so many dress suits has done to me. 'Comfort at any price' has become my private-life motto.

"Some tailoring connoisseurs, again confusing me with my screen characters, have nominated me as 'one of the best-dressed men in Hollywood.' It only proves they don't know me. A 'best-dressed man' should be sartorially perfect every hour of the twenty-four—which I'm not.

"My favorite evening garb, alone at home, is attire that looks like something out of the Salvation Army's old-clothes bins, or else a dressing gown and shorts. That's one reason, too, why I never eat in the studio commissary, never give luncheon interviews. Eating in my dressing-room, I can take off my clothes and be comfortable. And have another look at the script."

VISITORS to sets, watching William Powell at work, invariably comment on his delivery of lines, his sureness, his naturalness, his perfect timing. There is an explanation for that, too, which is tied up directly with his hermit existence.

"As an actor, I'm no genius," he told me. "I can't glance over some lines just before going into a scene and then say them smoothly, with every nuance of inflection they ought to have. No. I have to work for my living.

"I have to memorize my lines the night before, when I have time to try out how they should be delivered. I try 'em one way, then another, until I hit upon the most effective way. Maybe I'm too damned conscientious; but that's the way I have to work.

"Doing that takes a large part of any evening. But it has its compensations the next day. I'm not tense when I get on a set, all tied up in knots, worried about my lines. I know 'em. I'm sure of the way to say 'em. I can relax. I can be effortless, natural. Maybe I'm wrong, but I don't think that can help showing in the finished picture."

He's far from wrong. But still you wonder why he lives so completely alone. Why doesn't he live with Bill, Jr., his fast-growing son by his long-ago first wife? They're famous pals.

"Every other week-end, I spend with Bill, Jr.," he said. "My father and mother are usually along. It's a regular family reunion.

"He's a great boy—and all-boy. He goes to a private school here on the Coast and spends his summers at camp and rates high with the other fellows for what he is, not for what his father may be. I want to keep things that way.

"I'd like to have him with me. But I can't do that and expect him to have a normal life. The spotlight would be on him. And the spotlight isn't good for any growing boy, no matter whose son he is."

ASK Bill what truth there is in the persistent rumors of a near-future marriage, and he shrugs his shoulders noncommittally.

A few years ago, he built one of the show-places of Southern California. Into it went every known comfort device and glamorous decoration. In fact, he had the help of Jean Harlow in the decoration, a circumstance that provoked surmises that he and Jean were about to marry and that Bill was about to forsake forever his non-party existence. But, to the best of anyone's knowledge, both still are single. Bill still is dodging parties. And the house is no longer his.

"I'll never own property again," he told me. "There's too much grief connected with it.

"I didn't build that house for myself. Heaven forfend! I couldn't have used all those rooms in fifty years. The real reason I built it was because I didn't know what else to do with my money. If you remember, the dollar was sinking to nothing, banks were closing, even gilt-edged bonds were a gamble. So I put what I had into this house, in the hope of retrieving it, maybe even making something when things picked up.

"When I finally got rid of it a few months ago, I took another big house in part-payment. Now I'm rid of that, too, and leasing a smaller place in Bel-Air. My worries as a man of property are over."

He won't talk about Jean, or about women in general. He won't talk about any of his close friends. The reason: "Back in the early days, I gave an interview in which I made some remark about actors in general. A friend of mine took it as a personal affront. He hasn't spoken to me since."

Neither will Jean talk about Bill. But intimate friends of both, not so reticent, say, "They're very fond of each other. Very. There probably isn't a more companionable couple in Hollywood today. They're both lonely people who have discovered that, together, they aren't lonely; they have a million laughs together. But it's companionship, not love. That breathless, eager note just isn't there—yet."

That may explain Bill's persistent bachelorhood.

Before he started "The Emperor's Candlesticks," there were rumors that Why are we Drifting apart?"

"What has happened to us, Dear?

How could he answer frankly? How could he tell her that one serious neglect — a lack of proper attention to feminine cleanliness — had made her almost repulsive to him?

IF UNHAPPY COUPLES would consult doctors, instead of divorce-lawyers, many a wife would be surprised to learn why her husband's love had cooled. Often it is due simply to ignorance about the proper precautions to insure intimate personal daintiness.

A wholesome method of feminine hygiene is important not only for your own sense of personal cleanliness and comfort. It is often still more important for the sensibilities of your husband. For no man's love can long survive neglect of this obligation that marriage brings to every woman. Many doctors recommend "Lysol" disinfectant as a cleanly aid in feminine hygiene, as a means of assuring freshness and daintiness.

Lysol Disinfectant

The fact that "Lysol" disinfectant is used by many doctors, nurses and hospitals—for many exacting antiseptic needs—is your assurance that "Lysol", in the correct solutions, does not hurt or harm normal tissue. There are many other valuable household uses for "Lysol".

The 6 Special Features of "Lysol"

1. NON-CAUSTIC..."Lysol", in the proper dilution, is gentle and efficient. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.
2. EFFECTIVENESS..."Lysol" is active under practical conditions...in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.).
3. PENETRATION..."Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.
4. ECONOMY..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.
5. ODOR...The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears after use.
6. STABILITY..."Lysol" keeps its full, dependable strength no matter how long it is kept, no matter how often it is uncorked.

he not only wanted to be alone, but wanted a fight with his studio. A widely read columnist hinted that he was hiding out in the desert, rebelling against the role of Baron Volenski.

Bill laughed about that. "Somebody was trying hard to start a fight between the studio and me. It was too bad, really, that we had to spoil the fun. You see, the studio knew why I went to the desert, and it wasn't for the rumored reason.

"I went for a bit of convalescence. I had the flu, and it left me with a whisper instead of a voice. And I was giving this eye a rest." He exhibited an optic that, on close examination, was inflamed. "It's still giving me trouble. Last Fall, the eyeball was sunburned. The immediate result was a flaking. And ever since, there has been a burning sensation, particularly after a siege in front of the lights. It's nothing serious, but it's annoying. After this picture, I'm planning to go East for some special treatment.

"From there, if the doctor says okay, I'm hoping to go on over to England for a picture. I can use a little travel, a change of scenery.

"My contract is up for renewal after this picture, and I'm hoping to settle for two pictures a year, one here and one, perhaps, in England. Anything I make over two pictures goes to the tax collector, anyway. Also, I've a hunch that with fewer pictures, the public won't weary of this physiognomy so soon. I still want to be around, years hence.

"How do I explain my 'recent success?' My friend, I've tried for years to figure out why I've been treated so handsomely by the public, and it still has me puzzled.

"I'm doing the best I can, but I'm afraid I'm not quite as good as I'm supposed to be. God knows there are other actors who are better-looking, and better actors than I am. It all seems to simmer down to the idea that luck has a great deal to do with success. Luck—and a little privacy, a chance to keep your head, time to study your work.

"That's another reason why I want to be alone. To sort of preserve my luck."

all day. His training had begun at an early age.

At the Mills School, Finchley (the same type of school that later was to be made famous in "Good-bye, Mr. Chips"), they said that young Blore was a problem. A laughing problem. He could make the funniest face of any undergrad. But there's a pay-off even to making funny faces. Lately, when it was suggested to his home studio that they buy "Mr. Chips" from a rival company and give him the title role, he had to object. He'd have given that batty right eye of his to do the role, but he had to turn it down because an audience expects to laugh when they see him. And he couldn't have them laughing at Mr. Chips.

NONE of the Blores was professional. "But they should have been," he says staunchly. "My grandmother could throw better hysterics than I've ever seen on the stage. One always rushed around for brandy and fresh air."

Henry Blore had been an honor student in classics at Trinity College, Dublin, and today is a member of the Board of Education in London. When his son, Eric, determined on a stage career at seventeen, he fulminated violently. The earth, in the immediate vicinity of their ancestral house, rocked. Grandmother Blore had hysterics. Eric brought her the brandy but refused to budge from his decison. They're not budgers, these Blores. Father and son did, however, reach an agreement. If Eric promised to take the Civil Service examinations, Blore pere would give him a roof over his head in necessity, providing that Harry Pelissier said the boy had a "demn speck of talent." Pelissier, one of the leading actors of England at the time, heard Eric, assured his father he had considerably more in the way of talent than a "demn speck," and Eric took the exams. To his lifelong amazement and consternation, he passed.

"There's a future in Civil Service," his father pointed out.

"Yes," said Eric dismally, "a pension at ninety."

He went into an insurance office, but his heart was around the corner at Blackmore's theatrical agency. He followed his heart. Already he had made his professional debut at a stag party in a Fleet Street hotel. The fire of enthusiasm remained, but his money did not.

He was rattling his last lonely shilling when Kismet, the soothsayer, walked into the agency. Kismet with an astrakhan collar on his coat and an enormous gold band on his finger with the raised lettering, Che sarà sarà (What will be, will be). This indeed was Fate! And the gentleman was looking for a secretary to accompany him to the Alps. Young Mr. Blore accepted with haste, and just as hastily regretted his decision. Kismet had a sudden premonition, warning him that a trip to Switzerland would spell disaster.

SO Eric came back to London, back to warming a seat at Blackmore's. Young Mr. Blore looked askance at the next astrakhan collared coat that walked in. But this time G. P. Huntley, Sr., England's foremost comedian, was in it. It seemed he was taking his company of "The Merrymakers" on a year's tour of Australia and South Africa. He had a spot for young Mr. Blore.

Huntley not only taught the boy the fine art of comedy, but he taught him how to take it on the chin after traveling thirteen thousand miles to make an appearance—only to get the "bird" on opening night. That's what happened to "The Merrymakers" in Melbourne. They had to rewrite the show to fit the local brand of humor.

After that, success crowned their efforts. By the time Blore returned to England he was an established character in the theatre. He was just clicking neatly when war clamped down on Europe. Here was adventure on a gigantic scale.

They made him a lieutenant. They gave him a gun. His first job was to teach men the delicate feat of "shouldering arms." (Remember that scene in "Sons O' Guns" where he put Joe E. Brown through a musketry drill? That was apple pie for Eric. History repeated itself.) He discovered his platoon remembered the system better if they rhymed it. And what a shock the Colonel got when he heard those rookies chanting:

"I start on the cocking piece and I don't care a damn,
I work in conjunction with the long and short cam!"

The Blore battle methods undoubtedly were unique. Many a time you can win with a laugh what you can't with a bullet and he was fully aware of it. When transferred to the Balloon Service, he formed a group called the Balloonatics that kept the 38th Infantry in stitches and his batman kept Blore in stitches. This batman, Fleming, had been head butler for the Earl of Cambridge. He had a personal acquaintance with most of the leading family skeletons in and out of England and a fusty sense of humor. "The Kaiser, 'e's not so bad, sir. But the Crown Prince—now there, sir, is a man I could 'ardly like!" Fussy chap, Fleming.

It may or may not be singular that after the war Blore's chief success in America came from his interpretation of butler roles. And many a mannerism, he'll tell you, is Fleming-ized!

He further immortalized his batman by writing a skit around him. That was after the message came. The two of them, you see, had been slithering in the mud of front-line trenches for a couple of thousand years or so when a dispatch rider arrived with it. "Lieut. Blore," it read, "will report at headquarters forthwith." That was all. The batman raised an eyebrow hopefully. "I don't know what it means," said Blore, "but we're leaving and it's in the right direction."

At headquarters a brigadier-general gave him the orders. Two staff colonels conducted him personally to the Chateau Querrieu. Blore's job henceforth was to provide laughter for a hundred thousand men. He had become concert party director for the Division. It was a short time later that he wrote "The Admirable Fleming." Subsequently it ran two years in London. And there at the Chateau they put it on for the Prince of Wales. The Prince (the Duke of Windsor to us), oddly enough, was to play a strangely dramatic part in Blore's life.

On a leave in London Eric had dropped in on Leslie Howard's show, "Under Cover." There was an exquisite girl in the cast, Violet Winter. An introduction was arranged. He saw her home. In truth, he saw her every day of his leave after that. The day he had to return to the front there was a heavy fog. Silently for awhile, they groped through the mist. Then, "I'm going to marry you, aren't I?" Maybe it was the fog that got in his throat as he waited for her answer. She smiled. "I think so," she said.

They were married on his next trip home in 1917. The war ended in 1918. Blore had just given an entertainment for the young Prince. The brigadier-general was still laughing. "You'll be the last of this division to be demobilized, Blore. I can't afford to lose you!"

Blore's expression changed. "I'm sorry about that, sir, because my wife is very ill. I'd hoped to be mustered out soon."

The Prince looked over at the general. "I think that shall be done, sir, don't you?" A royal command, gently put. The following Wednesday Eric was back in England. Even so, it was too late. His wife had died three hours before he landed.

Life lost a good bit of its zest after that. They had to lock him in his room to make him write. Even the stage lost flavor. One evening he was sitting in the Green Room Club pretty much fed up with everything when Gilbert Miller came in. "What about taking me to America, old man?"

"Okay," said the producer. And that's the way it came about that a month later Eric Blore was playing on Broadway in "Little Miss Bluebeard."

"There's adventure in the air here," he says. "Anything can happen and everything does!"

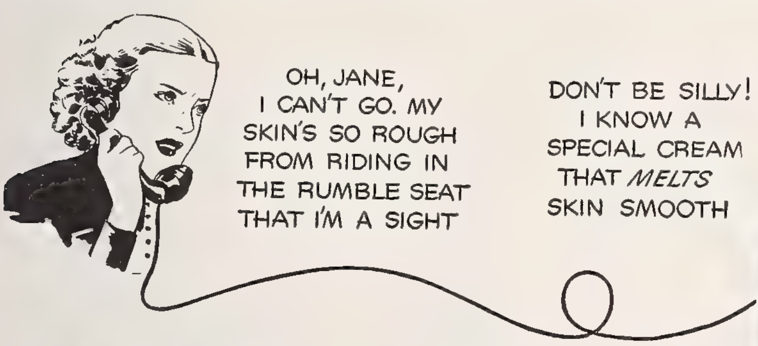
For example, the time the movie mogul, Lou Brock, spotted him doing a superbutling job in "The Gay Divorcee," with Fred Astaire. "If you want to come to Hollywood just wire me," said Lou.

It was as easy as that, and in the two and a half years he's been here, Eric has played in twenty-eight pictures, mostly butler roles. Lately he's graduated to a hotel manager in "Shall We Dance." He never goes to see his pictures unless somebody tells him they're terrible. Then he hurries over to see what's wrong.

His professed passion is golf, but the only one he's ever been able to beat is his nine-year-old son. And that, he points out, was simply because the boy started with the assumption that the more strokes you took, the better you were.

In 1926 Blore married a member of his company, Clara Mackin. Eric, Jr. is their one heir.

Only once in America has Blore played a serious role; that was in the Theatre Guild production of "Roar China." He infinitely prefers making people roar. He's funny that way.



OH, JANE, I CAN'T GO. MY SKIN'S SO ROUGH FROM RIDING IN THE RUMBLE SEAT THAT I'M A SIGHT

"I am a man born of the child who knew the stern, almost monastic, repressions of a home where love manifested itself only in stern prohibitions, icy restrictions. But I am also the product of the man who has met women of all nations, kinds and callings. I have known women of genius, women of color and fire, women of sacrifice and stone, women who were flowers, and women who labored in the fields.

"And always I have hoped, dreamed that one day I might meet the woman for whom I could feel a love that would endure, a love of my mind for her mind as well as my body for her body. A man looks on a woman and feels a beautiful emotion surging through him. He wants to hold fast to it, never let himself grow out of it. Whether this ideal state of affairs can ever occur, I cannot say. But certainly I have always thought and believed that the mutual development of a man and a woman, growing closer together through all the years of their lives, is the only completely satisfying human relationship."

Francis was seated behind his business-like desk, in a high-backed chair, in his Hollywood Boulevard offices. Here the business called Francis Lederer is transacted. As he spoke, he fixed me with his dark, intensely living and so often burning eyes fed by so many differing flames. Intellectual flames of the philosophy student; zealous flames of the peace advocate who gives of his time and money unsparingly that the world may be saved from war; devotional flames of the man who is in love with Margo.

He was saying, "I have, also, the background of one who—how shall I say this—one who believes in women." When Francis is uncertain of the exact word he wants to use, he takes a dictionary from his desk and consults it. "A woman," he said, "has been responsible for every progressive step I have ever made in my career. I have no throne," laughed Francis, "but if I had, there would be many women behind it.

MAY I tell you about them? There was, first of all, Elsa Wohlgemuth of the Vienna Theatre. Ah," breathed Francis, "she was magnificent; at least six feet tall, with an incredible carriage, a face so noble, a voice rich and deep and moving. You can imagine what she must have seemed to a little actor like me, just four months on the stage, playing small parts in a little stock company in Bruenn, Czecho-Slovakia. In those days, in Europe, a great artist did not bring her cast with her when she toured small cities. She selected her play, then rehearsed with the local stock company of whatever town or city she happened to visit on tour. So I knew that Elsa Wohlgemuth was coming to Bruenn. For days in advance I was cold and hot, running chills and fevers of anticipation. We rehearsed the morning of her arrival. Oh, that arrival! There is nothing like it over here. They are so revered over there, the great artists of the stage. They mingle with the court, with royalty.

"So, then, we rehearsed, and that night we played together. And I, I played the lover of Elsa Wohlgemuth. She was so tall," smiled Francis, "and I not so tall as I am now. And when I clasped her in amorous embrace I had to embrace her about the—shall we say the stomach? In my zeal to make the lovely embrace as fervent as I felt it, I ripped my costume badly down the back. That was in the last act. Worse yet," laughed Francis, whose sense of humor plays impudent music across the more sombre keys of his mind, "in the very last scene, I was supposed to stab myself. Such was my excess of emotion that I actually did stab myself here, in the chest. As the curtain rang down, I stood wounded and bleeding and unconscious of the wound.

"But here is the climax. You will be disappointed. Elsa Wohlgemuth did not address one word to me the entire time she was there. I did not know what her opinion of me was, or whether she so much as gave me a thought. And then, two days after she had gone, a letter came to me. It was from the great Burg Theatre in Vienna. It advised me that upon the warm personal recommendation of Elsa Wohlgemuth, they were inviting me to have an audition preliminary to offering me a contract. I passed the audition creditably. I could not accept the contract because the management in Bruenn would not release me.

"Of course I was in love with Elsa Wohlgemuth," smiled Francis, "but only as in a dream we may love Venus. And she was the first to make me know that a woman may hold out her hand to help and yet withold her heart.

SOME while later, when I played in Breslau, Germany, Kaethe Dorsch came to town. I played, then, the sergeant in the play, 'Rain.' Kaethe was the idol of the German theatre, even as Elsa of the Austrian. And just as Elsa had not spoken to me, so Kaethe did not even bother to hold out the tips of her lovely fingers in greeting. Her only words to me were these, 'When does your contract with this theatre expire?' A few days after her departure I got, by express, a letter from one of the biggest theatres in Berlin. Kaethe Dorsch had been talking about me, and the theatre was interested. Thus, a second time, a woman's hand, untouched by mine, was held out to help me on my way.

"In Berlin, I was playing in a French comedy, when I was told that Henny Porten, the idol of the German screen, was in a box in the theatre. Henny was the Mary Pickford, the Garbo, the Helen Hayes, all combined, of the German screen. She was beautiful, with hair of gold, and flesh of snow and moonlight. As an adolescent, I had written in my diary that some day I should like to play in a picture with Henny Porten. Three nights after the night of her presence in the theatre, I received a call from her office. I went there. They made, then and there, photographic tests of me for a part opposite Henny Porten. I had done only extra work in pictures before this. She had seen me only in comedy; French light. And they put me, immediately, into the dramatic lead opposite her. Again," laughed Francis, "I regret to tell you that our fingers never touched, save on the stage. We had no rendezvous. She was happily married. Her husband was a great physician. She gave me another lesson in the fact that beautiful women can be beautifully impersonal.

"In those days in Berlin I was making pictures by day, working on the stage at night. One such night Elisabeth Bergner was in the audience. She saw the play. She went directly to Max Reinhardt and told him of what he already knew, that she had searched Europe for just the right Romeo to play opposite the Juliet she longed to do. I was, she told him, the Romeo she sought. And, so, I played Romeo to Bergner's Juliet. On the opening night," Francis' eyes shone, mischievously pleased with the tapestry he was weaving for me, each thread supplied by a woman's hand, "Lillian Gish was present. Immediately afterwards, United Artists called me and asked me to come to Hollywood to play opposite Miss Gish in a Max Reinhardt production. I came to Hollywood. Unforeseen events made the projected play unfeasible. But there I was; and here I am.

"And so you see," Francis said, "I have been brought to Hollywood by a chain of women's hands. Beautiful women, talented women—to these I owe everything that I am. Always they have made the way smoother for me. Is it not strange? Is it not remarkable? And if," his eyes held, now, a naughty look, "if I must regret that they, who were so beautiful, so kind, so generous, were also impersonal, I must also revere them for believing in a man, helping him and loving him not at all!

"To find real love, however, has always been my goal. Always I have hoped to find the woman with whom there would be that mutual development, growing together, knowing one another down to the roots of our beings. And when I do find such a woman, I shall not count it an end but a beginning, the first stage of a process of growth. Nor is it always possible, or even necessary to be continually together," Francis said. "I would not ask a woman to give up her career for me, to stay at home, to be idle of her work. What more right would I have than she would have to ask me to give up my career so that I could always be around, in our home, on the sets with her?

"I am very grateful to women," Francis said, seeming to make a courtly little bow, "I am grateful to women who are magnificent when they love and to women who can be equally magnificent and generous when they do not love."

So a rule was changed to give this Good News to Certain People

"I HAD A sister-in-law who was so nervous, in fact for years, she would say, I am so nervous my body itches all over and she at times would embarrass me as she was always either scratching her foot or her arm or her leg, and I said really you should see a doctor as you make me so nervous you don't sit still a minute.

She finally decided on seeing one of the best doctors in Chicago (I could give you his name at any time) and after he examined her he found nothing wrong. Just told her to rest more and take things calmly. He said, have you ever used Linit. She said, well, I don't do my own washing. He said, No, I mean for the Bath. She said, No. So he said, now I want you to buy it, and use ½ a box in your bath every morning and see what fine results you gain from it.

I can't tell you what a different person she is due to this product. In fact, her whole appearance is different to me. Her face looks 10 years younger, she seems so much more relaxful and can truthfully say, her body is free from that horrible itching, that she had, all due to this wonderful product.

★★ Slim

Power linemen working for electric companies are a hardy crew of steel-nerved gypsies who wander from job to job, spend all their money on liquor and women and don't give a volt for a lily-livered sissy who intimates he'd just as soon be in some other field of endeavor. At least, that's the message one gathers from "Slim," a treatise on the care and upbringing of these strange characters. The Warner Brothers, with their flair for he-man drama, manage to give "Slim" a goodly quota of excitement, especially in the scenes where the linemen are repairing power lines during a blizzard.

The cast is headed by Pat O'Brien, Henry Fonda and Margaret Lindsay. Miss Lindsay, a nurse in a Chicago hospital, is O'Brien's girl, but she wants him to quit his dangerous profession and settle down. This sort of talk is poison to Lineman O'Brien and almost unbelievable to Henry Fonda, a country lad who, by becoming a lineman, has reached his life's goal. An accident on the power lines conveniently does away with Pat O'Brien, leaving the expected combination of Fonda and Lindsay to carry on.

O'Brien, in a role less noisy than he usually draws, handles it capably. Henry Fonda, whose specialty seems to be rustic young gents, turns in a good performance, and Margaret Lindsay is acceptable as the heroine. Stuart Erwin furnishes rather long-winded comedy, and J. Farrell MacDonald and Craig Reynolds head the supporting cast. Directed by Ray Enright.—Warner Bros.

★★ Hollywood Cowboy

George O'Brien again proves that he has something besides a mass of muscle. O'Brien is a Hollywood movie actor here who makes wild and woolly pictures of life in the wide open spaces. The plot thickens when he takes an actual trip into a section of God's country which is not on the movie lot and proves to a gang of roughnecks that his punch is as efficacious in the jaw as in celluloid. The meanies are a new type to hoss operas, being a gang who are bent on getting money from cattle owners through a phoney insurance racket. When the ranchers object, they find their herds scattered to the four winds and the four corners of Wyoming. This is done by the unique method of airplanes which swoop down long enough to create havoc on the plains, then are lost to sight behind them thar hills. George gets out a pursuit plane and manages not only to round up the blackguards and the cattle but also to provide as thrilling a chase as we've seen in any picture, bar none. George isn't doing this only for the course of justice, but for Cecilia Parker, who is the latest recruit to the ranks of fair lassies for whom he has fought the good fight and won. Directed by Ewing Scott.—RKO-Radio.

★★ The Go-Getter

You should set aside an evening for "The Go-Getter" if for no other reason than to see one of the best performances of the year—that of Charles Winninger as "Cappy Ricks." If you don't enjoy meeting up with "Cappy" in celluloid and relish every minute of his cussedness and loveableness, then we're—well, we're disappointed in youse.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE . . .

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

The story is not outstanding but succeeds in keeping one's interest through the final reel by a constant series of mix-ups—humorous, sentimental and adventurous. George Brent is the "Go Getter" of the title role. He is a young man who will let neither heaven nor high water stand in the way of his getting what he wants out of this old world—and particularly out of "Cappy." The fact that both men are as stubborn as old mules and the fact that one is her father and the other her fiance, gives Anita Louise very few calm moments. But everybody finally loves everybody in the end, and you'll probably leave the theatre in the same dangerous frame of mind. Directed by Busby Berkeley.—Warner Bros.

★★ The Thirteenth Chair

"The Thirteenth Chair" is brought to the screen without losing out on a single one of those chills for which the play was famous on the stage. This is due not only to an excellent cast and to a carefully constructed script, which doesn't miss a trick, but to an unusually clever idea of throwing the screen into murky darkness for the climaxing scenes of suspense. Only the eerie voice of the medium and the moans of departed spirits are offered for your entertainment at this time. When the lights go up, you will undoubtedly be surprised to find only one more corpse on the screen and everyone around you seemingly conscious.

Outstanding among the players is Dame May Whitty as the medium. Lewis Stone gives an admirable account of himself again as the detective, and Madge Evans and Elissa Landi offer intelligent and highly decorative portrayals. Others in the cast are Thomas Beck, Henry Daniell, Heather Thatcher, Janet Beecher and Ralph Forbes. You'll miss a night's sleep, but still we suggest that you don't miss this picture. Directed by George B. Seitz. —M-G-M.

★★ The Man in Blue

This picture is a surprise package, for considering the cast, comprised almost entirely of unfamiliar names, you wouldn't expect too much. It offers a carefully thought out crime problem, an interesting plot and good characterizations by everyone in the cast.

The story concerns Edward Ellis, a policeman, who adopts the small son, Billie Burrud, of a man he has had to kill in self-protection. The deepest affection grows up between the two, and all would have gone along smoothly—between Ellis' good influence, that of Alma Kruger, his foster-mother, and that of Nan Grey, the girl with whom he falls in love—but a bad influence enters the picture. Richard Carle, the boy's uncle, gets him involved in a bank robbery, which results in a prison term. The prison scenes with their attendant study of prisoners' psychology are very interesting, with Ralph Morgan, one of the inmates, giving an excellent performance.

Richard Wilcox, the adopted boy grown-up, shows promise of better things to come through his capable handling of this role. Edward Ellis is the highlight of the picture, though Nan Grey, Miss Kruger, Aggie Herring and Billie Burrud give commendable accounts of themselves. Directed by Milton Carruth.—Universal.

★ Night of Mystery

"Night of Misery" would have been our choice for a title in this case though we've been known to be wrong. Anyhow, you'll probably agree that this whodunit is pretty hard to endure through the final reel. And all this in spite of the script being taken from an S. S. Van Dine chiller. But dialogue, plot and characterization have been overdrawn to the point of ludicrousness in too many instances for comfort. You even get to the point where you don't care much who the next corpse will turn out to be. A few members of the cast really try to be worthy of the celluloid expended on them, but on the whole the assembled players leave much to be desired.

Roscoe Karns is the most familiar-to-fans player, and he conducts himself creditably throughout, as do Elizabeth Patterson and Grant Richards. Richards, a newcomer to the screen, brings sincerity and charm to the role of Philo Vance. Others in the cast are Harvey Stephens, Helen Burgess, Terry Ray, and James Bush. Directed by E. A. Dupont.—Paramount.

★ Michael O'Halloran

Better bring along the hankies, towels, broad shoulders or whatever you cry onto when you see this, for it's a tear-jerker par excellence, being one of Gene Stratton-Porter's brain-waves, but unfortunately not one of the Grade A numbers. The story's too obvious sentimentality is rescued to some degree by the capable performances of Wynne Gibson, Warren Hull, Robert Greig and Jackie Moran, all of whom bring sincerity to their roles. Jackie Moran has the title role, that of the twelve-year-old Michael, who goes Pollyanna one better in spreading happiness hither, thither and yon. An orphan, he is taken into the home of Wynne Gibson, a stony-hearted woman with ulterior motives. She adopts Michael and his little crippled sister (Charlene Wyatt) for no other reason than to get revenge on her husband, Sidney Blackmer, who has wearied of Wynne and taken off with their two children. This action, incidentally, was approved by the courts, until Wynne's strategic move of adopting orphans and calling in the newspaper reporters to tell the world about her soft heart. It's all pretty complicated for awhile, but by the last reel everything's just lovely, young Michael having done his work by now and fixed it up so that everyone just loves everyone. Directed by Karl Brown.—Republic.

★ Turn Off the Moon

Struggling against a weak and hackneyed script, the cast evidently decided to give up, during the middle of the proceedings and just go along for the ride. The picture suffers from an acute attack of anaemia from which it never recovers.

"Turn off the Moon" is romance in a department store. Charlie Ruggles, head of the institution, wants to marry his secretary, Marjorie Gateson, but he can't propose until the stars are right. His astrologer finally informs him that he will meet a young couple, but until they fall in love, he cannot propose. The young couple turns out to be Johnny Downs and Eleanore Whitney, and Ruggles' attempts to get them together will interest only those audiences who are killing time waiting for the other picture on the double bill. Directed by Lewis Seiler.—Paramount.

★★ The Girl Said No

Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan, whose operettas of many long years ago are still as modern as tomorrow's musical comedies, lend their magic words and music to the screen and thereby save a puny little picture from oblivion. What the picture would have been without them is horrible to contemplate. But the inclusion of several of the lilting Gilbert and Sullivan tunes makes the picture something worth seeing.

The story itself is concerned mainly with a trio of race-track bookies and a taxi dance hall girl. When one of the bookies is taken to the financial cleaners by the gal, he sets out to execute a unique revenge by promising to put her in a Broadway show provided she hands over the money to finance her training. A troupe of old Gilbert and Sullivan players is to comprise the show, and it is by this device that the delightful music becomes the picture's main attraction.

Selections from "The Mikado," "Pinafore," and "Pirates of Penzance" are handled expertly by William Danforth, Vera Ross, Frank Moulan and Vivian Hart, all of whom are members of New York's Gilbert and Sullivan company. In the plot department, the cast includes Irene Hervey, who does a first-rate job as the dance hall gal, Robert Armstrong, Paula Stone and Gwili Andre. Directed by Andrew Stone.—Grand National.

★★ Behind the Headlines

This is strictly melodrama, but two rapid-fire performances by Lee Tracy and Diana Gibson, in the leads, give it credence and a pace which makes it well worth a visit. The story concerns the rivalry between a radio newscaster and a girl reporter. The radio news dispenser, played by Tracy, scoops newspapers by means of a portable broadcasting set which enables him to furnish on-the-spot reports of news events. There is also a gang of thieves attempting to loot the U. S. Treasury of a shipment of gold, and Tracy and the gal and the portable radio play a major part in rounding up the mob and saving the gold for good old Uncle Sam.

Lee Tracy delivers another of his dynamic reporters in his own expert manner, and it is to his credit that he always manages to keep his reporters looking like reporters. Diana Gibson, a newcomer, is a surprise in the role of the girl. Donald Meek is good as the leader of the gang, and smaller roles are effectively played by Philip Huston, Paul Guilfoyle and Tom Kennedy. Directed by Richard Rosson.—RKO-Radio.

★★ Meet the Missus

A gentle comedy which has its amusing moments, this will appeal to the family trade and to those who have come to admire the antics of Victor Moore and Helen Broderick. Playing one of those "timid soul" characters which he does so well, Mr. Moore furnishes most of the picture's better moments. As Otis Foster, a small town barber, he finds himself doing most of the housework due to the fact that Mrs. F. (Miss Broderick) spends all her time working on contests. The plot begins rolling when the Happy Noodle Company selects Miss Broderick as Mrs. Mid-West and offers her a trip to Atlantic City to compete for the dubious honor of becoming Mrs. America. Best fun in the film is furnished by the discontented husbands, who suddenly assert themselves and stage an undress parade before the shocked wives and the horror-stricken Happy Noodle executives. Biggest laugh comes when Victor Moore resists all efforts to tear him away from a radio microphone, where he is defiantly shouting to the world that he hates Happy Noodles. Directed by Joe Santley.—RKO-Radio.

★ Border Cafe

This is strictly an old-fashioned Western, with standard equipment. There's the hero, a ne'er-do-well son of a senator, who has come West to rehabilitate himself; the heroine, who dances at a Texas bordertown cafe; and the villain, an Eastern gangster who has come to the pure and honest West to muscle in on the cattle-rustling racket.

John Beal is completely miscast as the young man, but he does his capable best to keep the role from falling apart. It is the work of Armida, the little Mexican dancer, who plays the gal of the piece, which gives this film any claim at all to your attention. She can hardly be called a newcomer to the screen, since she played with John Barrymore over five years ago, but she has been away from pictures so long, it is a pleasant surprise to see her again. J. Carroll Naish, as the gangster, is properly menacing, and good old Harry Carey is appealing as Beal's ranch partner. Directed by Lew Landers.—RKO-Radio.

★ Oh, Doctor!

Even if you're an Edward Everett Horton addict, you'll find this picture a bit hard to take. Horton is as amusing as ever, but he hasn't a good enough story or cast to support his antics. Complications arise so thick and fast in the first few reels that there is little time for comedy, but the wind-up of the picture furnishes plenty of the old-school gags in a manner which should keep audiences in good humor. Horton, determined to win the girl, Donrue Leighton, away from athletic William Hall, goes in for all kinds of hair-raising feats. Having spent a lifetime carefully guarding his heart from any excitement, he throws discretion aside and takes to high-diving, scaling skyscrapers and other such bizarre forms of relaxation.—Universal.

★★ Dreaming Lips

"Dreaming Lips" is provocative of two strong conclusions. It proves that someone has a nasty grudge against Elisabeth Bergner, the star. And it proves that if the eternal triangle is to be made the subject for significant drama, it must at least be padded here and there with a curve. Far beneath Miss Bergner's talents, a few more pictures of this calibre will be sufficient to finish her off as a screen actress.

The story is concerned with a doting husband (Romney Brent) and his doting wife (Elisabeth Bergner). The husband dotes on his wife, and the wife dotes on her husband's best friend, a renowned concert violinist (Raymond Massey). Massey at first does his best to repulse Bergner's vigorous coquetries, but inevitably comes under the spell of her dreaming lips. Meanwhile, Brent, a ridiculously unsuspecting husband, falls desperately ill. Elisabeth, who, believe it or not, has a heart, nurses him day and night. During his illness she discovers his complete devotion to her. She realizes that to leave him for another would be to kill him. She also realizes that to stay with him would be to kill Massey. So she and the author take the easiest way out, and Bergner jumps into the Thames. No one knows what happened to the author.

Despite the fact that the picture is an obvious case of three actors in search of something to act about, they handle in fine style the bits of thespian straw that they are allowed to clutch at. Bergner is still the profound, exciting child of "Escape Me Never." Massey is perfect in the rather restrained role of the impresario, and Romney Brent, playing a ridiculous role, is admirably ridiculous. Directed by Paul Czinner—United Artists.

When Henry Wilcoxon was in Egypt making "Jericho" for a British film company, he was royally entertained by Sheik Ahmed Ben Akha, a wealthy son of the sands. In return for his courtesy, Wilcoxon gave the sheik a role in the picture. Ahmed decided to make pictures his career, so Wilcoxon put him under personal contract and announced that his charge was available. He received two offers before discovering that the sheik would not, due to immigration laws, be allowed to transport his twenty-six wives either to England or America. Since it was beneath his dignity to show up with only one wife, Ahmed Ben Akha remains in Cairo, his contracts cancelled.

Young Love in Bloom: Remember when you were a boy—provided you ever were a boy—and you proudly showed off your brand-new bike to the most beautiful ten-year-old woman in the world? We saw something like that recently, but because it was in Hollywood, it was a brand-new roadster instead of a bicycle. The proud owner was Mickey Rooney, and the little lady being impressed was Judy Garland. "Why, Mickey," she exclaimed, "it's lovely!" As, indeed, it was.

Hollywood is a city of heartbreaks, a continued story of courage and determination. What we mean is that two years ago, at the age of three, Baby LeRoy retired from the screen. Everyone said he was through—they said he couldn't turn it on any more. Today, with a glint of youth in his eye despite his five years, Baby LeRoy is Coming Back. You'll see him in RKO's "Junior G-Men." And he denies that he's playing a character role.

Sylvia Sidney used to think Hollywood was a great place to work, but she wouldn't visit the place if you gave it to her. After every picture, little Miss Sidney hopped right back to New York to await the call for her next epic. But this summer, at least, things are changed. She's leased a home in Palos Verdes, overlooking the Pacific, where she's living with her mother, who is her house-guest for the summer.

After bringing the much-publicized Gypsy Rose Lee to Hollywood for a screen career, her sponsors suddenly decided to change her name. The studio, it seems, fears that the public will associate Miss Lee with her specialty, the gentle art of removing one's garments before an audience. So in her first picture, "You Can't Have Everything," she'll be fully clothed and in her right name, which is Louise Hovick. Of course, her appearance in the picture will be a swell novelty. It offers her devoted followers their first opportunity to see how she looks with her things on.

The fans are still doing mob scenes for Bob Taylor. At the preview of "This is My Affair," Mr. T. arrived in yesterday's beard and one of those turtle-neck sweaters Clark Gable used to wear. He also brought a Miss Stanwyck. The two of them made their way into the theatre without too much difficulty, but getting out was something else again. On their first try they were thrown for a ten-yard loss by a cluster of admirers, so they retreated to the theatre lobby. After a fifteen-minute consultation, they decided the only way to get home was to face the situation, so they marched out into the arms of the mob.

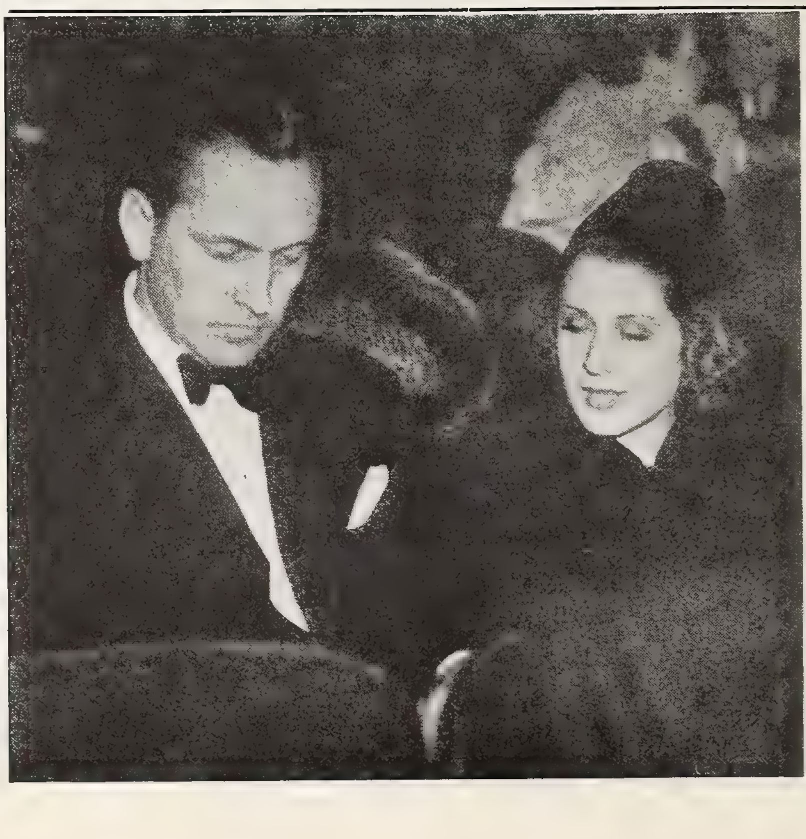
Things we'd like to see: Beulah Bondi in almost anything . . . a role that Spencer Tracy couldn't handle . . . more pictures with Claudette Colbert in them . . . less ballyhoo about the unknown southern girl who will play Scarlett O'Hara, especially when the unknown southern girl will probably turn out to be Miriam Hopkins . . . an "ideal" Hollywood marriage which lasts over five years . . . the match going out on Bill Powell in one of those elegant cigarette-lighting scenes



The opening of "Tovarich" in Hollywood marked one of the rare occasions on which Norma Shearer, shown with Fredric March, has appeared in public lately.

. . . Anita Louise swinging out with "Dinah" on her harp.

Orders have been issued at her studio to make Simone Simon a glamor girl once more. She was glamorous, you recall, when she was first imported from France. Then the studio decided to make hers a simple child-like charm; so she played Diane in "Seventh Heaven." Now she's a wicked woman once more, and so in her next picture they're giving her thousands—well, millions, if we must be exact—of costume changes. And if she isn't glamorous this time, the prediction for her is a long boat trip—back to France.

Perhaps the fact that he was soon to be a bridegroom accounts for it, but anyway, Gene Raymond left his car at a garage recently for minor repairs, and the garageman furnished him with a substitute car to use until the Raymond chariot was ready. Gene drove the new car to the studio, worked all day and returned to the parking lot in the evening to drive home. Suddenly, he remembered he couldn't remember what kind of car he was driving. The parking attendant couldn't help him out, so Gene finally phoned the garage. They sent a man over to locate the car for the blushing groom-to-be.

One of the nicest guys in town is Tyrone Power, according to the men who work around the sets at his studio. One of the reasons is that Tyrone spends several nights every month "out with the boys"—prop-men and guys in the technical departments, visiting a bowling alley.

Jimmy Stewart is the unluckiest lad in the world. After spending weeks convincing his bosses that they should loan him to a rival company to play opposite his best gal, Ginger Rogers, in "Vivacious Lady," the great day arrived, and he went merrily to work. Two days later they hauled him to the hospital with a bad case of arthritis. Result: the picture concelled, and young Mr. S. confined to a hospital room for two months.

A gentleman in Newark, who evidently doesn't get out much, just wrote Jimmy Dunn a letter commending him on his work in "Bad Girl." "Bad Girl" was made in 1931, but for some reason or other our friend had just seen it. He said it was a great picture and predicts stardom for Dunn within three months. Wait'll he sees Mae Murray in "The Merry Widow."

When Travis Banton, Paramount's fashion designer, is in the mood to create, he simply can't be stopped. We saw him in the Brown Derby Bamboo Room the other day, sipping a cocktail and talking with friends. Suddenly the urge came upon him; a new gown for Lombard or someone was about to be dreamed up. So he ordered a tablecloth from his waiter and promptly started sketching. So if you see Miss L. adorned in a tablecloth in her next picture, you'll know where she got it.

A few days after filing her divorce suit, Joan Bennett came down with chicken-pox. There doesn't seem to be any connection between the two—she probably would have had chicken-pox anyway. Since the disease is contagious only to people who haven't already had it, Miss B. spent her confinement period calling her friends, trying to drum up a few visitors. So if you've had chicken-pox, give her a ring.

When you see Paul Muni in "The Life of Emile Zola," it may interest you to know that he played the entire picture in reverse. It seems that Zola in his declining years was plumper than he was as a young man, so, striving for realism, Muni put on weight and played the last scenes first, then went through the picture by a process of gradual reducing. For instance, we were on the set the day they buried him. Two weeks later he died.

Marlene Dietrich really likes to act. On the "Angel" set one afternoon she was playing a particular scene which she liked immensely. After running through it nine or ten times she announced she was ready to have the scene recorded for posterity. But Director Ernst Lubitsch was nowhere about. It seems he had been satisfied with the scene the first time Marlene played it, so he ordered the boys to print it, and calmly went home for the day.

While the "High, Wide and Handsome" company was on location, they were shooting a scene on a hill. The director called down to the crew below, "Hey! Will some one send up a hamburger right away?" A couple of prop-men obliged by getting a hamburger—including some mildewed hay and onions a little the worse for wear, and sent it up to the director, carefully wrapped in cellophane. But their wide grins changed to looks of horror when the director handed the package to Irene Dunne. She unwrapped it, looked it over, then megaphoned to the boys, "Another hamburger —without trimmings!"

Most interesting triangle in town is the Rochelle Hudson—Lew Ayres—Eleanore Whitney one. While Johnny Downs was in Honolulu, Eleanore suddenly took up with Lew in a big way. When Johnny returned, however, Rochelle became Lew's steady date for two weeks. Then he and Eleanore went back together again. The least the two could have done, seems to us, is to have introduced Rochelle and Johnny.

On the "Mr. Dodd Takes the Air" set, the script called for a strawberry festival to be staged. The director was baffled. What was a strawberry festival? Jane Wyman happened on the set about that time and admitted she knew all about them —having been brought up in a midwestern town that doted on such celebrations. But would she tell? No, except for a price. So the studio had to pay Jane $25 as technical adviser on strawberry festivals—and give her all the props for jam.

Shirley Temple's eighth was really a happy birthday. For one thing, Mrs. Gertrude Temple was home from the hospital for the first time—after a long illness. And for another, she received—among hundreds of other gifts—an honest-to-goodness orchid from her best beau. He's still James Dunn—after all these years that have elapsed since they discovered they were that-way about each other, in one of la Temple's first pictures.

Katherine DeMille took a vacation, but she didn't take it easy. She went to a Victorville desert-ranch for a month, and took along a masseuse, whose job it was to pound off twenty pounds from the DeMille silhouette. "I'm sick and tired of just being fit for Papa's spectacle pictures," said Katherine in explanation.

Did you know that Fred and Lillian MacMurray have a new home? Well, they have, and the other day someone was discussing it with the master of the house. Someone asked what type of architecture the new home featured. Our hero replied, "American Colonial. Anyway, that's what Lillian says."

Cary Grant was all a-dither when he received an invitation to join Connie Bennett in her dressing-room for tea. Such intimacy deserved something special in the line of clothes, so Cary sent his stand-in speeding into town to bring out his most dazzling sports coat and a favorite scarf to knot carelessly at his neck. Feeling much more up to the occasion, then, Cary headed for Connie's bungalow. Connie herself opened the door—very alluring in a white satin dressing-robe, but her throaty-voiced greeting was completely drowned out. For the entire "Our Gang" was there in person, hard at work on ice cream and cake. Cary did get a cup of tea, though.

The first day's shooting on any picture is always somewhat of a commotion. On the set of "One Hundred Men and a Girl," the new Deanna Durbin picture, one of the assistant directors was trying to get the cast sorted out into a semblance of order, for a musical shot. He got about twenty men rounded up in the orchestra pit, then spotted Leopold Stokowski in a corner of the set. "Are you a musician?" he yelled. "If so, come on over here so we can get going."

Jean Parker and her husband, George MacDonald, have decided that long distance marriage isn't all it's cracked up to be. So George has given up that New York job and come back to Jean and Hollywood. At a dinner party the other night, the MacDonalds had inveigled a change in chairs and were blissfully holding hands between every course from then on.

Lionel Stander has taken exercise so seriously that he's completely exhausted these days. After his stand-in, an exboxer, hinted that Mr. S. was slightly going to waist, he decided to get going on the daily dozen. So the next day he and the stand-in spent shopping for gym equipment, with the result that Lionel was totally exhausted. The next day they spent putting up the paraphernalia in the Stander basement, and Lionel was completely worn out. He had just enough energy left the third day to take down all the equipment by himself and send it back to the store before his stand-in appeared for the workout.

Many Never Suspect Cause Of Backaches

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning shows there may be something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

An excess of acids or poisons in your blood, when due to functional kidney disorders, may be the cause of nagging backache, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

The Taylor-Stanwyck romance is still at the will-they-or-won't-they-marry stage, with the answer not in sight.

Seen on the "Marie Walewska" lot: At 8:30 A. M., a slouching figure in dungarees, an old grey topcoat and a cap, enters the women's dressing-room building. At 9, out comes a gorgeous creature in costume headed for the set. Both of these people, as you've probably guessed, are Garbo. The mannish garb she wears for her early morning walks near her home in Brentwood—because she thinks people won't recognize her. If Miss G. really wants to disguise herself, she should saunter out one morning in crinoline.

Note to W. S. Van Dyke III: You must be a pretty important guy. Your old man, at least, must think so. As soon as you were born, not too many months ago, he wanted everyone to know that you and he were separate identities. His pictures, which used to be directed by plain old W. S. Van Dyke, are now whipped together by W. S. Van Dyke II. Next time you see him tell him not to go so fancy on us. The Van Dyke II isn't necessary, unless he believes it keeps people from thinking you directed those pictures.

Poetic paragraph from the publicity mills: "Music floats in on the summer night from the moonlighted veranda on which Marlene Dietrich sits playing. "And what is the lovely Marlene playing—the harp, the guitar, the pianoforte, or some such storied instrument? Ah, no! Marlene is coaxing a bewitching refrain from the musical saw." Come up and see us some evening, Marlene—and bring your saw.

Garbo, incidentally, was not at all pleased with things in "Marie Walewska." Reason was that most of the attention on the set was devoted to her leading man, Charles Boyer, who portrayed Napoleon Bonaparte. Seems there were three specially hired Napoleon experts on the set throughout the picture, and before each scene they went into conference to decide what Napoleon would have done under the circumstances. Rumors are that on more than one occasion Garbo could have told Napoleon exactly what to do.

Perspiration may be the result of honest toil to some of youse guys, but in Hollywood it's not that at all. It's two parts witch hazel, one part mineral oil and one part glycerine. That's the word direct from the fortress of Samuel Goldwyn, where they're making "Stella Dallas" and doing a lot of perspiring, too. It seems that the old-fashioned—or honest—variety of perspiration, despite its virtues, doesn't photograph; hence canned perspiration is the machine world's latest triumph over man.

Chalk up another score for "The Cradle" in Evanston. For the past several years picture people shopping for babies have patronized "The Cradle." The latest was Irene Dunne, and now she's so pleased with her little daughter she plans a trip back. Irene's next, she says, will be a boy.

BANISH "False-Face" Powder

DON'T HIDE THE LOVELINESS OF YOUR NATURAL SKIN-TONE BEAUTY—

Dear Madam:

"False-face!"—your powder may scream out if you chose it a month ago or chose it to suit you in a certain light. "She belongs in the circus!"—friends may whisper behind your back—all because your skin is a vastly different color in sunlight than in the shade. It's still another color in yellow or blue nightlights. Winter's blasts, summer's infra-red rays, diet and general health all change your skin color constantly.

But if you tried to escape that "false-face" powdery look by buying enough HARD-BASE shades to keep up with all your changing skin colors, you'd be spanking your face with a dozen different shades every month.

How Can "Balmite" Help You?

No beauty counselor could give you more sincere advice than this:—"Never choose a HARD-BASE powder. Choose only a SOFT-BASE powder. "BALMITE" is the sensational new SOFT-BASE in Lovely Lady Face Powder. So no matter which shade of Lovely Lady you choose, "BALMITE" blends out your shade to meet every variation of light and of your own skin color.

Compare—see if your present powder adds dreadful years. Test all five skin-keyed shades of Lovely Lady. See which one shade is the shade you can depend on in any light, in any season — which SOFT BASE "BALMITE" shade reveals you at your loveliest.

"Types" and "Name-Shades" Cause Confusion

Avoid the risk of choosing powder by "name-shades" such as "Brunette", as these "Brunette" shades are not all uniform in color. And often a "Brunette" type needs a "Blonde" shade, and a "Blonde" type a "Brunette" shade. With all this confusion it's no wonder people might think of your face powder as your "false-face."

Don't "Mask" Your Natural Charm

Don't "mask" your face any longer with a HARD-BASE face powder that "matches" your skin in one light and may give you a "false-face" in another light. Send for all five FREE shades of Lovely Lady Face Powder containing "BALMITE"— my SOFT-BLEND BASE that brings out so gloriously and dependably the natural skin color beauty and charm that is yours alone.

Sincerely, Lovely Lady

Pampers her skin with costly lotions but she ignores her tender, ailing gums

—ANOTHER "DENTAL CRIPPLE" IN THE MAKING

How often such neglect leads to real dental tragedies . . . give your gums the benefit of Ipana and Massage.

PAT, PAT, go her deft fingers—attending to the important business of beauty. Creams and lotions to aid her skin—a hundred brush strokes nightly for her hair—those are details she never overlooks. And rightly so! Yet how little they count, when her lips part in a dull and dingy smile—a smile that ruins her loveliness, destroys her charm.

Yet hers might be a smile, radiant and captivating—but not until she learns the importance of healthy gums to sound teeth—not until she knows the meaning of—and does something about—that warning tinge of "pink" on her tooth brush!

Never Ignore "Pink Tooth Brush"

"Pink tooth brush" is only a warning. But if ever you notice it, see your dentist. You may not be in for serious trouble. Probably, he'll tell you that modern soft foods are to blame—foods that deprive your gums of necessary stimulation. "More work and exercise for those tender, ailing gums" is the likely verdict—and, very often, "the helpful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage."

For Ipana, with massage, is designed to help the gums as well as keep teeth bright and sparkling. Massage a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation quickens in the gum tissues—gums become firmer, more resistant to trouble.

Don't wait for the warning tinge of "pink" on your tooth brush. Start today with Ipana and massage—one sensible way to a lovely smile.

ARTISTS OF LAUGHTER . . .

To draw a laugh every time your face appears on the screen is some artistic achievement... and those zanies, the Yacht Club Boys (shown above giving a little support to radio's funniest female, Judy Canova)... are some artists. Wait'll you hear 'em go to town on that "Sasha Pasha" number, just one of the million mad moments in "Artists and Models," the biggest gag and gal show of this or any year.

ARTISTS OF FAME . . .

Name the six leading American artists and illustrators and you'll name the lads who chose the All-American Beauty Chorus for "Artists and Models": Peter Arno, McClelland Barclay, Arthur William Brown, Rube Goldberg, John La Gatta, and Russell Patterson. Here you see them doing a little plain and fancy homage to their choice of the Most Beautiful Model in the World, Sandra Storme, just one of the million glorified gals in "Artists and Models," the biggest gag and gal show of this or any year.

ARTIST OF WISE CRACKS . . . BENNY'S THE NAME!

Radio's Number One Entertainer, the biggest laughmaker the screen has ever seen . . . the one and only Jack Benny at his super-funniest heads the all-star cast of "Artists and Models." Above you see him in an artistic moment, below, at the head of the parade in one of the huge production numbers. At the top right you see Ben Blue teaching Judy Canova how to swing that thing. At the lower right is Martha Raye going to town in blackface, giving you a glimpse of "Public Melody Number One" . . . just one of the half dozen hit numbers Louis Armstrong and his Band and Andre Kostelanetz and His Orchestra help you to enjoy in "Artists and Models," the biggest gag and gal, yes, and the biggest song and dance show of this or any year.

HELP PRODUCERS FEEL THE PUBLIC PULSE. SEND YOUR REQUESTS NOW!

WHAT DOES THE BAROMETER ACCOMPLISH?

1. Gives producers a sure line on what America thinks of their players.

2. Thus, your requests for life stories (Barometer standing is based on these alone) are an all-important factor in determining America's stars.

HOW COME?

1. The Barometer is the only existing poll telling what stars are most popular not just today, but FOR THE LAST SIX MONTHS.

2. This makes the Barometer the most scientific of all polls and therefore the one producers respect.

3. The proof of the pudding is that every month brings anxious inquiries from the studios concerning their stars' Barometer standing.

WHAT CAN YOU DO ABOUT IT?

1. Put your favorite on top and keep him there by sending in your requests now on a penny postcard.

NELSON EDDY (Last printed May 1937. Total number of requests since then 641.) Hollywood turns out glamor with the same facility and precision that Ford turns out cars. Make-up men, publicity men, cameramen put their heads together, and from common clay emerges alabaster. And so Hollywood laughs at Nature—until a Nelson Eddy comes along. Then Nature has her innings. For Nelson Eddy typifies the sort of glamor that Hollywood cannot fabricate—a glamor springing from a deep wellspring of spiritual beauty and goodness.

Set adrift by the divorce of his parents when he was fourteen, helped only by a mother as new to the bitter reality of making a living as he, Nelson had need of every bit of the charm and ability he possesses. The very same ingratiating intentness that has made Eddy a leader in the musical world helped him at the age of sixteen to become a reporter on an important Philadelphia daily, the youngest reporter the paper had ever had. And not so long after that, he took a highly paid job writing advertising copy.

But music will out. Singing first to phonograph records, then to his mother, then to the noted baritone, David Bispham, his great voice was discovered. Within a very short time Eddy was signed by the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company. A trip to Germany with money borrowed from a Philadelphia banker, who accepted Nelson's voice as collateral for his generous loan, put the finishing touches to his musical education. It gave him, moreover, that intimate touch with foreign languages that makes Eddy such an international favorite. He sings in German, French, Spanish, Italian, Russian, and Yiddish.

On his return, he was snapped up by Arthur Judson, America's most gifted concert manager. An engagement with the Los Angeles Philharmonic, which Mr. Judson got him, led in 1933 to a motion picture contract and a featured singing role in "Dancing Lady."

The serenity of Nelson Eddy's life in the midst of the hectic whirl that is Hollywood has long remained a mystery. Is Eddy a woman hater? Are his breathtaking love scenes mere play acting? Nelson laughs at these questions. He has been in love—deeply in love. With a woman much older than himself, a lovely woman who personified Nelson's ideals. And since there aren't many others like her, Nelson prefers to remain a bachelor, take tender care of his mother, and bring joy to his fans all over the world. Tentatively scheduled for his next picture is "The Girl of the Golden West," with, of course, Jeanette MacDonald.

MODERN SCREEN'S ROLL OF HONOR: Starting with this issue, the Information Desk will print the names of those sincere fans, who, by sending in large numbers of requests for their favorites, have done so much towards solidifying these favorites' positions in the Barometer. In recognition of the genuine devotion which these ardent fans have shown, each of the stars who has been honored by their requests, is sending out via this Desk a gorgeous 12 x 14 portrait of himself to the five groups of fans who sent in the most requests. And here are the deserving five:

Ameche fans of Oakland, California	163 requests
Durbin fans of Batavia, New York	89 requests
Autry fans of Sacramento, California	14 requests
Eddy fans of Beaumont, Texas	14 requests
Eddy fans of Dayton, Ohio	11 requests

And to you five groups, let me add that your pictures are waiting to be sent out; will you help me by deciding among yourselves, in each case, where you want the picture sent? Let me hear from you as soon as possible.

CLARK GABLE (Last printed October 1936. Total number of requests since then, 436.) Take a young man whose ambition it is to become a doctor; shunt him through the toils of factory labor, lumber-camps, vagrancy; let him come face to face with death by violence; let him savor the love of many women, some good, some tawdry; and you develop a personality of countless facets. If the personality is strong, it becomes hardened; if weak, it disintegrates.

The virility, the momentum of Clark Gable's personality can be traced directly to the unstable equilibrium of his past. At the age of seven months, Clark was a motherless child. Until he turned six, he believed his stepmother to be his real mother. When his schoolmates enlightened him, it was a profound shock. It destroyed in the young boy the sense of belonging anywhere, steeled him for the vagrant life that was ahead of him.

He was only eighteen when he came face to face with sudden death in its goriest trappings. Working in an auto rim factory to eke out tuition for his evening premedical courses, he was standing only a few feet away, when a piece of machinery ran amok, decapitating the man at his side. For months Gable was the victim of hallucinations. He would see the whole gruesome sequence reënacted before his eyes, torturing him. The experience left him with a deep spiritual wound, over which grew, gradually, a callus of indifference.

Only when pushed, does Edward Arnold (left) go in for the gentle art of scene-stealing. But, this gent can be pushed!

Lionel Barrymore's stage training stands him in good stead. And so, if a cinema smartie tries to up-stage him, it's too bad!

TRICKS OF THE TRADE

By Mack Hughes

Some actors "know all the angles"—and cleverly work 'em, too

A SMART actor realizes that a role doesn't have to be big to be important. Further, if he has had experience, he knows how to "point up" his lines or "business" so that the audience will focus its attention on him rather than anyone else in the scene, even though that "anyone else" happens to be the big, bright star that the cash customer has come to see.

You see, all is fair in love and war and picture-stealing. It seems that if a player parks his ethics with his make-up box, there'll be none to reason why. In fact, there'll be none to take the time, for each and every other member of the cast is out to do a little cinema-swiping of his own.

The star may have a big dramatic moment, but, if during it, the character man sneezes, your attention is naturally attracted, if even momentarily, to the gentleman who pretends to be suffering from the sniffles.

Therefore, when Lionel Barrymore, Edward Arnold, Eddie Robinson and others I could name are in a cast, it behooves everybody else in the lineup of players to be on his guard; that is, if he wishes to be remembered when the picture is over.

I'm sure that Lionel Barrymore, Edward G. Robinson, Edward Arnold and Victor Moore will not be forgotten. For, in their business it's war! Once actors arrive at the top they have to fight to remain there, so that's where years of training help them do their stuff.

Lionel Barrymore is one of the finest actors on the screen. As a purveyor of histrionics, he is second to none. Trained in the theatre, there isn't much that Barrymore hasn't seen in his day. And so, there isn't a ghost of a chance for anyone to put over any fancy business on him, for he can turn the tables so quickly that the person looks foolish. However, today, Lionel Barrymore doesn't have to employ all those subtle little tricks that one generally expects of the featured character actor.

As a matter of fact, there are certain things that Mr. Barrymore does with such finesse, that they have become a part of him. These mannerisms have made him famous. By this we don't mean that Barrymore is typed with set affectations. Yet, in all his pictures we recognize immediately the things that spell Lionel and that have endeared him to us. And so we watch for them.

For example, there is the nervousness of his hands. He is constantly rubbing them together, or grasping his coat lapels, seldom letting his fingers remain motionless. This naturally attracts the attention of the audience because we are never certain just what he is about to do. If this trick doesn't throw the star for a loss, Barrymore skillfully uses his distinctive voice, the low resonant pitch of which has a subtle nervous quality fraught with tension.

For example, take "Captains Courageous," which stars Freddie Bartholomew. There isn't an actor in the business who is not shaky about playing in a child's pictures. Everyone knows that in them, the adult usually stooges for the youngster, as children run away with the sympathy.

However, there was a scene in which Freddie was obstinate and refused to work, once on board the schooner. Mr. Barrymore tried to reason with the boy and, at his wit's end, pushed him on a pile of fish. The trick of doing this, and not incurring the wrath of his audience, was one of Barrymore's masterpieces. Having slapped Freddie, he walked away rubbing his hands together and muttering, so that the fans felt him saying, "Now look what you've made me do, and I'm sorry that (Continued on page 102)

★★★ The Road Back

As a sequel to "All Quiet on the Western Front," "The Road Back" never approaches the depth and power of its predecessor. It is in the not unusual position of being a good picture which should have been a great one. Patrons just coming to see a picture will find it certainly better than average entertainment, but those expecting an epic will be disappointed.

Picking up the story where "All Quiet" left off—in the trenches on the last few days before the Armistice—it takes the surviving young men back to their homes and endeavors to show their futile struggle to adjust themselves. In view of the postwar situation in Germany, their predicament seems mild in comparison. What could have been a fine, brave picture becomes less than that because its producers decided to compromise. You will remember "The Road Back" for some of its individual scenes—particularly a court room sequence and a beautiful scene where the survivors of the company, surrounded by the ghosts of their comrades, are given their final order to "fall out."

In the leading role, the handsome John King gives every evidence of inexperience. Maurice Murphy, Noah Beery, Jr., and Gene Garrick are very good in smaller roles, as is Barbara Read as Murphy's unfaithful fiancee. However, the fattest roles, as well as the acting honors, go to Andy Devine and Slim Summerville. Directed by James Whale.—Universal.

★★ Slave Ship

It is extremely unfortunate that "Slave Ship" should follow so closely on the heels of "Captains Courageous." The ill fortune belongs to the former, for it will suffer considerably by comparison to the Kipling epic. A melodrama of the days when buccaneering sea dogs ran slaves from Africa to America, it features long-suffering Warner Baxter and drooling Wallace Beery and allows each of them to overindulge in his specialty.

As captain of a ship engaged in the selling of slaves, Baxter suddenly reforms the minute he has known the smile of a good woman (Elizabeth Allan). When he brings his bride aboard, first mate Beery, cabin boy Mickey Rooney and the crew promptly shove him in the brig and go about their usual business. Baxter, of course, escapes, but not until all hell has broken loose and most of the crew is annihilated.

Assets of the picture are its excellent sea photography and good stock performances. Warner Baxter does his best suffering since "Prisoner of Shark Island," and Wallace Beery furnishes his expected quota of sobbing. Mickey Rooney is good as the tough cabin boy and Elizabeth Allan is beautiful, though somewhat wooden, as the heroine. Directed by Tay Garnett.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ They Won't Forget

The Warner Brothers can chalk up another hit to add to their parade of powerful social dramas, but the whole thing will undoubtedly be listed as an error in the columns which record a picture's box-office success. "They Won't Forget" is Ward Greene's "Death in the Deep South," and in putting it on film the producers have placed themselves in the unique position of sponsoring a picture which an entire section of the country will hate vigorously.

It is the story of a murder in a southern town, committed on Confederacy Memorial Day. Chief suspect is a young business school instructor from the north, and the picture shows the state's attorney deliberately stirring up sectional hatred, so that he can convict the young man and win the governorship of his state. It is powerful drama, but audiences will come away from it wondering why its producers went out of their way to kick up the ashes of a bitter feeling now almost forgotten with the years.

There are excellent performances by the entire cast, notably those of Claude Rains, as the ambitious attorney, Allan Joslyn, as a hard-boiled reporter, Edward Norris, as the condemned man, and Gloria Dickson, as his wife. Miss Dickson's work promises a fine screen career. Directed by Mervyn LeRoy.—Warner Bros.

Probably the best way to review a new Marx Brothers picture is merely to announce that "those men are here again." For the daffy trio is indeed back, with a few new sets of antics to bolster up their familiar tricks. And it is a pleasure to convey the information that they're still attacking their work with the same sense of frenzied gusto which has marked all their efforts. Allan Jones is still filling in for the never-to-be-remembered Zeppo, and Margaret Dumont, who must be used to indignities by now, is still the patrician lady in love with Groucho. Of the newcomers, there is Maureen O'Sullivan as the heroine and Esther Muir as The Blonde.

Plot, if you want to call it that, has to do with a sanitarium, owned by Miss O'Sullivan, which is more run-down than its patients. Its wealthiest patron, Miss Dumont, is persuaded to stay when Miss O'Sullivan secures the services of an eminent horse doctor, portrayed by Groucho. Somehow the whole thing ends up at the race-track, and in the process there are some of the funniest individual scenes the Marxes have yet presented. Highlights are Groucho's dance with Miss Muir, and a beautiful number called "All God's Chillun Got Rhythm," with Harpo as a sort of Pied Piper to a collection of dusky personages who think he's Gabriel. Directed by Sam Wood—M-G-M.

★★★ Married Before Breakfast

Here is one of those surprise hits—an inexpensively-made picture which turns out to be swell and surprises everyone, especially its producers. By now everyone within ten miles of M-G-M has probably taken credit for it, but actually the honors go to Director Edwin L. Marin and Writers George Oppenheimer and Everett Freeman for turning out a farce with more genuine comedy than many of the season's more elaborate productions can boast.

The whole thing concerns a young man who suddenly comes into a quarter of a million dollars for inventing a shaving cream which dispenses with brush and razor and perhaps the face as well. Celebrating his good fortune, he deserts his fiancee to help a pretty young Miss sell an insurance policy. The selling job is an all-night adventure and offers a melange of swell comedy bits which send the picture along at a mad and furious pace.

Robert Young is perfectly cast as the young man, and Florence Rice does well as the little lady. Outstanding in the supporting cast are Burnett Parker, as a comedy butler, June Clayworth, as Young's fiancee and Warren Hymer, as a gangster. Others deserving mention are Irene Franklin, Tom Kennedy and Hugh Marlowe. Directed by Edwin L. Marin.—M-G-M.

★★ Riding on Air

Joe E. Brown's latest picture is one of those laugh riots the like of which his fans haven't seen for some time. Joe E. is again the country hick who goes through all manner of harrowing experiences before he finally wins the girl and picks up all the marbles in the last minute of play.

As a small-town, one-man reporter, editor and newsboy, he has his hands full without taking on the additional responsibilities of inventing various contraptions, going in for all the prize contests in the country and rounding up smugglers on the side. He finally wins a big radio contest, and Guy Kibbee, a big-city promoter, arrives in town to help Joe E. dispose of the ten thousand dollars. Old Smoothie Guy makes our hero the president of a phoney company in which all the townspeople buy stock, including the papa of Florence Rice, who happens to be Joe's girl. Just when it looks like Joe will be run out of town by the fleeced citizenry, he effects the capture of some dangerous criminals.

You never saw Joe E. funnier than as the surprised aviator who shoots down the bad hombres. Another fine moment is his bathtub scene. DeMille could learn a few things here about the art of bathing the body beautiful. In the supporting cast, good performances are given by Guy Kibbee, Florence Rice and Vinton Haworth. Directed by Edward Sedgwick.—RKO-Radio.

Who's King Now?

Ladies and gentlemen: Today, we have the battle of the century, for the title, "King of Feminine Hearts." In this corner, we have dimpled, man's man, ladies' man, Clark Gable. In the other corner, pretty, pretty Robert Taylor. There goes the bell . . . they're out of their corners. At first Taylor is unsteady, rather inexperienced, then lands his first punch, "Broadway Melody;" that makes Gable wince. Dimpled Gable lands a terrific punch, "Mutiny on the Bounty;" that makes Robert wobble. Clarkie follows this up with a wallop, "San Francisco," but Taylor stands his ground and retaliates with a honey, "Magnificent Obsession." He repeats and has Gable tottering with his Armand in "Camille." They're both punching weakly now, Clark with a tap, "Love on the Run" and Taylor with another tap, "Personal Property." Gable, still weak, flares forth with a not so strong "Parnell," while Bob packs a better punch in "This is My Affair." The bell rings . . . the fight's over.

Who won the title? Why, it was taken in a clean sweep by a very deserving Errol Flynn!—Lillian Houtwed, New York, New York.

An Old American Custom

I wish to voice what may seem a very silly protest but, to me, this particular question has been a source of constant worry. In dubbing a new screen player, why should not each performer have two names? I am just enough bound by American tradition to expect an individual, be he actor or refrigerator salesman, to be called by two names. Is the single word "Margo" any more enhancing than the double title "Claudette Colbert"? Is the bewildering "Annabella" any more captivating that the lilting "Myrna Loy"?

Such single appellations strike of incompleteness. They leave one with the idea that the movies are trying to squeeze from the glamor theme every drop of attraction which this motif once had. Certainly, a player with two names, be they ever so screwy, is following a good old American custom, while an actor who is known by a one-word, hazy, mysterious designation, creates a cloak of unreality about him. Name-nabbers, give us twice-titled stars—Beatrice Dubow, Pittsburgh.

I say—

You probably know that in England, owing to the admirable realism of Hollywood, the U. S. A. is regarded by many as a country populated by gangsters, crooks and society nit-wits, a cloud of corruption always hovering over everything, so that an honest judge is believed to be as rare as apples on plum trees.

But the latest menace of Hollywood is that it is creating an appalling impression of American childhood. Your screen children—Jane Withers, Shirley Temple, Bonita Granville, etc.—ugly, untidy, bad-tempered, ill-mannered and detestably precocious little brats, make one despair that America will ever contribute anything worth while to the peaceful progress of the world, if these are samples of her rising generation. And how is that, though your greatest stars speak beautifully, young America is born with its voice in its nose?

As an English movie fan who greatly admires the many fine things Hollywood gives us, I say, for mercy's sake, give us some screen children we can really like.—G. Livesey, London, Eng.

No Three-ringed Circus

Miss Glutz and Mr. Blotz elope to Reno; Susie Finch and Donald Linch wed in Mexico. There's nothing astonishing about such news; it appears in the daily paper each morning along with my coffee. Much more welcome were the tidings that Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond had a church wedding, just like us folks. It makes you feel warm and happy to think that in mad, mad Hollywood, one couple wanted their marriage their own and not a three-ringed circus for publicity purposes. Perhaps I'm just a bit old-fashioned and too romantic, but a picture of Jeanette walking down the aisle and Gene waiting for her at the altar, just like you and me, was a most beautiful setting.

For the beautiful way they conducted their engagement and for sticking to their guns and having their wedding the way they wanted it, a bouquet of roses and the best of luck.—Bertha Kurtz, Chicago, Ill.

Bette Davis—Horror Specialist?

It isn't my usual habit to sit down, after seeing a picture and write a letter of protest. But, this time, I must!

I have just seen "Marked Woman" and "Kid Galahad." Both were excellent—but I didn't like Bette Davis! I am not criticizing her acting, which was flawless, but the character she portrayed. With each role it becomes increasingly difficult to disassociate the real Bette from the reel one.

Everyone of her screen offerings is so over-emotional and morbid that one comes out of the theatre thoroughly depressed. Since her success in "Of Human Bondage," Miss Davis has had little more to do in pictures than wear her hair awry, glare wildly, grit her teeth and twitch her face through ten reels. Her studio had better wake up or they are going to degrade her into a horror specialist.—Jerry Turner, New York, N. Y.

Those Candid Shots

There's a din being raised in the far West by frantic stars about certain candid camera shots, appearing in fan magazines. Pay no attention, MODERN SCREEN, keep snapping them unawares! Besides liking something different from the usual glamor poses, we are glad to know that the actress we wished we looked like is a human, off-screen, whose hair isn't always curled and who isn't always the last word in poise. It satisfies our vanity to realize that even the most beautiful actresses aren't perfect, and the realization takes away the sting of our own defects.—Grace Houston, West New York, N. J.

DON'S TRUE LOVE STORY

By Gladys Hall

WE SAT at luncheon in a private dining-room on the studio lot, a luncheon for twelve people with Don Ameche the guest of honor. Next to me sat a blonde young woman, Nordic in coloring, with bright, fair hair combed straightly back and coiled at her neck, a woman scrubbed and flowery and glowy-looking, who remarked with a happy sigh, "I'm so glad I could come today. I didn't think I could get away. But I was smart this week. I've got all the work finished, the washing and ironing out of the way, the baking done. It's nice to have a whole day just to visit."

I said, "I don't believe I got the name?"

"Mrs. Don Ameche," smiled the blonde ice-flower with the warm, deep-set blue eyes, the friendly, folksy smile.

I gasped. Ice water flung in my face by the lady's hand couldn't have evoked a gaspier gasp. I asked her to repeat what she had said. She did, eyeing me rather curiously.

Habit is strong. Custom stales the belief in any "infinite variety." And custom has led me to be sure that stars' wives, patting yawns with lovely limp hands, will say, "So glad I could come. That stupid masseuse was half an hour late, my dear. What is the world coming to?" Or, "The races, you know, take up so much time and what with seventeen cocktail parties this week, really, my calendar is obese." Such plaints as these are a'plenty. But a star's wife saying, happily, that she had "red up" the house, got the washing and ironing behind her—oh, no, oh, no!

I stole a look at Don Ameche, darkly handsome, always smiling, his fine eyes as kind, as friendly, as the blue eyes of his wife.

GIRLS, WHAT are we coming to, though? For, you had better take this tale to heart. You may as well take Joe Doakes now and give up the thought of that mink coat, yachts, planes or the crown jewels to play marbles with. The next thing you know, we'll be hearing about the pies that the Duchess of Windsor used to make!

You may as well put away that dream of what life might be like if married to Clark Gable, Tyrone Power or any other movie eligible. The Gable shirts, the Taylor p. j.s take quite as much rubbing and rinsing as do those of Joe Doakes. You stand just as good a chance with Joe, I should say, of getting that electric dishwasher or latest vacuum cleaner. Really, it's shattering, this sort of thing. It's like finding out that Aladdin's Lamp was just another one of those fairy tales.

There have been all kinds of fantastic households in Hollywood. But never a Swiss Family Robinson like the Don Ameches. It is, I do swear, the only menage of its kind, now or ever, in all the Hollywoods. It's probably the Adam and Eve, the first and original movie marriage of its kind. It's real. It's rooted in schooldays romance. It's fruited with homely things, "savings against a rainy day," family obligations, younger brothers and sisters of Don's to school and clothe. It stands firm on its foundations, not to be loosed by fame or tarnished by star dust. There is a sheen over it—of love.

I know, for I made it my business to find out. As one pins a butterfly to the wall, through the middle, I cornered Mrs. Don and made her go on from there. I was more fascinated than ever I have been by any legend, any fable of fabulous Hollywood. And she talked. She talked about the babies and the home and, above all, about Don, as any happy, confident wife and mother talks, and is eager and unselfconscious in talking, about her husband and home.

They live on a ranch in the San Fernando Valley, the Ameches. It is far from the studio, but "it's good for the babies." It is the ranch formerly occupied by W. C. Fields. And what would W. C. say now to lines flapping with young Ameche underpinnings, odors of home-baked pies wafting out on the fruit-laden air; the shouts and laughter of the Sunday afternoons which Don gives exclusively to romping with his small sons, Donny and Ronny? He calls it "wrestling day."

Don Ameche's grand, declare his studio pals. He's so handsome, choruses feminine America. He's so good, says his wife.

They keep no servants. They have with them a young chap by the name of Gabriel, a girl named Anne. And between Mrs. Don and Gabriel and Ann, the work of the house and babies and gardens is done.

Don's fan mail is answered by Mrs. Don and Anne, by hand. Gabriel usually gets Don's breakfast; Mrs. Don gets her own and the babies'. Don's clothes are laid out for him by Gabriel, not because Don expects any valet service. "But because," laughed Honore Ameche, "if we didn't lay his clothes out, he would go out wearing one red sock and one blue; the coat of one suit, the trousers of another.

HE IS zealous to the point of being fanatical about his work. He's eager and willing to work twenty-four hours out of the twenty-four, if necessary. There is no detail too small or unimportant for him to labor over. He is so punctilious that he wouldn't take as much as a sip of cider before going on the air or on a sound stage. He says he couldn't do his best if he'd had anything to drink. He doesn't consider cocktails potions of the devil, but he does prefer Dago Red or grape juice. And if ever he does take a cocktail before dinner, he makes me drive the car.

"And yet he is as careless and casual as a six-year-old about what he considers 'unimportant matters.' And he considers himself unimportant. Not that he is falsely modest. It just wouldn't even occur to him that there is anything to be modest about. He thinks of himself as a business man with a job to do. He tells people that his ambition is to be 'a good provider for my family.' And he is. Vanity just isn't, where Don is concerned. I could never feel a doubt in the world about him. I could never be jealous. He has never changed, not even a little. He's so good," said Honore Ameche, from her heart.

"He never buys himself anything. Yes, he did, (Continued on page 89)

The Ameches step out so seldom that when they do, they do it right. Here's a very recent picture of this couple at the Cocoanut Grove.

Six years after they met, the Don Ameches married! You'll agree that theirs is the most unusual romance on record

DEANNA-

Fate may have given her a chance,

"Three Smart Girls," her first picture, put Deanna Durbin (center) on the movie map. Nan Grey and Barbara Read are with her. (Above) Adolphe Menjou, Deanna and Mischa Auer in "100 Men and a Girl."

By Caroline S. Hoyt

HOLLYWOOD citizens were startled one morning a few months ago when they opened their newspapers and read two highly contradictory advertisements on the music page. Said the first:

> "For seven months the only vocal teacher of Deanna Durbin. With me she prepared the two auditions that won her the two recent long-term contracts with Universal and Eddie Cantor's radio program."

A few inches lower on the page there was the advertisement of another singing teacher, whose copy read something like this:

> "The discoverer and voice teacher of Deanna Durbin. It is he who prepared her for the Universal contract and Eddie Cantor broadcasts."

It appeared that Deanna's two singing teachers were having a slight difference of opinion. Indeed, they were not the only people who were quarreling over this thirteen-year-old girl, for two mighty studios were making faces at each other, each claiming Deanna. A bewildered public was given the impression that this child must have something more than they had been able to hear over the radio, for at that time her picture, "Three Smart Girls," had not yet been released.

DIMINUTIVE DIVA

but much more than luck and a voice keep her on top

Now, Deanna Durbin has never built a mouse-trap, I'm sure, but she is the perfect example of that old quotation about building a better one. The world, in this instance, bearing motion picture and radio contracts, beat a path to her door because she could sing a little better.

Deanna giggled at the idea of a mouse-trap having anything to do with her success. She had been under the impression that it was the direct result of having practiced her scales and vocal exercises faithfully.

She was at the studio to pose for some pictures when I found her. The hairdresser was trying out a new hair arrangement, quite different from the youthful hairdress which she ordinarily wears. It made her look a little older, although nothing but time can eradicate the unmistakable evidence of extreme youth—the round, almost chubby, pink cheeks, the look of innocence in her clear, blue eyes. It was only her radio audiences who demanded to see her birth certificate before they could believe she was born on December 4, 1922. One look at her would convince anyone that she is no more than the fourteen years she claims and, in fact, she doesn't look as old as the fourteen-year-old girl who lives next door to you.

She confided that she has grown an inch since she signed her Universal contract.

Deanna is made up of contradictions. She is at once a most charming but very non-committal child. She looks, acts and is a little girl; yet her voice is that of a mature woman, and experts say her throat is fully developed. Her blue, wool knitted dress, her sturdy school shoes with their flat heels all bespeak youth, but at the same time she has all the poise of a seasoned trouper. She never wears lipstick or any make-up except for work, and, unlike many girls her age, she has never had a beau and doesn't seem interested in boys in a romantic way.

The Durbin family lives in an unpretentious house near the studio, and life at that home now revolves entirely around its youthful star. However, it always has done so. Deanna's mother, a quiet, unassuming little woman with a decided Canadian accent, is not a stage mama in any sense of the word. She looks after her child to the best of her ability, but she doesn't spoil her. She is still a little bewildered and not sure of just what has happened, but glad it did. She doesn't like to read things about Deanna that aren't true.

"Deanna's ambition is some day to be good enough to sing at the Metropolitan," she told me, as we sat in a deserted office at the studio and waited for Deanna. "But it is foolish to think of such a thing now. She has years of study ahead of her and I'd like to have that straightened out. It has been printed that Deanna had an opportunity to make an audition for the Metropolitan," she said, almost apologetically. "That isn't true, and it's such a silly thing for anyone to say."

THE FIRST time I saw this wonder child she was sitting up in bed, clad in a pair of pink pajamas, making a scene for "Three Smart Girls." Another more important and much older star was the reason for my visit to the set and had occupied my attention until the order for "quiet" was given, and I heard Deanna's (Continued on page 84)

When Deanna made her first trip to New York, did she want to visit a night club? No, this unsophisticated youngster had other plans. (Below) Another scene from our songbird's first cinema triumph.

SHE'S TAKING IT

By Franc Dillon

CLAUDETTE COLBERT stood in the doorway of her dressing-room dressed in a brown tailored suit and a very becoming hat which had a chicken feather sticking up in front. She laughed when I mentioned it.

"My maid bought it for me," she said. "I've been working so hard on my last picture that I haven't had a minute to shop. Today I was giving a luncheon for six women and what girl could give a luncheon without a new hat? So I sent the maid out for some brown hats and this is one of them."

She looked as calm and unruffled as though I had not been a half hour late for my appointment. Everything about her was restful—the cool, cheerful sitting-room, which had been newly decorated in gay chintzes, the atmosphere of orderliness about her.

"I was afraid you'd walk out on me, I was so late," I began," but she only laughed.

"There's no hurry," she drawled. "This is the first time in my life that I was ever on time. A year ago I might have been upset at having to wait but I've gotten over being in such a rush. I'm learning to take it easy.

"What do you get out of life if you don't stop to enjoy it as you go along?" she asked, warming to her subject. "You rush along, working yourself into a frenzy over a lot of trivialities and realize too late that you have missed half the scenery.

"It wasn't so long ago that I thought I had to make a certain number of pictures every year; I thought if I was off the screen a few weeks my career was over; if I was held up by a traffic signal for one minute I fretted myself almost into a breakdown. I've learned better."

IT WAS a series of incidents that taught her this lesson. Incidents that impressed her as being bad breaks at the time they occurred but when viewed in retrospect turned out to be lucky breaks.

"Remember when I first came to Hollywood and after making one picture I sailed off on a leisurely four-mouths' trip to Europe?" asked Claudette. "I had made two bad pictures in New York and didn't wait to learn how the one I made here had turned out. All my friends advised me not to go away just then. They said audiences would forget me; that I was risking my whole career by leaving before I was firmly established.

"I thought that they were probably right, but I went anyway and had a marvelous time. When I came back, I started right in where I had left off. Certainly that is one instance where I lost nothing by taking my time. The trip cost me money, of course—I mean, money I lost by not working—but it was a wonderful experience and, I believe, was what made me begin to realize the unimportance of a lot of things I had always believed were terribly important."

As she sat opposite me on the comfortable divan, she looked the picture of contentment. There wasn't a line in her face; there wasn't a nervous movement in her whole makeup. The splashes of roses and green leaves on the cream-colored slip-covers on the furniture were no more vivid than her own coloring—the sparkle in her brown eyes, the rich brown of her hair with its reddish glints. It was a far cry to the experiences she had undergone when, for seven weeks, she worked on exteriors for the picture, "I Met Him In Paris," in Sun Valley, Idaho.

"You'll be away seventeen days," they told her when she left for the distant location, but the company stayed seven weeks. Except for ten days when she was in bed with influenza, Claudette worked every day—long days, too, that began at sunrise. "Only most days the sun forgot to rise," she explained. "We had to be on location, twenty-five miles from the hotel, by eight o'clock in case the sun would shine. Then, with the temperature any place from 35° below zero to 85° above, we waited and waited until there was no longer a chance for sunshine.

"I had a little heater that I put my feet on, but if my feet were warm, my hands were cold. It was quite an experience," she concluded.

ALTHOUGH she is not supposed to be an expert at any of the winter sports (in the picture, I mean) she had to learn enough about them to be an amateur.

"I didn't know a Gelaende sprung from a Christy turn when I went up there. When I went to bed at night after practicing them for hours I felt like an overworked adagio dancer.

"I practiced until I could do a few simple antics on skates, but the skis are something else. The experts would come booming down the mountains at a terrifying speed. It looked very simple until I tried it.

"The teacher's favorite phrase to me was, 'You are stemming again—always stemming.' Stemming is the easiest thing about skiing. It's the most natural thing in the world to have your skis turn in pigeon-toe fashion. The only trouble is that when that happens you usually fall down. I never did get off what they called the 'nursery slope'."

At night when the company returned to the Inn—sometimes on a snow plow if no other method of transportation could get through the deep drifts—Claudette invariably went to her room, had her dinner on a tray and went right to bed. This practice led some of the Eastern society crowd, up there for the winter sports, to remark that she was "not at all like our idea of a Hollywood movie star."

BING

And our once-carefree crooner is confronted with a grave problem. How shall he solve it?

By Gladys Hall

in Bing's latest croon-fest, hear what the Crosby chillun screen romances!

The Crosbys believe in big families. Here's Dixie with Dennis, Phillip and Gary. Sir Stork's flappin' his wings again.

GROWS UP

MY SON, Gary, saw his first motion picture not long ago," Bing said. "It was 'Rhythm on the Range.' When he came home I asked him how he liked it. He seemed to be struck dumb with embarrassment. He stood first on one foot, then on the other. He wouldn't look at me or his mother. I asked him again what he thought of the picture. He finally blurted out, in kind of a hard, cold, little voice, 'You kissed a girl.' You could have knocked me down. I tried to explain that it was just make-believe. He didn't seem to be convinced for, still refusing to look at me, he said, 'She is a bad girl.'

"That sure gave me something to think about," said Bing, "a reaction like that from a kid not quite four. I think I understood, though. I could imagine what I would have thought if I had seen my Dad 'kissing a girl.' But it couldn't have happened to me. That's where I was lucky. Nope, it couldn't have happened among the kind of people I was brought up with.

"How do you bring kids up these days as they should be brought up? What with radio and pictures and parents in this business, how do you keep them unspoiled and unsophisticated as they should be. It sure worries me."

And it sure surprised me. Somehow one does not associate Bing—Bing with the catch in his voice—with parental worries. But one has to, for Bing has grown up. This worry of Bing's gives us the clue to Crosby, as he is today, as he has always been, really. Bing is old-fashioned.

Bing has never got away, in heart, from the comfortable, shabby house in Spokane, Washington, where he and his six brothers and sisters grew up, worked and played and had their chores to do; learned the value of a dollar because they had to earn a dollar when they wanted one; got old-fashioned spankings when they deserved them and where they did the most good; honored their father and their mother; were taught to obey the Golden Rule.

"We all had our chores to do," Bing said. "We washed and wiped the dishes by turns. We chopped wood and stacked it. We ran errands. We washed windows. We mowed the lawn. The first crooning I ever did was over a lawn mower. We lived at home, of course, and the folks paid our tuitions at school. But we had to do everything else for ourselves. Had to buy our own clothes as soon as we were any size at all. If we wanted to go to a movie Saturday night, we had to hustle and earn fifty cents or a dollar, and if we didn't earn it, we didn't go.

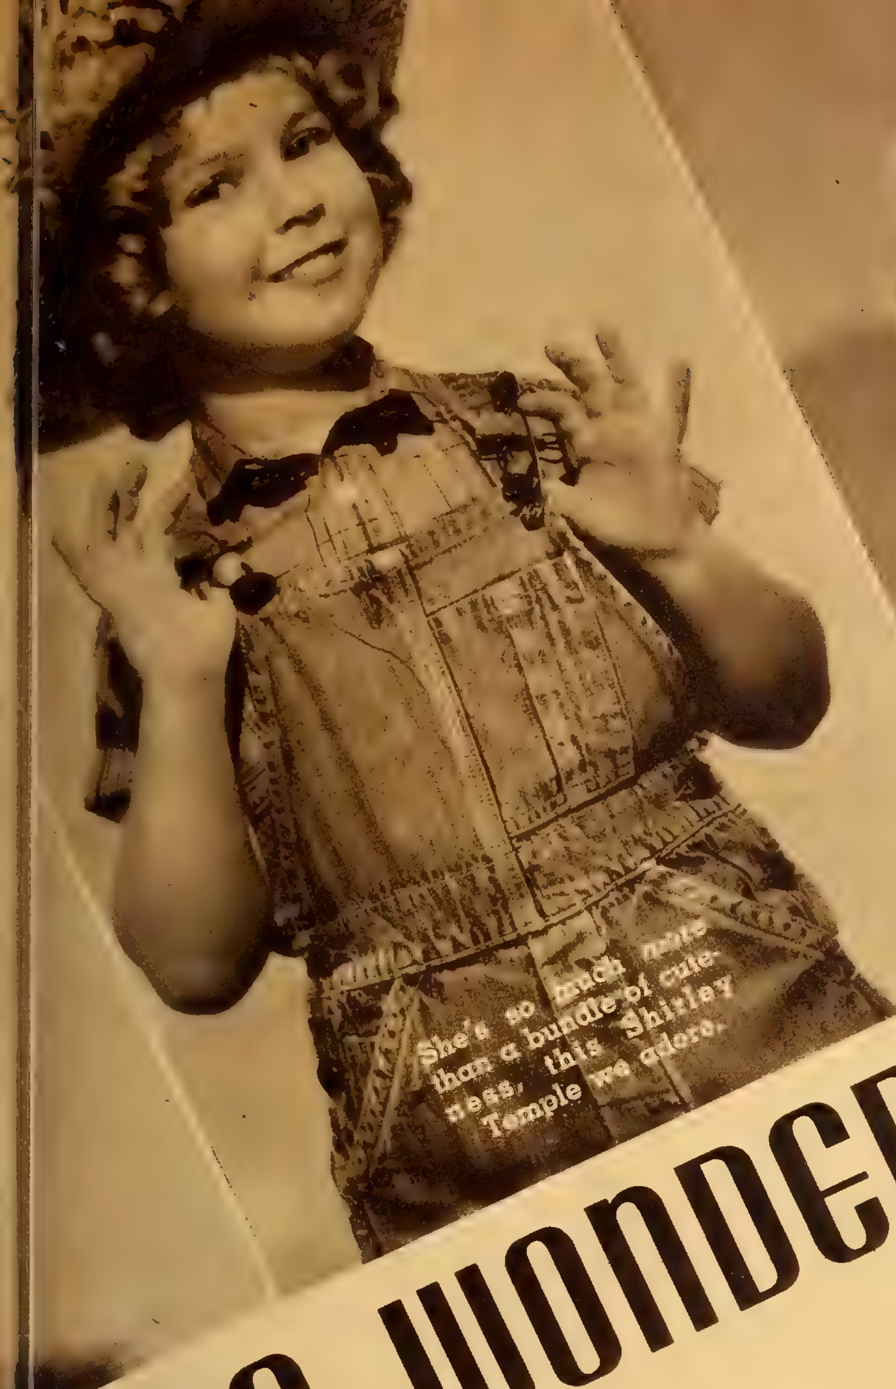
"We didn't keep a servant. That was rich man's stuff. Our mother cooked and baked and sewed for the lot of us. She still does," grinned Bing. "If I have a cold, she's right over at our house on Toluca Lake (she and Pop live a few blocks away from us), and she puts me to bed whether I like it or not and doses me up with all the old-fashioned remedies. If any one of us does anything she doesn't approve of very much, including me, she tells us off plenty. She tells me off plenty. Occasionally, some fake publicity story will break, and if she doesn't like the sound of it, she's right after me, demanding to know what I'm going to do about it. (Continued on page 83)

There's sound sense in that lovable child, Freddie Bartholomew.

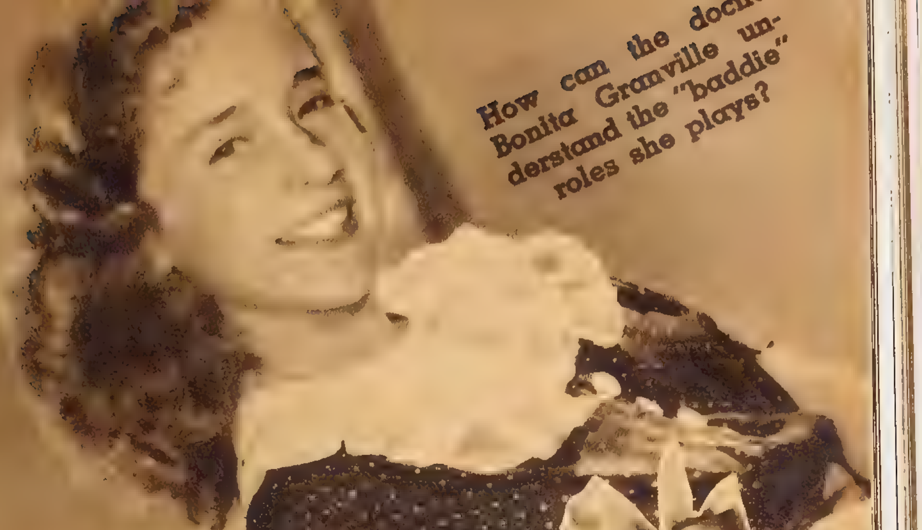
GEE, THOSE KIDS

And there isn't one among them who claims to be a child prodigy! Yet, there are definite reasons why they're so very successful

By Faith Service



She's so much more than a bundle of cuteness, this Shirley Temple we adore.



How can the docu
Bonita Granville understand the "baddie" roles she plays?

ARE WONDERFUL!

Jane Withers, the picture prankster, is that practical off-screen!

I CAN'T say that I actually believe in reincarnation," said Aunt Cissie Bartholomew slowly, "but when it comes to Freddie, I—well, I don't know how else to account for him. He is a puzzle and something of a miracle to me every day I live. And I have lived every day with him since he was an infant. I still can't understand how he knows what he knows—things I know he has never been told, never read, never experienced. True, I have read to him extensively, Shakespeare, Dickens, the classics. I have talked with him considerably. But he can discuss things, understand things I know he has never known—in this life.

"One instance stands vividly in my mind. Freddie was three. It was Freddie's first day in London. We were riding on a bus. We passed the tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Instantly, as if automatically obeying some instinctive impulse, Freddie rose in his seat, stood erect and, without the slightest trace of self-consciousness, saluted the tomb of the Unknown Soldier!"

Aunt Cissie paused a moment. "Some of the people in the bus smiled," she recalled. "A few had tears in their eyes. I sat there, frozen. I was plain scared. He had never even been taught to salute in play. How did he know?

"Just the other night I had a nightmare. I was dreaming that kidnappers were in the house. I was struggling with them, terrified. I woke to find Freddie standing over me, patting my shoulder, saying reassuringly, 'It's all right, Aunt Cissie, those men have gone, dear.' I stared at him and said, 'What do you mean, Freddie, what men?' He answered, 'The kidnappers, the one with the black beard and long sort of hair. I knew what you were dreaming, you see, so I just wanted to wake you and tell you we are all right.'

Stay Young With

Movie actresses look younger as the years roll on. Yes, there's

THE FOUR actresses on these two pages seem to get younger, instead of older, as the years go by. Why, there's Irene Dunne, who went out to Hollywood back about 1931 to play in a dear little flop called "Leathernecking" or something, and today in 1937 she looks five years younger than she did then. Jean Arthur's first attempt at picture fame, which ended unhappily, is remembered well enough by all of you, and you'll also remember how her lack of chic and spirit made her seem older five years ago than she does now. Miriam Hopkins looks younger right this minute than she did when she was playing in "The Camel Through the Needle's Eye" for the Theatre Guild in '29. Colbert looks younger than when she was playing in "The Barker." Hollywood is full of such examples. Norma Shearer. Myrna Loy. Janet Gaynor. They've all been in pictures at least ten years, so yuh know they must be over thirty, no matter what their press agents say.

Miriam Hopkins, yesterday (inset) and today! It's hard to believe, but, almost ten years ago, when she was still on the stage, Miriam looked older than she does this minute.

Granted, thirty's no great age. But don't you know a score of women of thirty-odd who look at least ten years older? I'll go further. There are dozens of movie stars of a former day, who are over forty, and are, today, chic, slim, vital, young-looking. Not all dewy and pink and white and completely unlined as to face—no. None but a sap would expect it. But just as lovely for all that with their good figures, their clear, well-tended skins, their wit and charm and poise. Billie Burke. Aileen Pringle. Billie Dove. Dorothy Mackaill. Lila Lee. The ones who have gotten fat and puffy or burned-out looking and too thin are the exceptions.

Let me take up your sales resistance first, before I start my little thesis entitled, "If they can do it, why can't you?"

"These women have a lot of money," you say. "They have a lot of time. They have many serv-

Staying young is the star's job. If she can do it, why can't you? Claudette Colbert echoes, "Why not, indeed?" And she's learned beauty secrets since her "Barker" days in '29.

Way back in 1931, Irene Dunne appeared in "Leathernecking," and this is how she looked. Quite different from the beauteous, glamorous creature she is today!

ants. They were pretty darn beautiful, or anyhoo, exceptionally good-looking, to start with. With the aforementioned money they can buy the services of masseuses, beauty experts of every description, French maids to keep their clothes in exquisite order, coif their hair, manicure, pedicure, and pat the phizz with sweet-smelling unguents after the day's work at the studio. And all these advantages help to keep them young."

Answering all that, I'll concede one point: They were all pretty fine critters to start with. But your other arguments—phooey! Just give a second's thought to wealthy, non-professional women whom you may know or whom you see in the roto sections. Are they always lovely and young-looking? No. Frequently, they're far too fat, often they're not particularly chic, often they're downright dowdy. Because they sometimes don't give a hoot, or they've let easy living make them fat and soft, or too strenuous living render them too thin and haggard. Money alone ain't the answer, ladies. Nor servants. And so far as time goes, I don't know who has less time than a popular movie star, such'n as Mlles. Arthur, Dunne, Colbert and Hopkins.

It's the will to keep yourself in trim that's the answer. The pride in yourself, the will power to pass up a few measly eating and drinking pleasures and the intelligence to prevent before you have to cure.

You girls in the late twenties and early thirties, watch these things: Add to your regular list of cosmetics a cream that you use exclusively for softening and gentle massage. A tissue cream is what such a beauty aid is usually called. It is heavier in oil content than your cleansing cream. Young gals don't need such, but you do. Don't wait for the first lines to appear but start using a soften-

FLYING TO FAME

By Robert H. McIlwaine

Little did John Trent know, when he piloted a producer, that Fate flew, too.

Pretty Marian Marsh plays John's romantic moment in "The Great Gambini," a thriller.

JOHN TRENT literally flew his way into the movies. Yes, and he will be the first to tell you that piloting a giant transport plane was no tough job! But emoting before the cameras; well, there's another story—yet, at that, one he doesn't mind discussing.

It seems that Producer B. P. Schulberg needed only one long look and the unanimous vote of his party of friends, aboard a plane en route to Kansas City, to convince him that John Trent—then Pilot La Verne Brown—was definitely a picture possibility. It was shortly after this initial trip that Mr. Schulberg travelled the skyways again with this same pilot at the controls. And it was on this second flight that the producer broached the subject of a screen test to an already-satisfied-with-life pilot.

"I thought at first that Ben was just being nice," Trent confessed, "and so I promised to call him up if ever I felt the movie urge. Then I promptly forgot about it all until several months later when I received a telegram from him. I still didn't think too much about it though. In fact, I'm afraid I didn't even answer the wire. I had a good job, I figured, so why tackle something new when, after years, I had finally converted my family to becoming airminded? It was no easy task selling them on the idea of my going into aviation, but I at last had accomplished it, so I didn't even want to think about a change. But evidently Fate stepped in and worked things out.

"Ben travelled with me quite often after that and each time he'd invariably ask when I was going to work for him. Well, to make a short story long, while I was on vacation, I visited Hollywood. Just for a gag, I called Ben and told him I'd like to make a test. I thought it would be fun and at least something (Continued on page 88)

WEALTHY AND WISE

Sylvia Sidney owes it all to Benjamin Franklin!

By Dorothy Herzog

A GENTLEMAN named Benjamin Franklin once said, "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise."

Mr. Franklin was around quite some years before the advent of Sylvia Sidney, of Hollywood and New York fame, but Sylvia effectively practices at least part of Mr. Franklin's advice. She rises early. In many ways, she rises early.

Sylvia Sidney has come East upon the completion of each of her pictures. Having no home in New York, she has lived at a hotel. Being healthy, wealthy and wise, she began to wonder why not have her own apartment in New York, one arranged exactly as she enjoys a place. So, no sooner thought of than done. And now, in a brownstone house that has been converted into apartments, Sylvia is set up to her complete satisfaction.

"I don't really want unnecessary possessions," she said, very seriously. "I like to travel light."

"It's funny that you've never owned property on the Coast," we remarked. "The real estate 'bug' usually gets everyone in pictures."

Sylvia's small, oval face was wreathed in a smile. "It nearly got me once," she admitted. "That was just shortly after I went to Hollywood. Mother and I leased a house in Beverly. The person who owned it wanted to sell. I had it investigated to see if the deed and titles and such were clear. I found they weren't. There was a mortgage and, as a matter of fact, I could purchase the property for the amount of the mortgage—which, by the way, was much lower than the high price placed on it for my benefit. So, I didn't do anything about it."

"Do you have a business manager?" we queried.

I MANAGE myself," she laughed. "I used to have a paid manager. Then one day I asked myself, why should I? Didn't I have the sense to look out for myself that I had before I got into pictures? Couldn't I take a certain amount of time each day and attend to whatever bills or orders or writing of checks needed to be attended to? I could. And did."

This is where the second half of Mr. Franklin's advice comes in. Sylvia finds time to attend to such matters because she's an early bird. She rises around seven, regardless of what hour she retired. When she is making a picture, she gets up at six.

"They call me a menace on the set," she laughed, "because I'm always on time."

But she loves it. "My friends don't care for it much, though. I sometimes forget eight o'clock's early and after I've been up an hour or so, I'll pick up the phone and call someone. You should listen in on the reception given me!" She shivered. "Vocal icebergs!"

Curious person, Sylvia Sidney. We remember, years ago, when she arrived in Hollywood to fulfill her first movie contract. We remember some of the stories that filtered around the town about what a temperamental girl she was. She was also credited with making big statements about herself and what a shining career as a star she was going to have. To our knowledge, she never denied any of these stories.

"I never did," she admitted. (Continued on page 86)

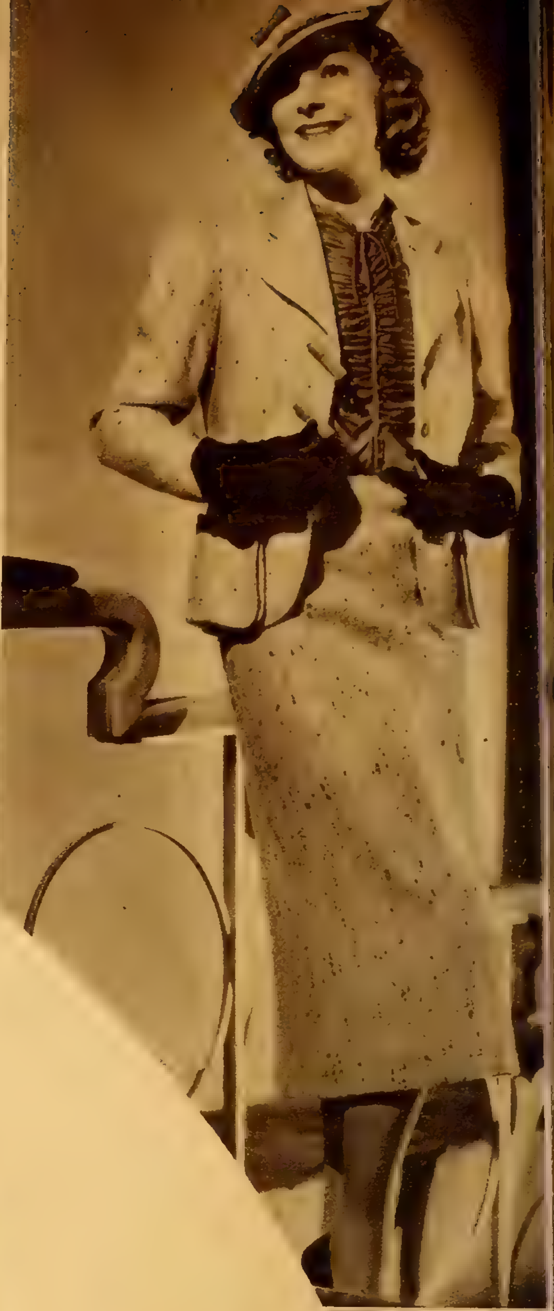
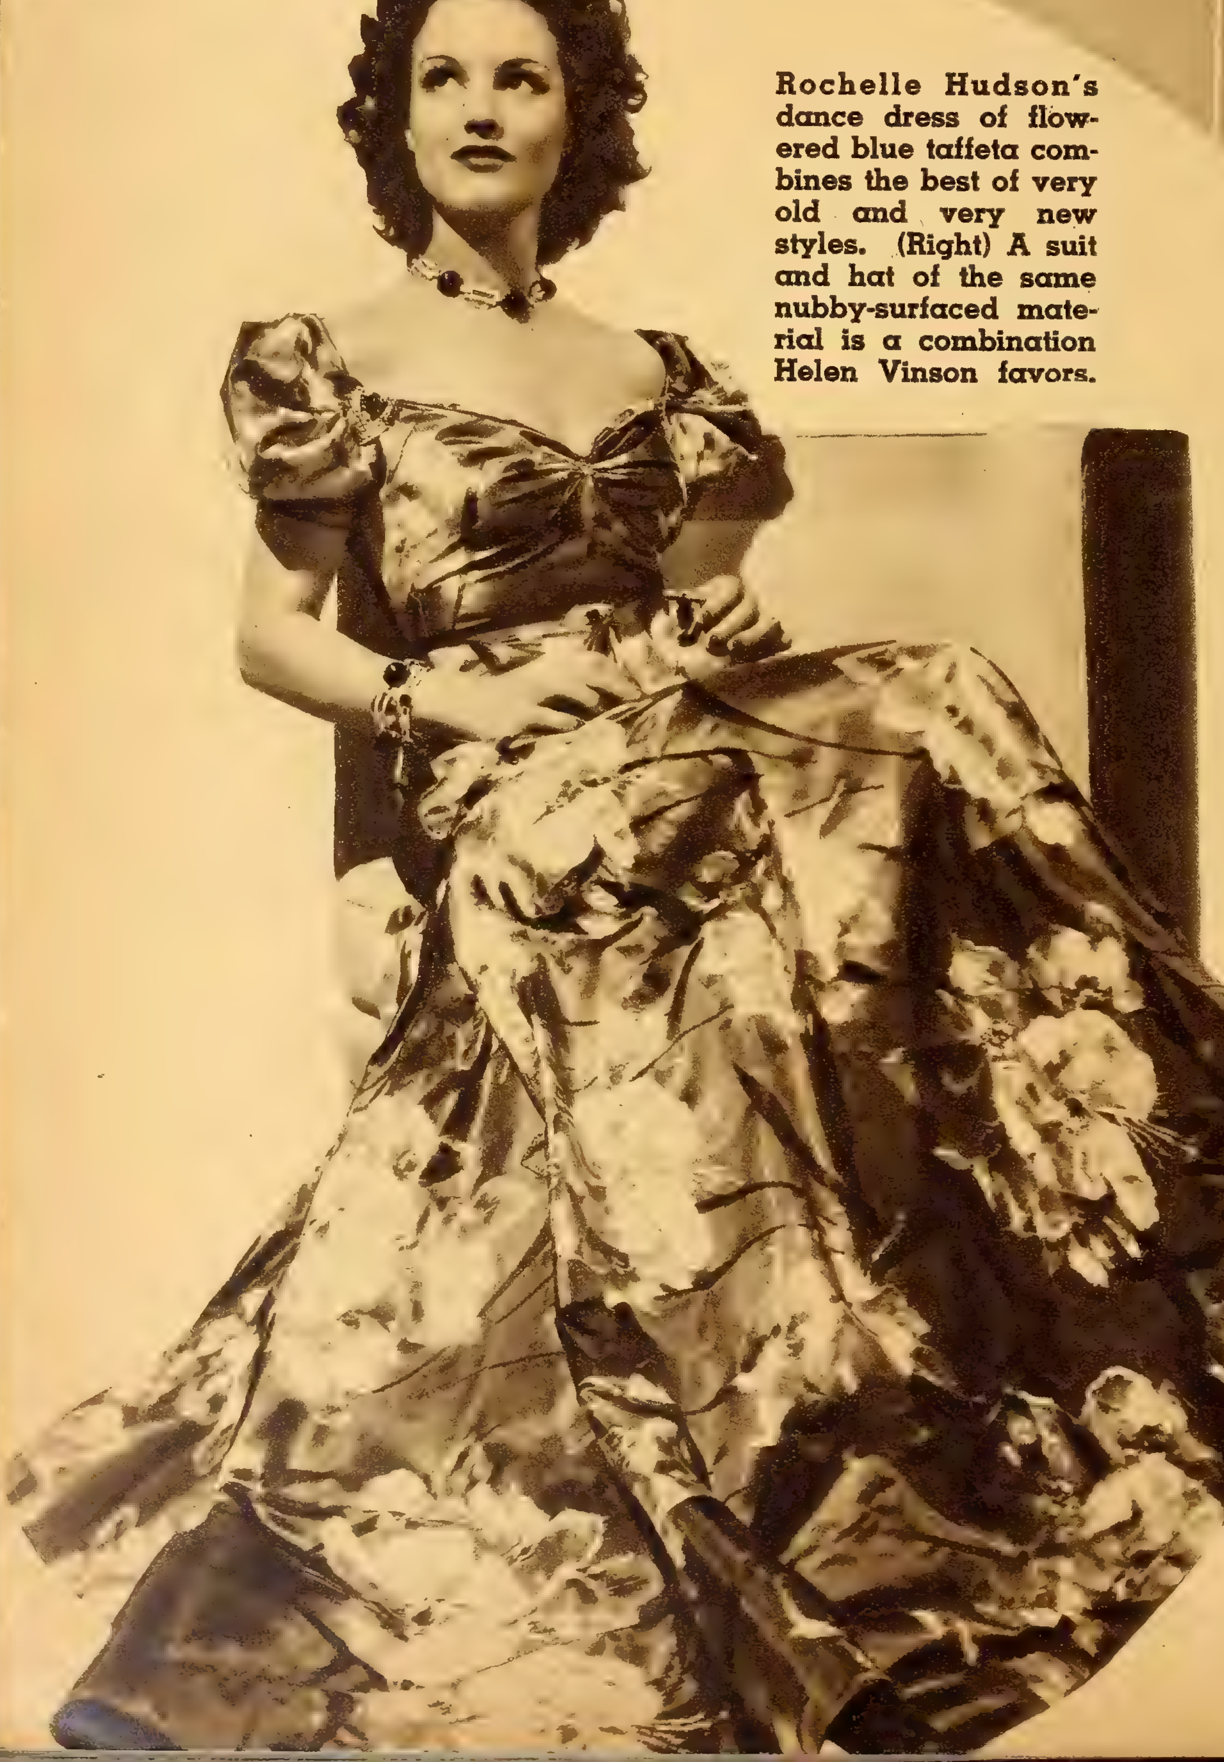
"My life," says Sylvia, "is an open book—but can I help it if a few of the pages are stuck together?"

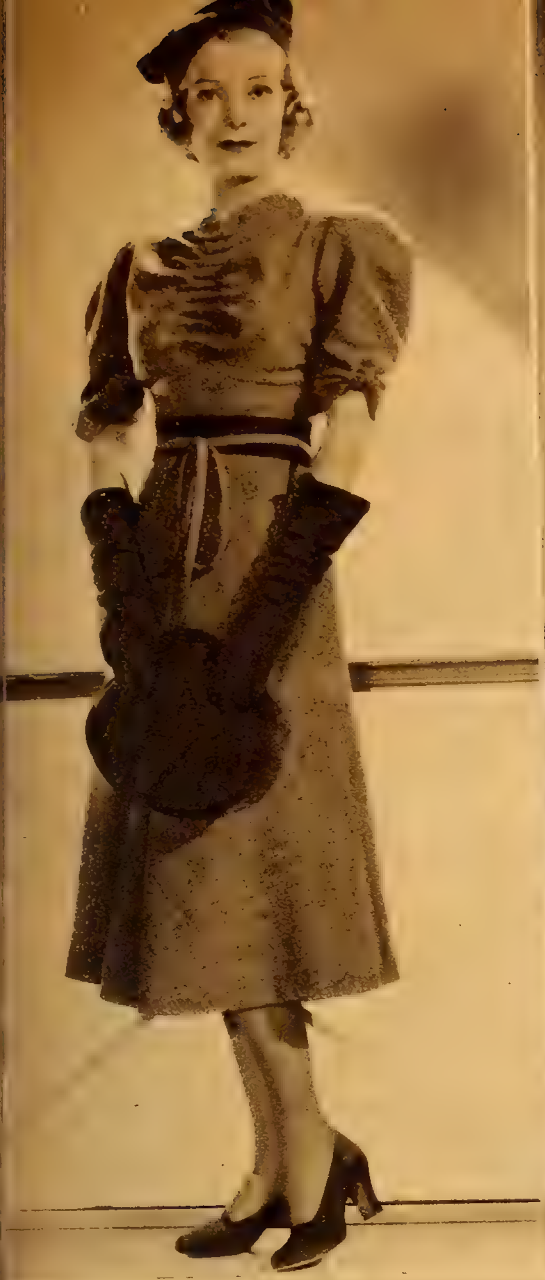
Fall Fashions Forecast

By Ann Wills

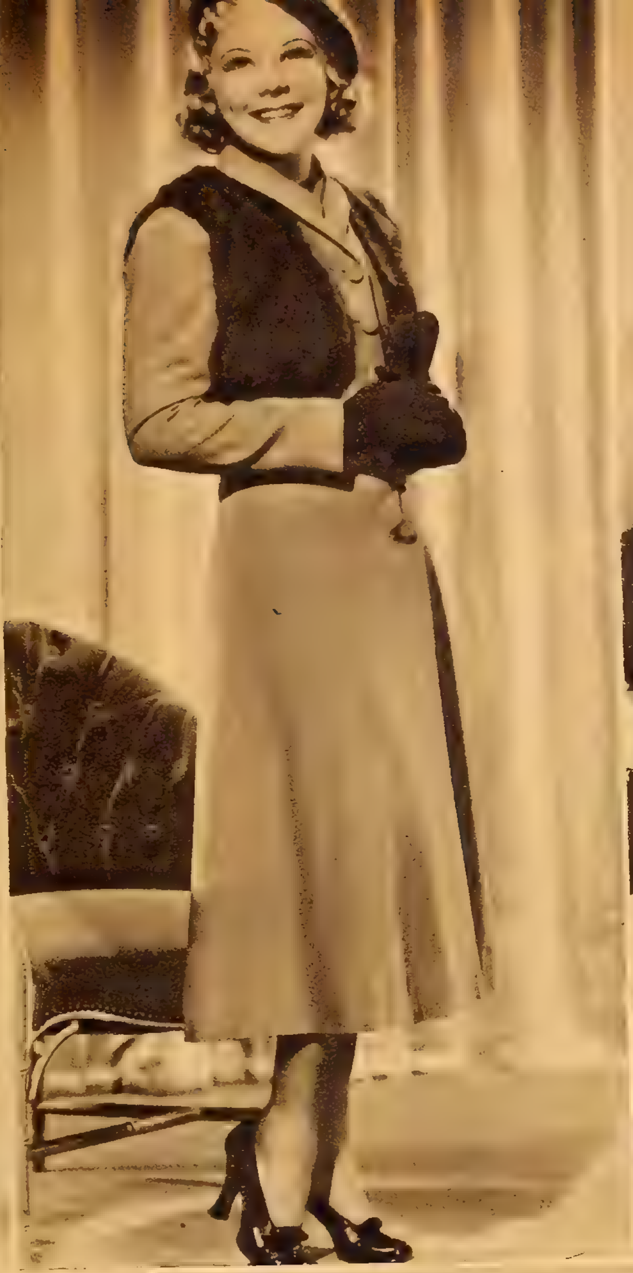




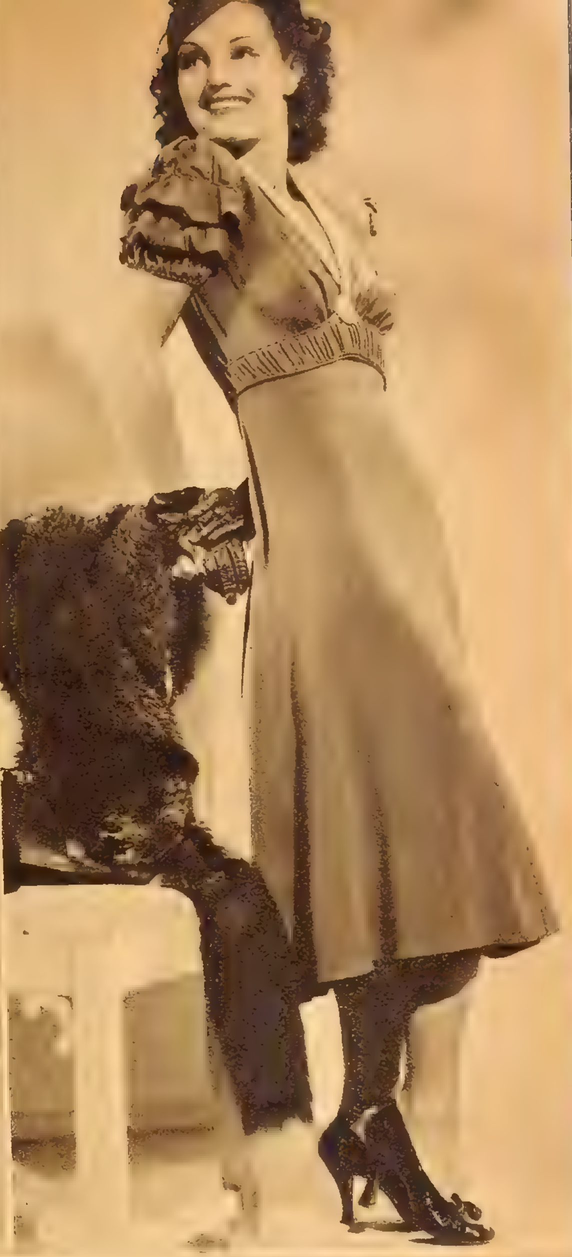
Rochelle Hudson's dance dress of flowered blue taffeta combines the best of very old and very new styles. (Right) A suit and hat of the same nubby-surfaced material is a combination Helen Vinson favors.



A swing-skirted dress is Helen Vinson's salute to Autumn. Details most important to watch for are front fullness in your skirts, low waistline and material of a rough texture.



Three coats in one is Sonja Henie's, with detachable fur bolero. Don't let the brown ermine scare you! There are tricks to every trade, and furriers have been working overtime.



Rochelle, the fashion guide for the gadabout college girl, wears the new heartbeat crepe dress. It's her choice for those Summer-into-Fall days and very alluring.

ANY GIRL with a grain of clothes sense and just a little money can look well dressed in midsummer or midwinter," Helen Vinson told me one day, as we settled down to a pot of tea and our favorite subject. "But look around you in late August and early September. Look at the clothes women are wearing, if you can bear it. It is those transition days from Summer into Fall that few women are prepared for. To be well-dressed then is a real test of a girl's enterprise and judgment.

"It takes a lot of energy to have something in your wardrobe for the first Fall days, because you feel so comfortable all along in your Summer sports things of linen and sheer silk that you don't want to make the effort even to think of woolens and furs. It takes keen judgment too, because the most marked changes in fashion are launched in the Fall. You can't just pick up a simple crepe dress or tweedy suit and feel that you are ready for that inevitable morning when there is a hint of Autumn in the air. The lines and the fabric are apt to look like something you found in the attic. You have to study what the really good Hollywood designers are launching in new pictures, follow the fashion news from Paris and then figure out what is best for you in the new style trends. To be all ready to slip into a brand-new outfit of quite different type from your Summer clothes as soon as the first green leaf is tinged with russet—that's having real clothes sense."

This year Helen did not have to figure out for herself what her first Autumn outfits would be. She was so enchanted by the clothes designed by Omar Kiam for her to wear in "Vogues of 1938" that at the completion of the picture she bought them from the studio. Omar Kiam was one of New York's most distinguished dress designers before he went to Hollywood, and since he has been there it has been a toss-up whether Paris followed his innovations or whether he had second sight that told him which way the Paris fashions were heading. When you see his name on the screen as costume designer for certain productions, get out pencil and paper and make notes on details of the costumes. Fashion experts always do.

Two designs, which are illustrated, show innumerable details that are important in the new fashions. The fur-jacket ensemble shows how subtly front fullness is introduced into the new dresses. In this case it is by horizontal tucks. Two-color ensembles in soft blended tones are important this Autumn, and this one is quite the loveliest color combination you ever saw—a rosy hue almost as pink as shrimp with brown ermine jacket and accessories. Don't let that jacket of ermine discour- (Continued on page 80)

MAKE WAY FOR MIKE

Fate threatened Whalen three times—but a sense of humor saved him for success

Michael has been in Hollywood over five years, but until a year ago, you never heard of him! Here he is in a rough-and-tumble bit from "Lady Escapes" with Gloria Stuart.

By Ben Maddox

MICHAEL WHALEN decided, definitely, to come to Hollywood when he woke up one "morning after." Fun was fun, and friends might turn into real foes, but things had been carried a trifle too far!

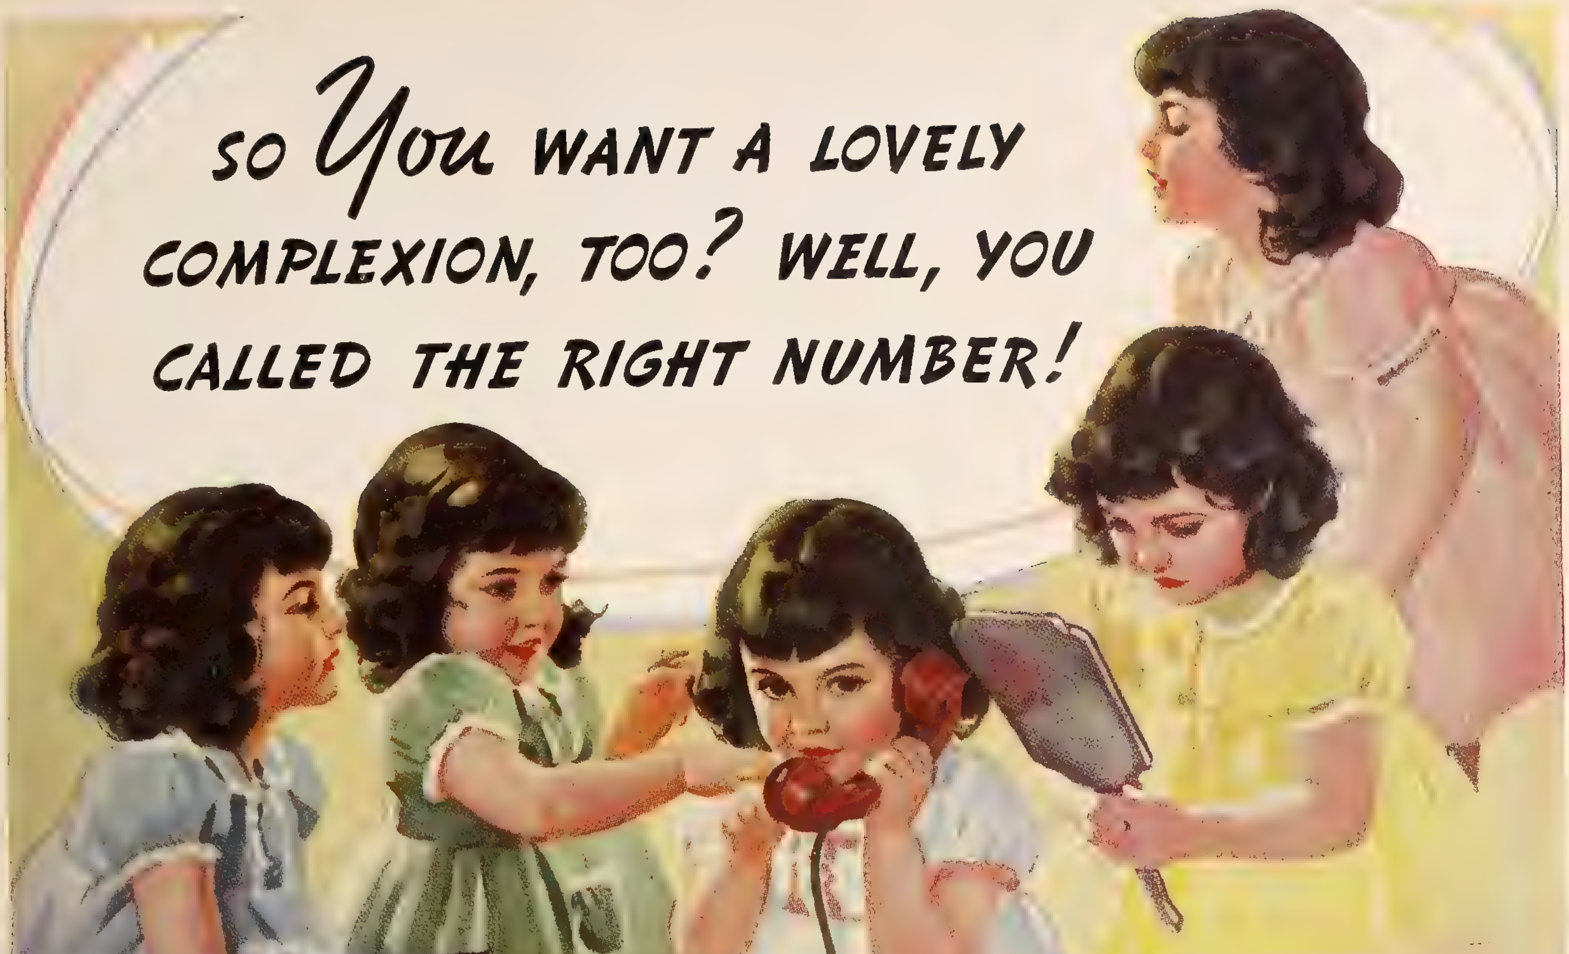
If you had suddenly found yourself lying across the tracks in a New York subway, how would you have felt? Mike came to with a terrific start. The ominous whistle of an onrushing express shrilled through his head. For one instant he was appalled to discover where he was. He's always been quick-witted, and at that moment he was more so than ever. Somehow, drained though he was of vigor, he rolled over and off those tracks. The subway express passed. Then another thundered by before he could rise to his feet.

Today, in his home in Beverly Hills, he recalls that he has been in Hollywood five and a quarter years. "For three years and nine months I attempted to get a break!" You never heard of him until he did get his chance and overnight was a popular leading man. In the past year or so he has heroed in thirteen films.

He remembers, though, the prelude to this movie chapter, the untold climax to his New York venture. Across from me in the California Spanish living-room, he dominated the couch on which he sat puffing on his pipe. He was casually correct in sports slacks, polo shirt and plaid coat. But what he confessed was by no means conventional. I'd asked him what Hollywood had done to him, honestly, before and after screen success.

"I don't know whether I should talk like this," he replied, blue eyes forgetting to laugh. "You see, I haven't told anyone here all about myself. Perhaps it will be all right to be completely candid now. To tell you how I've found Hollywood, before and after recognition, I'd have to go on from where I've been stopping. Everything I've said to writers has been true, but I've kind of skipped over some episodes that have been (Continued on page 76)

SO You WANT A LOVELY COMPLEXION, TOO? WELL, YOU CALLED THE RIGHT NUMBER!



THE DIONNE QUINS give you their "Beauty Secret"

YOU SEE, WE HAVE VERY SENSITIVE SKIN

"If you think your complexion is a problem, you ought to hear about ours! For we've always had such sensitive skin. And if it hadn't been for Dr. Dafoe, goodness knows what troubles we might have had!"

WE MUST USE THE MOST SOOTHING SOAP

"When we were tiny babies, Dr. Dafoe bathed us only with Olive Oil. So when we were ready for soap and water baths you can imagine how carefully he chose the soap made from the most soothing ingredients."

DR. DAFOE SAID ONLY PALMOLIVE

"Dr. Dafoe chose Palmolive, the soap made with gentle Olive Oil. We're mighty glad he did, for we've never had any complexion trouble. In fact, everyone says we have unusually lovely soft, smooth skin!"

WHY DR. DAFOE CHOSE PALMOLIVE

Because the Quins were born prematurely their skin has always required very special care. Here is Dr. Dafoe's own statement:

"For some time after their birth the Dionne Quintuplets were bathed with Olive Oil. When the time arrived for soap and water baths, we chose Palmolive Soap exclusively for bathing these famous babies."

Allan Roy Dafoe

SO DON'T YOU THINK PALMOLIVE IS BEST FOR YOUR COMPLEXION, TOO?

"Isn't our experience a beauty lesson for you? Doesn't it stand to reason, that if Palmolive is safest for our tender skin, it must be best for yours, too? Well anyway, our advice is, only Palmolive, the soap made with gentle Olive Oil."

Why Palmolive, made with Olive Oil, makes complexions soft, smooth, young again

Beauty experts advise the daily use of Palmolive Soap because Palmolive is made with Olive and Palm oils. That's why its lather is different—rich, soothing and penetrating. Palmolive softens, freshens and stimulates the skin, helping to restore attractive, natural color.

Why not use Palmolive regularly? Let its gentle, different lather help make your complexion lovelier, younger-looking!

WALTER WINCHELL SHOOTING MACDONALD-RAYMOND WEDDING

WEDDING BELLS • And so they

The MacDonald-Raymond wedding was colossal, terrific, stupendous! Yep, 'twas strictly a four-star production! The night was perfect—the moon rode high, the air cool and clear and the picturesque Wilshire Methodist Church a scene of beauty.

The ceremony, scheduled for nine o'clock, actually started at 9:40. Long before the organ pealed out the Wedding March, crowds thronged the streets. Police and ropes held back the curious. Photographers' bulbs popped, as Movietown's famous poured into the church.

Outside and in there were great to-dos. Airplanes and advertising blimps flew overhead, but nobody paid much attention to 'em. All eyes were fastened on the lighted church. There, in an impressively beautiful ceremony, were married—Jeanette MacDonald and Gene Raymond

Gene and Jeanette were saying their "I do's."

The bride wore a gown of flesh pink (her favorite color) mousseline, over a delicate pink taffeta, full sleeves, a lace collar and a tiny bouquet of flowers at her throat. Her long veil was of pink tulle; her cap was edged with flowers. She carried a gold embroidered, satin prayer book with the initials "G" and "J" embossed in the corner and was given away by her mother, Mrs. Daniel MacDonald.

All in all, it was one of Cinemaland's most spectacular events. Estimated cost of the wedding was $25,000, and the gifts almost equalled that figure again. Handsomest present was a set of solid silver plates, from the executives of Jeanette's studio. Hollywood will long remember this happy occasion!

Romantic in white ties and tails were the ushers. (L. to r.) Allan Jones, John Mack Brown, Harold Lloyd and Basil Rathbone. Most embarrassed usher was Allan—his shoes squeaked!

Irene Dunne made a gracious picture as she stepped under the bridal canopy and entered the church.

Only in fairy tales and in Hollywood do weddings

In a town noted for lovely women, there was never a lovelier bride than Jeanette. Her attendants were Ginger Rogers, Fay Wray, her sister, and Helen Ferguson. After the ceremony, the radiant bride and groom hurried down the aisle, with smiles for all.

A number of the guests delayed their departure to snatch roses from the floral decorations. Mary Pickford got one and gave it to Buddy Rogers, who put it in his pocket. So Jeanette and Gene were wed, and launched on a Honolulu honeymoon.

Nelson Eddy sang "I Love You Truly." Had to read the words. Later sang "O, Perfect Love." Read that, too.

Irene Hervey, Allan Jones' wife and Miss MacDonald's friend, was among those present. Here she is arriving at the Wilshire Church.

Looking as romantic as though they were altar-bound themselves, the Stuart Erwins appear.

like this take place. Movietown won't soon forget the happy event

Here is the idyllic home that Prince Gene has built for Princess Jeanette. It might easily be a picture out of a story book, with its gables, low sloping roof and brick chimneys. It's set in exclusive Bel-Air on a five-acre estate. Everything that a girl in love longs to realize in her dream home is found here. And may this famous couple find happiness in their modern castle.

Gene deserves a laurel wreath for keeping a secret six months! Why, he had that house bought'n and paid for all that time without Jeanette's knowing a thing about it.

2. Randy's only regret is that overhead chandeliers went out with Douglas Fairbanks. "I used to be a ninety-seven pound weakling—something like Grant over there," he confides, "until I took to answering fan mail." Cary won't talk until Scott puts down that grisly double-headed sledge hammer of his.

5. At the rate the boys are loping along, Billie Robinson could beat them running backwards. "It's a dog trot," explains Cary, but it must be a pretty small dog he has in mind.

6. The end of a perfect spray. Exuberant, but not too exuberant to remember his etiquette, Cary radiates good health and cheer from the safe vantage of a bath sheet.

7. Bolder than Grant, Randy displays a physique that should answer maidens' prayers from the rock-bound coast of Maine to the sunny shores of California.

Battle of the month in Hollywood is the Hepburn-Rogers affair. Both girls weighed in about even on the set of "Stage Door," in which they're being co-starred, and Kid Hepburn won the first round when she announced, "It's so nice having Miss Rogers to play the ingenue in my new picture." She forgot skill and started tossing punches right and left, though, when she got a glimpse of some of the gowns "Killer" Rogers was allotted. Hepburn complained to the referee that this was foul tactics, but Rogers held her ground and plans to match her opponent gown for gown. Fight experts predict a knockout along about the seventh reel.

Ever heard of a stand-in for a stand-in? We hadn't either until we wandered onto the set of Marlene Dietrich's "Angel" one day, and saw a blonde young lady standing under the glare of lights in front of the camera. "Is that Miss Dietrich's stand-in?" we asked. "No," replied our informant, "that's her stand-in's stand-in." Reason, it turned out, was that they were making the picture on two sets, and Miss Dietrich at that moment was finishing a scene somewhere else, before rushing over to the set we were on. Just the same, it was pretty confusing.

Shortest vacation of the year was Bob Taylor's trip to Hawaii. After cameramen recorded for posterity his fond farewell to Barbara Stanwyck, the screen's foremost exponent of masculine glamor boarded ship for what was intended to be several weeks of luxurious solitude on the Islands. But Mr. T. reckoned without his public. Aboard ship, his every appearance was accompanied by feminine sighs, which rocked the boat and wrecked our poor hero's composure. Landing at Hawaii, the situation grew more tense, so next day Bob grabbed the same boat and sailed back to peaceful old Hollywood, where a man with a profile isn't regarded as quite such a collector's item.

June Lang's marriage to Agent Vic Orsatti was one of the social highlights of the month. Bridesmaids were Alice Faye, Claire Trevor and Shirley Deane, and Joseph Schenck gave the little lady away. Several months ago, June's mother opposed the match. She was of the opinion that agents were all right in their place, but that their place wasn't in the home. But June convinced her it was love, so parental objections were dropped and Mamma gave her blessing. The Orsattis, incidentally, probably took second billing on their honeymoon, for they sailed on the same boat with Bob Taylor.

Love in Bloom Department: Along about this time of the year—what we call the slack season—producers are coaxed into admitting that next year's pictures will be the greatest of all time, and Marlene Dietrich announces that, in spite of the fact that she's seen here and there with numerous swains, she's still madly in love with her husband, who spends most of his time in Paris. What Marlene probably means is that she's heard so much about him, she'd like to meet him some time.

One thing certain, however, is Marlene's regard for her daughter, Maria. When Marlene is working and Maria is going out to a party, the little girl is always brought onto the set by her nurse. It's really something to see glamorous Marlene, in make-up, and bedecked with jewels, stop work to comb and pat Maria's hair and fuss over her dress, before she gives her final approval.

Embarrassing Moments Dept.: At a party, recently, when the spirits in the front room were high and those in the kitchen getting low, Grace Moore decided it was time to depart. Benchley when Mrs. Butterworth, accompanied by four gentlemen, came in and seated herself in the next booth. They were so close they could have reached right out and socked each other.

Director William Seiter was giving instructions to the two hundred dancers in a ballroom scene for "The Life of the Party." "All right now, girls," he yelled, after a couple of takes, "let's have lots of personality, this time, in the front row. Just be yourself, if you're in the back rows."

Shirley Temple had her first serious accident on the set the other day when she tripped over a light cord and fell kerplunk, hitting one eye on a camera pedestal. The eye began swelling immediately, but after one good sniffle, Shirley said to the director, "Okay, let's go. You can shoot me from the other side."

A last minute change in the "Danger—Love at Work" cast was made when Simone Simon was replaced by Ann Sothern in the leading role. Although temperament is said to have nothing to do with it, we understand the title has now been changed, too. It's just "Love at Work."

Here's some inside stuff on "Lovely to Look at," the new Henie picture. Seven hundred gallons of skimmed milk are in the title role, for it's been found that frozen milk makes a better skating surface than frozen water, since the miles of refrigerating pipes are then hidden from the camera's eye. And it's much better for Sonja, too. She'd rather skate on her vitamins than imbibe them.

"Love Under Fire" was completed some weeks ago, but we were surprised to find the company working on retakes the other day. "Too much fire and not enough love," explained Don Ameche.

Among the sets built for the picture, "Super Sleuth," featuring Ann Sothern and Jack Oakie, was a "Chamber of Horrors." In it were all manner of gruesome torture contrivances, such as the rack, thumbscrews, dungeons, iron cages, and an exact replica of an electric chair. The company was having difficulty with some lines in the script for this scene, when the director turned to Oakie. "Haven't

After 14 Day Evaporation Test

8 popular brands of polish became thick and gummy, evaporated 35% to 60%, while the NEW Cutex Polish stayed smooth flowing, as easy to apply as ever!

New Cutex Polish is Usable to the Last Drop!

"WE'RE getting tired of having to pay for TWO bottles of nail polish in order to really get ONE!" women complained. We thought that was a legitimate grievance, so we perfected our wonderful New Cutex, and now we are proud to say, "Buy the New Cutex and you'll get all the polish you pay for!" We've made sure that the last drop will be just as much of a joy to apply as the first one!

To prove it, we deliberately uncorked 10 bottles of nail polish . . . two of our New Cutex and eight popular rival brands —and let their contents stay exposed to the air for 14 days.

Only the New Cutex stood the test! All the rest became thick and gummy. But the New Cutex evaporated less than half as much as the competitive brands. After 14 days, it still went on the nails as smooth as glass, free flowing . . . just right!

Think what a saving this means! A saving not only of money, but of annoyance. Add to this Cutex's longer wear, its freedom from chipping and peeling, its fine lacquer, its 11 smart shades . . . and you can't wonder that women everywhere are refusing to put up with ordinary wasteful polishes any longer.

And besides giving you twice as much for your money, Cutex costs so little to begin with! The New Cutex is still the old economical price of 35¢ a bottle, Crème or Clear.

HER DAY OFF!

● Many a Movie Miss spends her day off at the tennis matches. But not Barbara Read! For, though Noah Beery, Jr. may be in her heart, gardening's on her mind.

● It is hard to believe that this lovely little lady, wheeling her barrow to the bush-shearing department, is the girl who plays the meanie in "The Road Back." Anyway, on to her plant-sprinkling and, finally, we see Barbara as mistress of all she surveys!

HAVE THAT GOOD KIND OF SPAGHETTI FOR LUNCH — WILL YOU, MOM?

A Food Children Love—Good for them—Easy for you!

—and costs only 3¢ a portion!

WOMEN bought millions upon millions of cans of Franco-American Spaghetti last year, because they found out that it was one of the greatest time and money savers that ever came into their kitchens! For example, there's no finer lunch or supper for school children than Franco-American, served piping hot, with milk and fruit. For dinner serve Franco-American as a main dish, or use it to make left-overs taste like a million dollars. It usually costs only 10¢ a can — less than 3¢ a portion.

Be sure, however, that you get Franco-American Spaghetti — the kind with the extra good sauce. It's entirely different from all other ready-cooked spaghetti. Its delicious cheese-and-tomato sauce is made with eleven savory ingredients — the secret recipe which was the great discovery of a famous French chef. Get Franco-American today at your grocers — it will save you no end of time and trouble.

GARDEN PEAS TOURAINE

Shell 2 pounds of peas and place them in a heavy, waterless cooker or Dutch oven. Add ¼ cup water, 2 tablespoons butter or vegetable oil, a teaspoon sugar, a small, mild white onion, sliced thin, and a pinch of thyme. Cover peas with the outside leaves of a head of lettuce. Cover cooker with a tight-fitting lid and simmer peas until tender, stirring occasionally. When tender, season with salt and pepper to taste. Dredge with 2 teaspoons flour, cook and stir until smoothly blended. Serve very hot.

SEAFOOD COCKTAIL (OR SALAD) SAUCE

⅓ cup mayonnaise
⅓ cup bottled seafood cocktail sauce
⅓ cup cream, whipped
¼ teaspoon paprika

Mix mayonnaise and cocktail sauce. Fold into stiffly whipped cream. Add paprika. Serve as a sauce for Seafood Cocktails or as a dressing for fish salads.

A delicious and healthful Seafood Cocktail or appetizing summer salad can be made entirely of canned fish. It should include large pieces of salmon, a few shrimps and some shredded crabmeat for each serving. Place on lettuce leaves, top with the above sauce and serve icy cold.

AVOCADO GINGERALE SALAD

2 tablespoons gelatin
½ cup cold water
½ cup boiling water
2 tablespoons sugar
⅛ teaspoon salt
1½ cups pale dry ginger ale
½ cup pineapple juice
2 tablespoons lemon juice
1 cup pineapple tidbits
1 avocado, peeled and diced
½ cup halved, seedless (or seeded) white grapes, if desired

Soak gelatin 5 minutes in cold water, dissolve in boiling water. Add sugar and salt. Stir until sugar has dissolved, then add gingerale, pineapple juice and lemon juice. Chill until mixture starts to thicken. Fold in pineapple tidbits and the avocado (alligator pear) which has been diced into small, even pieces. If desired, white grapes may also be added. Turn into small molds which have been rinsed with cold water. Chill until firm. Unfold onto lettuce leaves and pass mayonnaise separately.

This salad may be molded in the cups of a muffin pan. It will then make approximately 12 servings and therefore is ideal for bridge parties and social gatherings. The recipe may be divided in half for family use.

SALAMI POTATO SALAD PLATTER

3 medium sized potatoes
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 teaspoon sugar
3 tablespoons vinegar
6 tablespoons salad oil
1 tablespoon minced parsley
½ cup finely diced salami

Cook potatoes with their skins on until tender (but not mushy). Drain and allow to stand until just cool enough to handle. Peel quickly, dice into small pieces. While still warm, add dressing made by combining salt, pepper, sugar, vinegar and oil in a jar with a tight-fitting cover and shaking well. Stir the potatoes lightly until well coated with dressing. Chill for at least an hour. Just before serving, add parsley and diced salami. Mayonnaise may also be added or passed separately. Place Potato Salad in a lettuce-lined bowl. Place salad bowl in the center of a large serving platter. Surround with cold sliced meats. On one side of platter place a green pepper, hollowed-out and filled with prepared horseradish. On the other side place a hollowed-out tomato, filled with prepared mustard. Garnish platter and bowl with sprigs of parsley. Sliced or quartered tomatoes also make an attractive garnish.

PINEAPPLE UPSIDE-DOWN CAKE

¼ cup butter
¾ cup brown sugar, firmly packed
1 small can (9-oz.) sliced pineapple

Cake Batter

3 eggs
1 cup sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon vanilla
2 tablespoons boiling water
1 cup sifted cake flour

Melt butter in large iron skillet or in a cake pan at least 9 inches across and 2 inches deep. Add brown sugar and stir until sugar has melted. Carefully place a slice of well drained pineapple in the center. Surround this slice with other slices which have been quartered, arranging them attractively to form a design. Break eggs into a bowl and beat with rotary beater until thick, lemon colored and frothy. Add sugar gradually, then add salt, vanilla and boiling water. Add flour which has been sifted, measured and sifted again twice, folding it in gently but thoroughly so that no dry flour remains. Pour this batter carefully over contents of pan or skillet. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 30 minutes or until cake is done and a cake tester inserted in cake comes out clean. Loosen sides of cake from pan and invert at once onto large serving platter. Better served hot, but also excellent cold. Pass whipped cream, separately.

Freshening Up

THIS WAY

Does More Than Clean Your Skin—It Invigorates the Skin!

Mrs. A. J. Drexel, III

At parties and dinners . . . in her simplest play clothes . . . or out for a brisk walk with her Sealyham "Daffy". . . Mrs. Drexel always presents the same sparkling loveliness! Mrs. Drexel is an enthusiastic user of Pond's Cold Cream. "A Pond's freshening up leaves your skin more than clean," she says. "It's brighter . . . invigorated."

FRESHENING UP is more than getting your skin clean. That's what beautiful girls who have found the Pond's way of freshening up say.

Before they make a single appearance, they give their skin the brisk toning up as well as cleansing that sends them forth with such fresh and vital-looking young faces.

Rousing Treatments Fight Off Skin Faults . . .

For this Pond's way of skin care, they find, invigorates their skin. It tones up faulty oil glands, chief cause of blackheads and blemishes . . . livens the circulation. Tones the tissues, so lines will soon be smoothing out, your skin be clear, fine textured, flawless!

Here is the simple method they follow. It's a method whose fame has spread around the world!

Every night, smooth on Pond's Cold Cream. As it softens and releases dirt, make-up and skin secretions—wipe off. Now pat in more Pond's Cold Cream—briskly, till the circulation stirs. Your skin feels invigorated. It is softer—smoother!

Every morning (and before make-up) repeat. Your skin is smooth for powder—fresh, vital looking!

Begin yourself to use Pond's. See your skin, too, grow clearer, brighter, smoother—admired for its youth and freshness.

Send for* SPECIAL 9-TREATMENT TUBE *and 3 other Pond's Beauty Aids

Pond's, Dept. 9MS-CJ, Clinton, Conn. Rush special tube of Pond's Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with generous samples of 2 other Pond's Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10c to cover postage and packing.

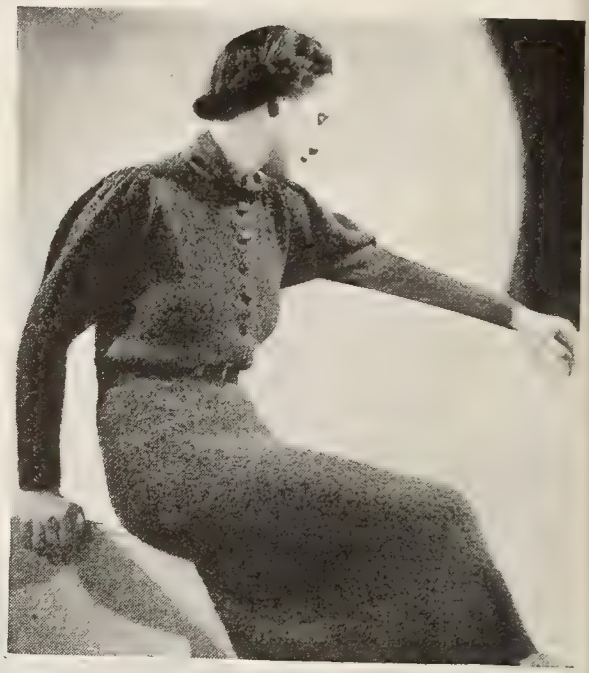
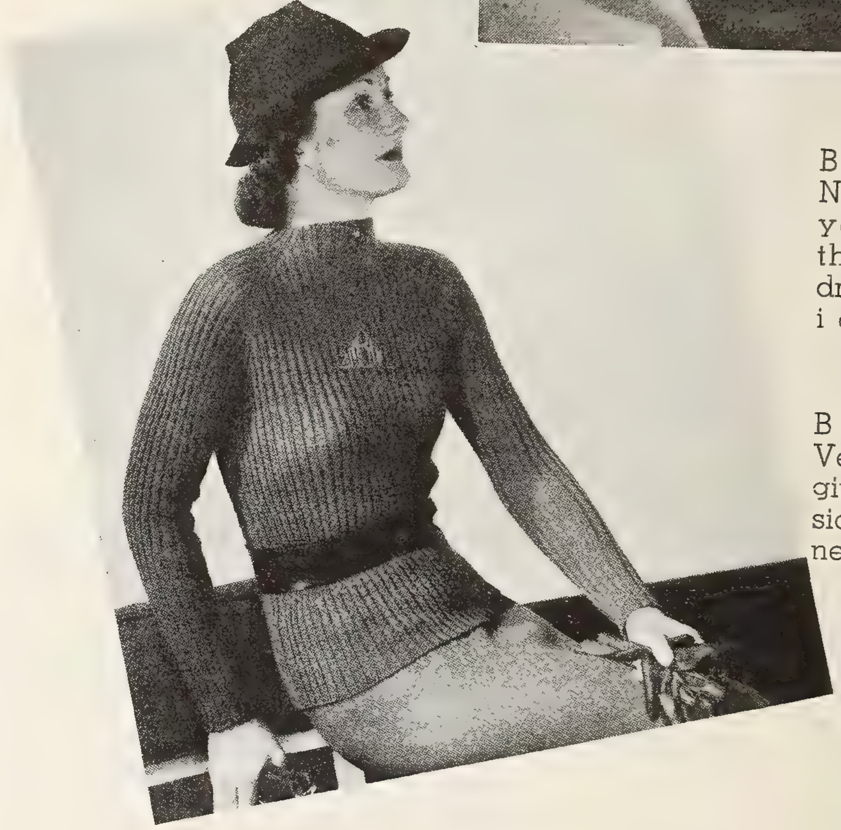
KNIT NOW FOR FALL!

Busy needles these days will bring you endless satisfaction later on





BM 1007—Nubby bolero yarn gives this simple dress its fashionable texture.

BW 101—Vertical lines give an illusion of slimness to this sweater.

ONE of the nicest phases of knitting is that you can be speeding ahead on a knockout Autumn outfit while you are still lolling languorously on a porch enjoying Summer. Knitting takes no energy at all and very little skill, for the directions which we have prepared for you are so simple they are foolproof. Perhaps the best feature about knitting right now is that advance Paris showings stress rough-textured and ribbed fabrics—and here we have them all ready for you.

FILL OUT the coupon, get set with your needles, and you will be wearing the newest styles by the time shops start introducing them in your town. Both the sweater and the dress boast the sleek, softly-molded new lines that are so popular. Of course, you know that the knitting directions are free.

ANN WILLS, MODERN SCREEN,
149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

Kindly send, at no cost to me, knitting directions for Style BW 101 in size.... Style BM 1007 in size.... I am enclosing a stamped, addressed envelope.

"This snapshot fixed everything"

"WHEN he went away, we both promised to write. But you know how letters are—you don't say what you intend to, or the other person misinterprets.

"Before we knew it, our letters were mostly spats, explanations, and apologies. We were getting farther apart all the time. One day I was awfully blue, and on impulse sent this old snapshot. I wrote on the back, 'We didn't quarrel then, did we?'

"I wish you could read the letter I got back. It was the old Pete again, not trying to write, just telling me how much he cared. He said he'd always write with this snapshot in front of him—he could talk to the girl in it so she'd never misunderstand."

The snapshots you'll want Tomorrow —you must take Today

• By far the greater number of snapshots are made on Kodak Verichrome Film because people have found that "it gets the picture"— clear, true, lifelike. Any camera is a better camera, loaded with Verichrome. Don't take chances . . . use it always . . . Eastman Kodak Co., Rochester, N. Y.

Turn to our Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. It's a valuable guide in choosing entertainment. Instead of giving the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

you any hot ideas for this?" he asked. "Hold everything!" cried Jack, rushing over to seat himself in the last-named article of torture. "I'll have one for you in a minute."

Jane Withers is little Princess Elizabeth's most rabid fan. So her mother bought her a book on the Royal Family and let Jane read it by herself. A few days later, Mrs. Withers took Jane to a preview and was amazed to hear her unspoiled daughter quote the Princess. "Don't you think I really should stand up for a minute?" Jane asked her mother. "Surely all these people would like to see me."

Arthur Treacher has a definite domestic streak, and for some time has been wanting to buy a house for himself. The other day he ran across a place that looked ideal—small, attractive gardens, and just $7,500. But that was before he had talked a few minutes to the agent, whose eyes suddenly lit up. "Are you ARTHUR Treacher?" he asked, and upon Treacher admitting it, the agent said, "The property complete is $8,500, Mr. Treacher. That, you see, includes the garage."

Gregory Ratoff, who was hired under a writer-actor-director contract, is now directing his first picture. To say that Gregory is something new in directors is putting it mildly. He practically has everyone in the cast on the verge of a nervous breakdown. Ratoff loves his superlatives and, after a scene, came up to Dolores Del Rio, wildly gesticulating, "Wonderful! Marvelous! Gorgeous! Simply gorgeous, Miss Del Rio, that scene!" Then, lowering his voice to a quiet scream, "But here's the way you should have done it."

And Peter Lorre, also in the picture, came wearily into the studio barber shop one day and lowered himself into a chair. "Well, Mr. Lorre," said the barber brightly, "how's everything going? And how's Mr. Ratoff?" "He seems to be feeling all right," said Mr. Lorre. "Not a sign of a breakdown yet," he added, with a sad shake of his head.

Those chronic honeymooners, according to their publicity department, are now going to take off on another jaunt. This time it will be a trailer trip for the Dick Powells. They plan to spend three weeks in the North Woods, this month, and hope to get the trailer sneaked out of town before the studio can paint "Gold Diggers of 1938" on it.

And it seems that ever since this trailer vogue started, Miriam Hopkins has been dying to see the country in that fashion. So when Director Anatole Litvak's birthday rolled around recently, she made him a gift of one. But our spies report that it's not equipped with honeymoon accommodations.

Just to show you the influence of radio on the young, or something, here's a little item concerning Cecil B. DeMille, who has lately been adding to his income from producing epics by acting as master of ceremonies on that big weekly air show. The other day, his small grandson was visiting on a DeMille set, when a kindly old lady engaged him in conversation. Peter explained that he was visiting his grandfather. Pointing out C. B., he said, "That's my grandfather, Mr. DeMille. He sells soap."

Bing Crosby ordered up a pony the other day for Gary Evan, heir apparent to the Crosby estates. When the pony, resplendent in a hand-carved saddle, was brought around to the Crosby home, Gary waxed enthusiastic. "Say, Dad," he asked, "can this one run backwards like the men say the rest of your horses do?" Either Bing's friends have been talking, or Gary is up on the news from papa's race-track.

There's an unconfirmed rumor about town that during the shooting of "Stage Door," Katie Hepburn did her week-end relaxing at a resort in Carmel, with Howard Hughes as her companion. All of which revives the romantic rumors which once hovered about this pair. Mr. H., if you remember, was once seen about quite frequently with Ginger Rogers, who's playing opposite—and we mean opposite—Hepburn in "Stage Door."

Want to know how Marlene Dietrich keeps her well known figure so well known? Her secret is a diet of tomato juice and hard-boiled eggs, three times every week. Give it a try, girls, and if you don't come out looking like Marlene, don't sue US. We're only telling you. Of course, Miss D. was not exactly an ugly duckling even back in the days when her diet consisted of Wiener Schnitzel and Pfannekuchen.

Here's a little story about Mae West you might like to know. Out on Ventura Boulevard, near Hollywood, there's a small restaurant, operated by a widow who gambled what little money she had to buy the place. It soon became noted for its food, and among its customers was Mae West. When business got good, the landlord promptly raised the rent to a point where the poor gal couldn't afford to stay in business. Miss W. heard about it, and just as promptly bought the place herself. Now the girl's rent is lower than ever, for she pays only enough to cover the taxes.

For "First Lady," the cast includes Kay Francis, Anita Louise, Verree Teasdale, Marjorie Gateson and Marjorie Rambeau, among others. We could hardly wait to get out on the set to see what all these glamor girls were up to. It developed they were up to just what the gals back in Oshkosh go in for—sewing circles. Everyone of them was either hemming towels, embroidering linens or doing drawnwork. And, with chairs drawn into a close circle, they were gossiping away like mad—not about movies, but about the high cost of housekeeping, the newest gadgets to lighten the task of the housewife and similar de-glamored topics. According to the men on the set, the girls haven't wasted a minute on any of them.

They even have exclusively feminine luncheons, staring coldly at any man who looks like he might draw up a chair to their reserved table in the commissary. And each day, one of the girls brings a dish she's cooked with her own hands. To date, Kay Francis has turned up with fried chicken, Verree Teasdale with a couple of cocoanut cakes. Marjorie Gateson brought her special lemon pie one day, and Anita Louise caused the biggest furore by showing up

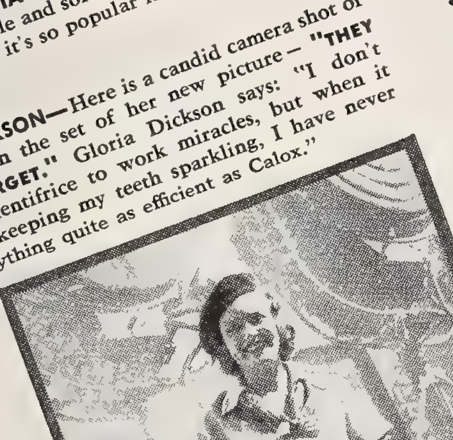
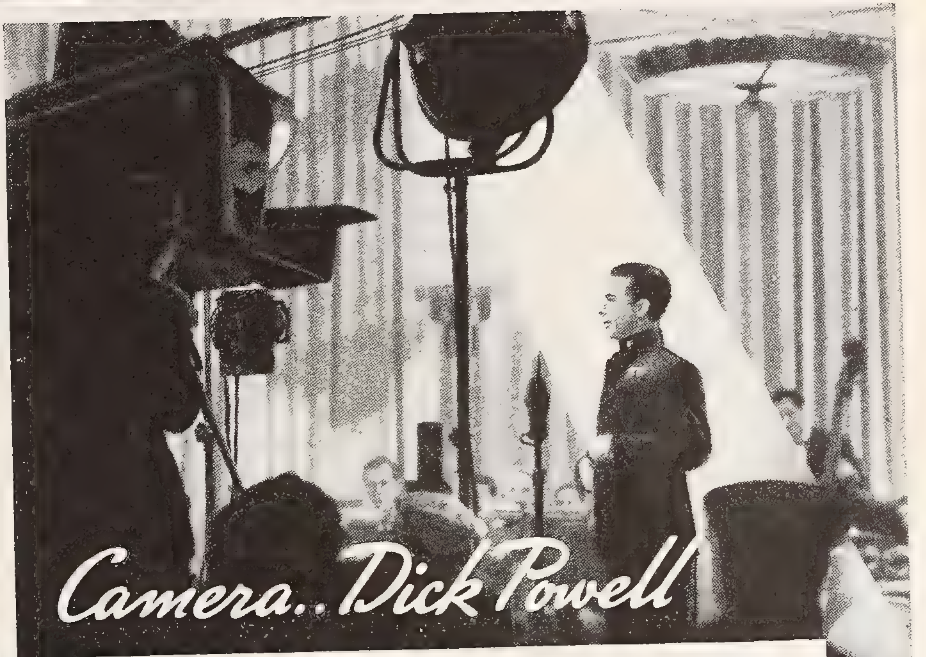
WARNER BROS.' STARS OFFICIALLY APPROVE CALOX TOOTH POWDER

... show You the way to a "starry smile"... sparkling teeth

OLIVIA de HAVILLAND—"Calox has always seemed gentle and soft. And it does polish beautifully. No wonder it's so popular in Hollywood."

GLORIA DICKSON—Here is a candid camera shot of her, taken on the set of her new picture—"THEY WON'T FORGET." Gloria Dickson says: "I don't expect a dentifrice to work miracles, but when it comes to keeping my teeth sparkling, I have never found anything quite as efficient as Calox."





Camera.. Dick Powell

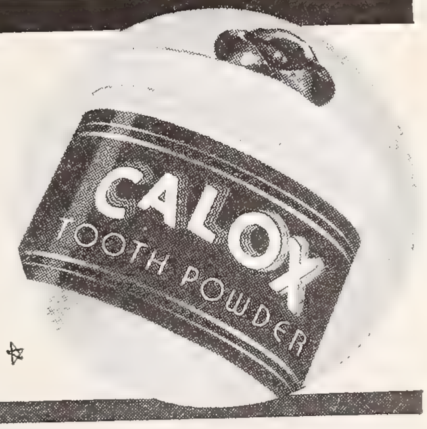
"CAMERA," shouts the director...and powerful 2000-watt lights are thrown on the star's face and teeth. The camera is cruelly honest. Teeth have to sparkle naturally. That is why the choice of a dentifrice is a matter of vital importance in Hollywood.

It is significant that the glamorous Warner Bros. stars have chosen Calox Tooth Powder.

"TOPS," SAYS DICK POWELL. This famous star, now appearing in "The Singing Marine," states:—"I've never heard of any dentifrice that cleans the teeth better than Calox. Here in Hollywood it's considered 'tops'."

JOAN BLONDELL—now starring in "BACK IN CIRCULATION." Joan says: "Calox Tooth Powder has a wonderful reputation in Hollywood for keeping teeth sparkling and clean."

PAT O'BRIEN—"I like a tooth powder that makes the teeth glisten. Calox is ideal for screen stars—or for anyone who wants 'starry teeth'."



CALOX—for teeth that shine like the stars!

WHY HOLLYWOOD SAYS "O. K." TO CALOX

1. GIVES "HIGH-LUSTER" POLISH. Calox contains five scientifically approved cleansing and polishing ingredients.
2. DOUBLE SAFE BECAUSE IT'S...DOUBLE-SIFTED. It cannot contain grit.
3. RELEASES OXYGEN. Oxygen is Nature's own purifying agent.
4. MADE WITH PRESCRIPTION CARE by McKesson & Robbins, who have supplied fine drugs to physicians and hospitals since 1833.

EDDY EDIBLES

By

Marjorie Deen

Some simply "Eddyfying" recipes, which Nelson's cook gave our Modern Hostess, are included in this article. You'll want to serve them often.

WHY DON'T you tell us what Nelson Eddy likes to eat?" many of the readers of this department have written in recently to ask me. It's a logical question, I'll admit, but up to the present time the only possible answer was that Mr. Eddy doesn't like to be interviewed on such matters. But now, at last, your Modern Hostess has accomplished the hitherto impossible job of getting this popular singing star to discuss his favorite dishes.

On any but the hottest days, if you were to ask Nelson what he likes, he'd give you a list of the most filling dishes imaginable—a substantial "man's meal," featuring Roast Beef, preceded by Borsht and always accompanied by Yorkshire Pudding. Or it might be such a repast as he was enjoying when our photographer caught him in the studio commissary. This particular luncheon consisted of Southern Fried Chicken, Hashed Browned Potatoes and a bottle of milk. But I reminded him that the foods he would recommend doubtless would be tried out by our readers in August, and then, like any sensible person, Mr. Eddy quickly revised his suggestions by discarding the more substantial fare he had first spoken about, in favor of dishes that would be more sure of a welcome in hot weather, both from the standpoint of the cook and the diner. So, instead of roasts and potatoes, pies and such, Nelson advised me to get from his cook a good vegetable recipe and some salad suggestions. Then as a parting admonition he told me not to fail to collect from the head of the Eddy culinary department a recipe for the Pineapple Upside-Down Sponge Cake, which is a great favorite of Mr. Eddy's the year 'round. All of which suggestions I hurried to carry out, with the happy result that I am able to hand on some slick recipes to you.

Let's see, then, what Nelson, himself, likes to eat in hot weather. Well there's a special green vegetable dish—a new way to cook one of the most popular vegetables of them all, green peas. There's a substantial one-plate meal consisting of potato salad and cold cuts with special garnishes to make this simple-sounding idea evolve into something really pretty special.

There's a flavorsome Seafood

Nelson's favorite one-plate dish of salad and cold cuts.

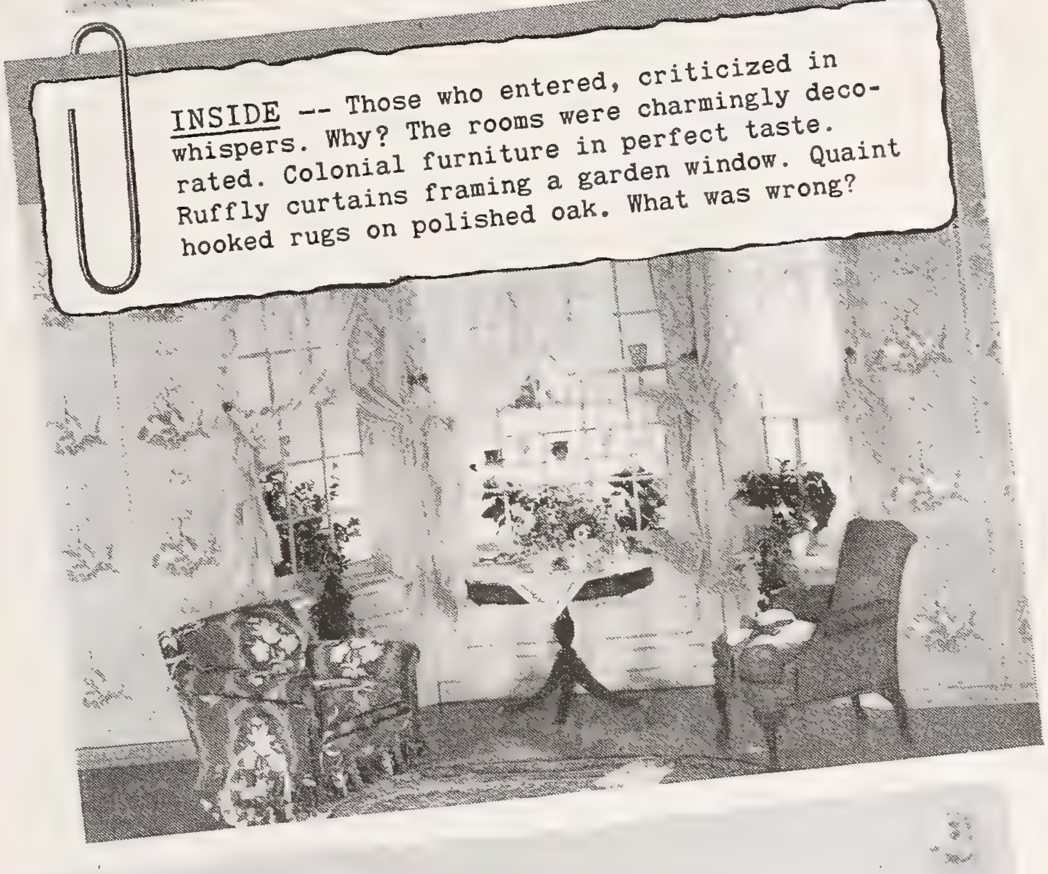
Why not pep up your summer meals with dishes Nelson Eddy dotes on?

Cocktail Sauce that turns out to be quite as good when used as a salad dressing as it is when served with the first-course cocktail. Be sure to try it even if you cannot get fresh seafood, because it's equally good with the canned variety. And now that we have come to recognize the existence of a so-called "goiter-belt," we realize more than ever before the value, in the diets of inland inhabitants, of seafoods with their high iodine content, which act as an anti-goiter aid. Canned seafoods, such as salmon and tuna, also add the feature of economy to their other qualities. I cannot imagine a more welcome, more easily prepared, or more tempting dish on a hot day than a good Salmon Salad, and served with Nelson Eddy's favorite sauce, it becomes something to rave about.

There is also a molded Gelatin Salad recipe on page 64. If you think that this type of salad isn't as popular with the menfolk as with the ladies, then try that Ginger Ale Salad recipe—as given on page 64—a guaranteed favorite of Nelson Eddy's. It turns out to have a very pale green and gold color scheme that is cooling just to look at. And the gingerale gives it a tang and zest that makes it really distinctive. Mr. Eddy, his cook informed me, likes it in place of dessert, frequently.

But not always! For, you'll recall, a Pineapple Upside-Down Cake also came in for honorable mention. Be sure to try this recipe. And don't mislay this magazine before you have secured a copy of this recipe for future use. I think you will find it more convenient if you keep any recipe you like on a regulation filing card. Then it will fit into your kitchen card-index recipe file. Please turn to page 64 for Nelson Eddy's Favorite Recipes.

OUTSIDE -- Everybody stopped to admire. Here was a lovely dream cottage. White stone and shingle, gleaming in the sunshine. Lacy evergreens before deep-set windows. Two tall elms standing guard on the lawn. But...



INSIDE -- Those who entered, criticized in whispers. Why? The rooms were charmingly decorated. Colonial furniture in perfect taste. Ruffly curtains framing a garden window. Quaint hooked rugs on polished oak. What was wrong?

ANSWER -- The loveliest home can be spoiled by tattle-tale gray in your curtains and linens -- that dingy color that shows they aren't really clean. So why use lazy soaps? Change to Fels-Naptha! It brings you richer golden soap and lots of naptha to loosen dirt thoroughly and wash it all away. It makes linens, curtains and all your clothes so beautifully fresh and snowy they add charm to your home instead of spoiling it. Get a few golden bars today and see how easy it is to...

Banish "tattle-tale gray" with Fels-Naptha Soap!

Is Eleanor Powell Sorry?

into the strains of "You Are My Lucky Star." Everyone in the restaurant clapped hands for Eleanor.

Señor Ygorin was so delighted with this quaint American demonstration that he ordered champagne for the orchestra. Then he asked Eleanor what the music was. And learned for the first time that she was in the movies.

Somehow, that delighted Eleanor. That someone had actually wanted to know her, perfectly unaware that she was a movie star.

She did not go out much in New York, but when she did, it was usually with the young, darkly handsome Peruvian lawyer. Then she was taken ill, had a complete breakdown, was forced to drop out of "At Home Abroad."

Emmanuel Ygorin was in a panic of worry. She had a good doctor, but he wondered if he could not get her a better one, the best one in the world. There were rumors of possible blood transfusions. He begged to be the donor, if there were any transfusions.

He was supposed to go back to Peru. He delayed his departure until he saw her convalescing. Behind him in New York, he left some relatives. At his behest, they called on the Powells, sent Eleanor flowers constantly, did everything possible for her, cabled him about her.

Then, at last recovered, she returned to Hollywood to make "Born to Dance." And cable offices in Los Angeles began to receive cablegrams from Peru, bearing the cable address: ELESWEET. Checking, they discovered that a wealthy gentleman from Peru paid the cablegram company to have such an address, which, decoded, would stand for: Eleanor Powell,—Bedford Drive, Beverly Hills, California.

And all this happened without the knowledge of Broadway, Hollywood or even Peruvian correspondents. It might have remained a secret indefinitely, if an outsider hadn't been present when one of the cablegrams arrived. Then the story came out. And, immediately, romance rumors about Eleanor and "a wealthy Peruvian admirer" were rampant. For Eleanor had led, up to date, a life singularly devoid of rumors.

I checked into them. And I have an amazing story to tell you—a story that reveals Eleanor in a new light, a story that reveals the amazing girl behind the dancing star.

"I'm very fond of him, as a friend. I'm not thinking of marrying," she told me, her blue eyes looking straight at me. "I'm not in love.

"I've never had the time to fall in love—or even to be sorry that I haven't. And it's a bit ironic, too." She smiled cheerfully. "I'm one of the youngest stars at the studio. I'm supposed to be the peppy bachelor girl—always out for a good time. Dances, parties, moonlight auto rides, sodas at the corner drug store, and all the rest of it. And I've still to do the kind of playing that most girls do at sixteen!

"I've never had the time. . . .

DON'T look so worried; I'm not going to give a year-by-year account of my life again. I've had to tell it enough times, goodness knows. But if I hadn't been a self-conscious youngster, and if my mother hadn't taken me to a dancing school to get me used to being with other children, and if I hadn't gone crazy about dancing after five lessons, and if I hadn't been determined to make something of myself as a dancer—well, I wouldn't be telling this story now.

"Work is play to me. And I'm not sorry—yet. I want to get that point across. I've had a good time, in my own way. A swell time.

"I'm too excited about my work to be happy doing anything else. You wouldn't want to be sorry about that, would you? And it's been that way as long as I can remember. Sometimes, I wonder how much longer it will be that way."

Eleanor had hurt her foot two days before, which explained why she was at home now. I asked her how the accident had happened.

"I was doing a comedy number with George Murphy and Buddy Ebsen in a box-car for 'Broadway Melody of 1937.' The box-car is a rolling stable for a couple of race horses. We do a trick dance that winds up with us dancing on big brushes and kicking them off. The camera crew was right in front of me. I was afraid I'd hurt somebody if I kicked the brushes off forward, so I tried to kick them backward."

Only Eleanor would think of something like that. No wonder the studio workers call her "The Sweetheart of M-G-M!"

"The right one caught and tripped me. I sprained my ankle and one of my toes. I had a nurse tape it up and then I went on; but that night my foot was so swollen that I couldn't even step on it. It's the first time anything like that has happened to me—where's some wood?—and my legs aren't insured, either. I don't know how much it will delay the picture. We thought we'd get some of the dances out of the way before Robert Taylor came back from another studio to play opposite me. The studio has told me to stay at home and rest until my foot is completely well.

"And here it is, the second day, and I'm fuming with restlessness. I've never been idle before, never missed a day of dancing—except when I had that breakdown. And I don't like it. I feel as if I'm losing time. Though I suppose the enforced idleness will be good for me."

The doctor ordered three weeks' complete rest. One week later, Eleanor was hobbling back on the set!

WHEN I'm working, I have to be up at a quarter of six, to limber up for the day's work. I'm in bed at nine-thirty because I'm exhausted. And when I have days off, instead of going away on a trip somewhere, I'm so tired that I have to stay home to store up energy for what's ahead.

"Yet I get home from the studio, after doing a number all day and say to Mother, 'I think I'll do that number once more.' I do it, right then and there. And I'm thinking about it all during dinner.

"Mother says my dinner doesn't do me any good because I'm thinking of all the time it's taking. The doctor told her the other day, 'You've got to get five more pounds on this girl,' and she just threw up her hands.

"Sometimes, I think, 'I'd like to give up all this.' That sounds silly, probably, in just those words. Sounds like the star too-too-tired-of-it-all, complaining about her luck. I don't mean it that way.

"I'm quite sure that I shall always dance. But some day I'd like to dance just to amuse myself, without worrying whether or not anyone else will like what I'm doing."

Does she feel that she has missed something along the way to success?

"No. Because I wouldn't have what I do have, today, if I hadn't been willing to pass up a few things. Sports, for example.

"I've never been able to go horseback-riding because I've always had the thought, 'If the horse threw me, and I broke my ankle, I'd never have flexibility again. I couldn't do that ripple of taps that I've worked years to perfect.'"

"I haven't been able to play tennis. I have to give my heart a rest. It's overtaxed already by my dancing. I have to watch it constantly.

"If I went out for tennis, I'd give everything to it. That's me: a one-track mind. And energy plus. When I get into a thing, it's to see how far I can go in it.

"I would have been a swimmer if I hadn't been a dancer—and I would have worked to be a champion. I don't dabble, when I get an interest. I put everything I have into it. Particularly if it's competitive.

"I get letters from ambitious girls, trying to be dancers, saying, 'Gee, I hope I can be a big success.' If they ever read this, they'll probably ask, 'Gee, what's the sense of living—if you can't do anything but work?'

"And all I can answer is that work has its own peculiar compensations, entirely apart from fame or money. There is a satisfaction in accomplishment, especially creative accomplishment, that tops anything play can offer. I'm pretty sure of that."

But hasn't this concentration on work taken some rare will power?

There is no false modesty about Eleanor. "I have wonderful will power, if I do say so myself. Maybe too good. If I had to do anything, I could do it. If I had to stop anything, I could do that, too. Dieting, for example. If I were told to diet—there isn't much danger, but let's suppose—I could conquer this ravenous appetite of mine."

She dipped, for emphasis, into the bulging bowl of popcorn on the coffee table in front of us.

"This will power—which, by the way, has kept me from falling in love—came from working very young. That can't help but develop character and a sense of responsibility, particularly when a person has absolute freedom to choose what he will do. Which I had. I wasn't forced to work. My mother told me, when the choice between school and career came up, 'Eleanor, you can do what you want to do—but once you make your choice, I'll expect you to stick to it, to prove you meant it.' I can't let Mother down, or my grandfather and grandmother. They've believed in me so. And not wanting to let somebody down who believes in you has so much to do with your coming through.

"That sounds idealistic. It is idealistic. I wouldn't have got very far without some ideals, some pretty high ideals. I still have them—thank heaven. Nobody has shattered them. All my years in show business haven't made me cynical. I've kept right on living, you see, in a private world of trying to improve, of trying to be well-liked by everyone."

But, getting back to romance—or romances—

I'VE had far less than the usual girl. Oh, I've had 'conquests'; everyone on the stage has those, flirting across the footlights. But not anything to touch the heart. Yes, I've had some embarrassing moments because I hate to hurt anyone's feelings. There were boys who cared, and I couldn't hurt them by saying, straight out, I didn't. For, once you meet a fine, clean boy, who is attracted to you because you don't drink or pet or know all the latest smutty stories, and he wants to continue the companionship—well, it can become serious if you continue, too."

I reminded her that when she first went East to play in "At Home Abroad," she was briefly engaged to Abe Lyman, the orchestra leader. I asked her how that had happened.

She smiled. "I don't know. It must have been part of the excitement of getting back to New York. Or I must have been in a daze. I like Abe; always have and probably always will. But I don't know, now, what made either of us think it was a romance. We didn't have the illusion very long, if you remember.

"But, seriously, I've always had my work and my family to occupy my thoughts. When I haven't had work to think about, I've had my family—a swell family.

"Very few people could live as I do, probably, and enjoy life.

"People ask me, 'But don't you ever go out?' I wonder sometimes why any boys ever take the trouble to come around. Johnny Payne, for example—a grand boy. He's coming over this afternoon to see me, though I warned him that Myrna Loy has loaned me her hairdresser to experiment with some new coiffures, and we'll be experimenting this afternoon. And Jack La Rue says, 'Eleanor, if I get to be fifty, I'll wait to take you out just once.' Jimmy Stewart hasn't seen me much since he stopped working with me."

It all comes back to that little matter of time.

"I work under terrific pressure—physical and mental. A dramatic actress, when she gets through one scene, has nothing to worry about except her make-up, her clothes, and her lines for the next scene. I have lines to rehearse, too, and make-up to repair, and clothes changes. And then, on top of those responsibilities, countless others. But I seem to thrive on them.

"I have to make sure that my shoes are completely broken in. I have to be sure that I am completely limber. I have to remember complicated routines, and try to improve on them if I can. If I do an hour of ballet, I have to do an hour of tap afterward, and vice versa, to equalize the effect on the muscles. I have to be thinking ahead not only to the next scene, but the next sequence, the next picture. I have to be generating ideas, day in, day out. Nobody else can do that for me. I've developed my own style, my own technique. It's individual: And the only way I can keep it individual and spontaneous, is to create all my steps myself.

"When I came back from this last vacation—they called it 'a vacation,' but I called it 'having two impacted wisdom teeth out'—the studio said, 'Just tell us what you want, in preparing for "Broadway Melody," and we'll give it to you.' And do you know what my answer was? 'All I want is time. Just give me time, and I won't ask anything else. Time, so that I won't be working under pressure'."

Yet she likes the business. She loves it. She isn't sorry that, to date, it has made her miss romance.

"I won't miss it forever. But as much as I like dancing, I'll never marry and try to keep on working. Some girls could do it, but I couldn't. When I work, I work too hard, have to create too much to have time to think of anything else.

"When I do marry, I want my marriage to be as important as my work has been. And I think my will power—I've a lot of faith in that will power—will keep me from falling in love with a man who hasn't some driving ambition, himself, a passion for achievement."

She paused, and added, "When I have time to fall in love. . . ."

vitally important to me as a person.

"I did go to New York from Philadelphia because I was stagestruck. I had been manager of several Woolworth stores, and I'd saved eighteen-hundred dollars. I was twenty-three when I stood in Times Square and stared at all those bright lights. I swore my name would be up there soon.

"Well, it wasn't. I worked for Eva LeGallienne for a few months. I lived in Greenwich Village. And, frankly, I was disillusioned. I hadn't suspected how much groundwork there is to acting. The tinsel was torn off pretty abruptly. I'm a moody cuss and when I'm through, I'm through. So I quit the stage.

"I still had quite a bit of my savings, however, so I enjoyed life. New York was so gay. It was a constant whirl of excitement. But then I was thumped to earth by the sad state of my finances. I was broke.

"Singing on the radio was my next goal, but I didn't get far. They declared my baritone voice was worth twenty programs a week. They'd pay me sixty-five dollars for them, providing I paid for a fifteen-piece orchestral accompaniment. So you want to be a crooner? That's the proposition I bumped into!

"Luckily for me, I also bumped into James Montgomery Flagg. He hired me to pose for his magazine illustrations. So I moved to the Barbizon-Plaza and lurked on the fringe of luxury.

"I had a swell address and enough good clothes for all the parties I rated invitations to. I took tests for almost every picture company, but nothing happened. Then, finally, personal affairs became complicated. That's why I came West.

IT seems that a friend of mine had been slandered, and I resented it bitterly. On the night I'll never forget, I was invited to a party by those whom I'd taken it upon myself to chasten. I went. I took but two short drinks. Next thing I was lying quite literally in the subway.

"When I scrambled to my feet I was unsteady, of course. You'd be, too, if you'd been playing Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model in that up-to-date fashion! I had no memory of what had happened, no conception of how I'd got there. I called up to the guards on the platform and told them I'd been under the weather and had fallen off the platform.

"But when I awoke next morning I did a little checking. I found out that I hadn't been the slightest bit tipsy. I realized that if I had been I couldn't have become positively sober so quickly. I believe that I was doped. I believe, and only my hunch and the apparent evidence could back me up in this, that I was doped and pushed over onto those tracks on purpose!"

"Nice friends you had," I interrupted.

"Yes," said Mike succinctly. There was tenseness in the room as the implication of the episode gripped us.

"That was the final straw. All around me were trouble and blasted dreams. To go on being brutally candid, I had a suicide complex for a spell. I appreciated Mr. Flagg's giving me work, but posing for sketches is hardly satisfactory to a man. I was defeated by the city.

"By noon, on that morning after, I had resolved to tackle Hollywood. While none of my screen tests had been profitable, the fact that I'd been considered by nearly every company encouraged me. It showed I had some possibilities. Hollywood was far away; it was a plunge into new surroundings.

"I borrowed some money and came West by boat to New Orleans and then by day coach, sitting up nights on the train.

"When I arrived I phoned a friend who had a room on Selma Avenue, a block below the Boulevard. I moved in with him."

Mike's rent was three-fifty a week, and he was glad of that when it began to appear that he was in for a long struggle. Mr. Flagg had given him a letter of introduction to Hollywood's foremost actors' agency. It was suggested that he stand by while a studio was informed of his availability. After two weeks Mike inquired about warming up at the Pasadena Community Playhouse. Unfortunately, it's all glory at Pasadena and no wages.

However, after doing two plays there, Mike's good looks and genial manner rescued him from the pangs of frustration. He met Sylvia Sidney, Sari Maritza and her manager, Vivian Gaye, and they particularly encouraged him. Mike was the import who added zest to every party, a handsome devil who was sure to get going professionally.

ONLY he didn't. The biggest agency was too big to bother with him after all. So he became an anxious client for another agency, which assured him of a splendid film contract just around the corner. In the meantime he was to wait. He wasn't to work as an extra, for that would be a blow to his prestige.

"I was invited out nearly every evening and that was a godsend. But when my money had given out and my roommate had been carrying the expenses for a month or more, once more I was blue.

"I was saved by the revival of my sense of humor. Socially, I was having a great time. My agent counselled me to wait. But I was getting nowhere, and life seemed a horrible joke on me. You can't go on laughing at empty pockets forever, you know. So one night I went into the bathroom and turned on the gas. As I was lying on the floor, I got to thinking what a mess I was making for the landlady. Then it struck me as a silly procedure. Maybe the gas in Hollywood is sweeter than the gas in New York—it was too sickening! I got dizzy and then my sense of humor miraculously dashed to the rescue. What a picture I was making, one no artist could sketch!"

Of course, what really saved Mike for success was his tremendous valor. It's the brand that will take slap after slap and still bear up. What he went through illustrates what I mean.

He and his pal moved to a thirty-dollar a-week apartment, on his agent's advice. His chum had a car, and Mike tried to compensate by doing the cooking. Gradually there was less talk of a regular contract; the agent said he'd try to get Mike in at a major studio, on a stock contract which would provide dramatic training. Next day the agent phoned that they had said no, without even looking him over.

"It was then I began to understand that you have to fight for yourself to get ahead. You can't depend upon others. I'd met B. P. Fineman, the producer, socially. He gave me a letter of introduction to Ben Piazza, an important casting director. Piazza evidently thought I looked better than I sounded, for he put me into the studio's school.

"A contract's no guarantee of opportunity, though! During my entire year at this studio I was never once cast in a single role." He studied under Oliver Hinsdale, the studio's coach. And Hinsdale told a friend of Mike's that it would be an act of charity to tip the lad off to his absolute hopelessness as an actor.

How much courage would you have left if an authority classified you thus?

Then, at the end of the year, Mike was called to the front office. "You have everything it takes to click in pictures but stamina. We have to make room for some newcomers, so we'll have to let you go temporarily." He knew what that meant. He didn't bother to give his backbone a build-up, say that he had been working as a common laborer on the night shift on another lot to afford his attendance at school! No pluck? He merely studied at one studio all day and then put in eight hours sweeping and tearing down scenery at another.

He dropped out of the party whirl when he went to work as an ordinary laborer. "So long as I was a potential success, it seemed to me all right to accept the hospitality of the big people; but when I was emphatically a nobody I preferred not to.

LITTLE theatres became my Mecca. I acted in every amateur play I could get into. They paid nothing but experience."

However, two of the friends whom he'd known when he was a newcomer never lost faith in him. Sari Maritza and Vivian Gaye appreciated his battle. "When my clothes were all worn out, and I hadn't anything decent to wear, Vivian got me two suits that Randy Scott, then Vivian's husband, was ready to give away.

"Three years ago this July Fourth I had a marvelous part in a show. There were only twelve people in the audience, and the cast, discouraged by that reception and pepped up by the holiday as an excuse to celebrate, celebrated in liquid style. They were all angry with me because I wouldn't take a drink. But I had a part and I was going to act it to the hilt. After the show I received a caller, the manager of the stock company in Vancouver. He hired me."

When he returned from Canada he worked in "Common Flesh," a play by Jim Timmony, Mae West's manager. Mae came to the dress rehearsal and her verdict was, "Kill it—it's lousy. But sign that man, Whalen!" However, Mr. Timmony wanted the pleasure of seeing his drama in action. And who should turn up at the opening but a Darryl Zanuck scout! The next night Zanuck went down to watch him act. The direct consequence was a long-term contract, with Mike debuting in a lead.

"I never expected to make another picture," Mike vows. He'd plugged for so long that skyrocketing was a fantastic reality. But it wasn't luck that had made him choose to say no when his fellow amateurs were disregarding their duty to their audience by drinking.

"I'm going to keep on learning to be a good actor, if it takes me forty years," he maintains. "But since 'success' what, you ask. Well, steady work. The thrill that comes from doing what you enjoy doing as best you can. Applause. Money.

"But there are catches to these awards. I like to go to parties, but I rarely go out any more, for what's the use if you can't be yourself? Whatever I do is commented upon. When you're a leading man, instead of a would-be, you're gossiped about if you sit peacefully at home. So I don't dare do this or that for fear someone will criticize. Financially, I'm much better off, of course. But I haven't been able to save any money yet. I'm not earning a great deal. I've brought my mother and two sisters West to live with me, and I'm supporting them. Buying clothes for three gals and buying a more-than-average priced car—that's my dissipating with my surplus funds.

"I'm not in love. Someday, after my family is cared for, I intend to marry, but I don't want to seem like a shop-worn Romeo to the girl who gives me a break. So I dislike having romance rumors flung foolishly on the breeze. I get more kick out of buying a girl friend and myself two sips of sherry for fifteen cents than I do out of parading to the Trocadero and tasting expensive champagne and wondering if I'm partially living up to what a leading man's supposed to be. I haven't met Garbo, my favorite. I haven't even caught a glimpse of her.

"What I want now is a little ranch, where I can putter around and ride—and have a sailboat.

"When I was doing 'Wee Willie Winkie,' the location at Chatworth was somehow familiar. Gradually, it dawned on me that four years ago I had been on the same spot. Then I'd been pushing lion cages into position for Buster Crabbe to disport himself as 'King of the Jungle.'"

She's Taking It Easy

When the picture was finished she followed one rushing habit that still clings to her. She lost no time in having her hair restored to its natural dark brown. The cameramen insist on having it a few shades lighter when she is working, but the minute she is on her own she rushes to a hairdresser.

"It's a good thing I have hair that will stand it, for I'm continually changing it back and forth from light to dark," she commented with no hint of complaint in her voice, although her hair is one of the things about which she is very particular. Professional hairdressers don't get much of her money, for it is washed by her personal maid and arranged by Claudette herself. Sometimes the process takes more than an hour, while engagements wait, for she painstakingly winds each curl around her finger and, according to a friend, "fixes her bangs and fusses until she drives me crazy." According to this same friend and by Claudette's own admission, it is almost axiomatic that she is just never on time.

WATCHING her while she talked I wondered what had brought about this change of mental attitude. Could it be due entirely to her happy marriage? Was it a natural sequence following the steady success of her career; a sense of financial security or perhaps a combination of all three? She told me.

"Experience taught me to relax," she said thoughtfully. "Of course the combination of perfect happiness, of having made a few good pictures and the feeling that I am financially secure, has allowed me to put what I learned into practice. Unpleasant experiences as a result of rushing headlong into things helped a lot.

"There was the time I was going to Honolulu to make a picture. The day the company sailed I had to go to the hospital for an emergency appendectomy. For some reason that picture seemed very important to me, and with my last breath before I went under the anaesthetic, I declared I would take the next boat and join the company. I did!"

I recalled the wire she sent the director the day following her operation, which read: "You'd be surprised how fast I recuperate. Wait for Baby."

Actually, she walked four days following her operation and ten days later she took the boat for Honolulu. Most of her scenes in the picture showed her in a swamp up to her neck. She risked her health, if not her life, and the finished picture, to quote Claudette, "was a Lulu!"

"That was once when I should have taken my time," she laughed, "but definitely."

She took her time about making up her mind to marry Dr. Joel Pressman. Indeed, she kept an interested world-at-large, as well as her fiance, on pins and needles for months until she made her decision. And after a year she is enthusiastically happy.

Perhaps now she could give the interview one editor asked her for, the day following her marriage, on the subject of "Why Second Marriages Are Successful." At that time she displayed caution and a rare sense of humor when she wired her reply to the editor. It was terse and to the point and read: "How should I know?"

Marrying a man who is tops in his profession as she is in hers, a man whose career is one she can look up to, has helped to make it one of Hollywood's successful marriages. His work has become of tremendous importance to her. She takes the keenest interest in it, not only because it is fascinating to her of itself, but because it is where his interest lies. She takes pride, as any womanly woman does, in the achievement of the man she loves. And says quietly: "His work is so much more important than mine."

In order to give herself a personal life, which few stars are able to manage, Claudette has reduced her professional life to three pictures a year.

For, "What's the hurry?" she asked.

I COULD have used some delay to advantage when I built my house, too," she suddenly remembered. "Oh, I've had my lessons. I didn't learn to proceed cautiously all in a minute, or from hearing that song about taking your time. I've had experience.

"Naturally when I decided to build, I got an architect to draw up the plans. He made blue prints. Everything was down on paper or, rather, on the blue prints, and it all sounded fine. But, of course, I couldn't read a blue print and when I saw the house, it wasn't anything like what I had visualized. I had most of it made over entirely."

Claudette wasn't planning to marry at the time she built the house, and considerable remodeling had to be done to accommodate a man. "But not too much," she added. "I did my bedroom a little differently than I had intended. Instead of having it all satin and ruffles, I used chintzes. And made another bathroom out of a dressing-room.

"Another thing I am doing over right now is the playhouse. It seemed to me a good idea to build it away from the house. I had a projection machine down there, but when we wanted to run a picture it was like getting dressed to go downtown. During the rainy weather we had to stop and bundle up, and, if we had guests, we had to ask them to put on their boots and take a hike.

"Now I'm having the library, two guest-rooms and a small powder-room thrown into one large room and the projection machine moved in there. I'm also going to add a nursery and put it away like a hope chest," she added.

Asked if she were going to have need for a nursery, she replied: "Oh, certainly. I hope so, some day."

Claudette is never written up in the gossip columns. Big parties, cafe life and crowds never appealed to her, and recently she has been seen less and less at places haunted by the film crowd. Not that she has become a recluse. Far from it! She hasn't changed in a manner that you would notice. She is just as full of fun; just as much the prankster and has just as grand a sense of humor as ever, but she seems to demand more leisure in which to enjoy life. She likes to read the new French plays in French. And to lean over the back fence and talk with her neighbor, Irene Dunne. Tennis being her favorite game, she gets in a few sets almost every day.

It's a mental attitude, this taking-it-easy business, she thinks, and something that each individual must learn for himself.

"You can preach it to people, but preaching does no good," she said seriously. "The whole theory in a nutshell is," she concluded, "that there's no use rushing the present to get to the future, but each person must find that out for himself, of course."

Just then Dr. Pressman drove up in front of the door, ready to take her home. He leaned out and whistled—ever so softly—and I rose to go.

"Don't go," she urged cordially, "he's in no hurry."

● "Gee, I'd hate to be you, Jocko! That get-up may be peachy for collecting pennies, but you couldn't hire me to wear it on a day like this. The prickly heat breaks right out on my neck to think of it!"

age you. For us budgeteers, the furriers have been working day and night on some new process that treats and dyes lapin until it is as pliable and alluring as the more expensive furs.

There never was a law that first Autumn outfits had to be black or brown, but from the predominance of sober hues in previous years, anyone might have assumed that there was. This year, it is all going to be different. Dress designers have been looking at Nature, and they have discovered that trees put on their most gorgeous display when Summer is over. It isn't the copper and henna and walnut shades that they have adopted for this year; it is the soft mauves, the rosy and yellow and mulberry shades that they have borrowed for Autumn woolens.

THE suit which Helen is wearing in the photographs on Page 40, is big fashion news. The material is a nubby, speckled wool of gray-beige cast, typical of the new woolens which are almost all rough-textured, as boucle or other knitted fabrics. Odd-shaped buttons crop up in all the Paris fashion news, and here is Omar Kiam leading the parade with cylinder buttons of gray suede. As for the shirtwaist it is of finest silk jersey of that shade of brick red that maple leaves take on in the first severe frost.

Hollywood and all the rest of the fashion world have been following the horse-races this year, and suddenly women have awakened to the stunning effect of jockey's brilliant-colored silk shirts. You will find the most vivid hues in blouses under the smartest suits this Fall and Winter.

A fashion detail that Helen particularly likes is the hat fashioned of the same fabric as the suit. She, like many of you, I am sure, has sought in vain other years to find a hat fabric that wasn't too smooth to harmonize with rough suitings. The only wholly satisfactory topper to a suit like this is a hat of the same material.

Before we leave the wealth of fashion hints that are to be found in "Vogues of 1938," just let me remind more mature readers that Hedda Hopper is in the picture, too, and wherever Hedda is, there is a whole course of lessons in what to wear and how to wear it.

Shorter, younger, giddier Rochelle Hudson is a fashion guide for a quite different type to follow. Such dignified and stately words as describe Helen Vinson, are discarded in favor of "Whee" when you attempt to catch the breezy spirit of Rochelle's favorite dresses. Rochelle is the dress-idol of the gadabout college girls who want to make a knockout impression. Here is a wise bit of counsel from Rochelle. When you shift from Summer dresses to Fall fashions, and she is in favor of doing it abruptly even before the weather is chilly, go definitely, alluringly feminine! You've been wearing slacks and shorts and classic sports dresses, and soon you will be wearing boxy coats and tailored suits, so take advantage of the Summer-into-Fall interim as an opportunity to wear blithely-graceful, artfully pretty dresses. Her daytime dress shown in the photograph is of the new crepe called heartbeat. It is Coronation blue. I am sure it is wonderful news to all the gray and blue-eyed girls that this year fashion dictators have relented and are really going to show a great deal of blue as a Fall and Winter color.

Frankly-feminine accents that make this dress merit the old, but always good, classification of "beau-catcher," are the short, puffed sleeves, the puffed and shirred band, uptilted in center front that forms the girdle, the snug-hipped and slightly-flaring skirt. With this dress Rochelle wears midnight-blue gloves and shoes and hat. And don't overlook the veil. Our breeziest moderns have whole-heartedly adopted this flagrant bit of coquetry.

Once when a saleswoman said to Rochelle, "Yes, I understand. You want a frock that is definitely not a sports dress," she replied, "Yes, I want one that is actually an anti-sports dress." Here you have it. And don't you think it would make the candid, open-faced, good pal of a Summer sports girl simply writhe with envy?

When you are shopping for clothes, regardless of the season, here is a tip from Rochelle that will prove valuable to you. Study every dress you try on both in repose and in movement. Often dresses that look charming when you stand still have an awkward swing when you walk or reach for the high step of a running board or bus step. Make sure that every dress you buy has enough fullness for free movement, and that it follows your every move gracefully and dramatically.

The dance dress that makes her look like the portrait of a reigning belle is one she wears in "She Had to Eat." Very subtly it combines the most flattering fashions of Colonial times and tomorrow's fashion dispatch. The deep off-shoulder neckline, the huge wallpaper flower print, were favorites of the alternately demure and bold heroines of Washington's time. But the clips and necklace and the skirt that is full without being bunchy is decidedly the mark of an ultra-modern designer.

THERE has been no end of controversy over whether dance dresses should have short or long skirts. Some of the new, short ballerina-skirted dance dresses are flattering, and there is no doubt that it is refreshing to see girls dance without fear of stepping on their skirts. It is still the girl in the long, flowing dress, however, who makes the most dramatic entrance. It is still the frankly pictur esque gown that makes of every evening party a great occasion.

If your long-skirted evening dress is made of taffeta, as this is, you won't have much trouble dancing in it. It billows out crisply as you float across the dance floor. The color, incidentally, is blue—a mauve blue background with roses of deeper blue and pink.

For the girl going away to college, for the girl whose whole Winter of fun is apt to depend on the impression she makes at the first big dance of the season, there couldn't be a wiser choice than this dress. Even if she had a whole closetful of other evening dresses, she would want to wear this one again and again.

Pulling ourselves away from the glamorous possibilities of just the right evening dress to the practicalities of every day, let's take a look at the coat Sonja Henie is wearing. If you are going out shopping for one grand coat that will see you through all occasions of Fall and Winter, I'd advise you to take this picture along with you. You will never find another coat as versatile as this one. The fur bolero is detachable, which makes it just right to wear over dresses on earliest Fall days. A little later, about the time the first football games come around, the full-length cloth coat can be worn without

"Now there's a girl who KNOWS HER WAY AROUND"

"THAT girl has something."

"And plenty of it. I've seen prettier girls and known smarter ones, but Janet will manage nicely with what she has."

The girl who knows her way around men—what is her secret?

It's the happy art of pleasing, of taking care always to consider masculine likes and dislikes.

She knows that one of the things men admire most in a girl is a fresh, sweet daintiness of person. And that they dislike nothing more than the odor of underarm perspiration on her clothing and person.

And so she takes no chances. For she knows it is easy to avoid—with Mum!

Takes only half a minute. Just half a minute is all you need to use this dainty deodorant cream. Then you're safe for the whole day!

Harmless to clothing. Another thing you'll like—use Mum any time, even after you're dressed. For it's harmless to clothing.

Soothing to skin. It's soothing to the skin, too—so soothing you can use it right after shaving your underarms.

Doesn't prevent natural perspiration. Mum, you know, doesn't prevent natural perspiration. But it does prevent every trace of perspiration odor. And how important that is! Remember—nothing so quickly kills a man's interest in a girl as disagreeable perspiration odor. Don't risk it—use Mum regularly, every day. Bristol-Myers Co., 630 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

takes the odor out of perspiration

the fur. It is a lovely warm shade of toast-brown duvetyn, trim and plain in its outlines, as befits a very young girl with a tendency to be a little well rounded in figure.

Later on in the season when Winter winds really get seriously down to work, you can wear the coat with the bolero. And how grateful you will be for the added warmth around your shoulders.

Now some of you bright girls, who think fast while you are reading, are going to object that a cloth coat suitable for early Fall would certainly not be warm enough for blizzardy weather, even with the addition of a fur bolero. You're wrong. Inventors in the dress trades have recently devised some wonderful interlining materials that act like magic. They are neither warm, nor heavy; in fact, you won't know there is an interlining in mild weather. Then when piercing winds come, you don't feel them. Wind and cold simply cannot penetrate through these new interlinings which have so little bulk that they can be used in the trimmest, slimmest coats. One of the new interlinings is a fabric that looks and feels like chamois skin. Another is the fine snow cloth that was developed for use in ski suits last Winter.

There is a lot of fur trimming used on the new Winter coats and suits, the newest innovation being a wide, full peplum of fur on an early Fall suit. The girl who dresses on a budget has not been overlooked by the style dictators, though. Fur fabrics, wonderfully contrived to have a distinct character of their own, are used on many Winter fashions. These fabrics don't pretend to be fur. They are not a cheap imitation of something else; they are lustrous and beautiful, deep-piled fabrics that anyone could be proud of. Fingertip jackets of these various heavy-pile fabrics are just as flattering as those of fur. Another fabric that is encroaching on the domain of fur as trimming is heavy velvet. Two-piece dresses of plaid hairy-wool skirts, or checked rough wool with velvet jackets are going to be the costume that takes many a girl smartly dressed through the transition days from Summer into real Autumn.

Out of all the maze of new fashions that will be launched in these next few weeks, the details that are important are, first of all, vivid, warm colorings; next, front fullness in your skirts; waistlines are a little lower, skirts a little shorter and backs of bodices have just as many clever details of fitting and fastening as you are accustomed to see in front-fastened dresses. All the new fabrics, with the exception of duvetyn and velvet, have rough, uneven texture. Some are made of thick and thin yarn; some have the meshy basket weave; some have silky rabbit's hair woven in to give a furry surface, but all have an uneven, pebbly surface. The better to make your skin look soft and satiny, my dears.

Bing Grows Up

She still can't quite get used to the idea," laughed Bing, "that one of her boys is one of those things called 'an actor.'

"That's the way I was brought up and that's the way I am. Why," said Bing, "even crooning is old-fashioned, really. It's as old as civilization. In the old days they called us troubadours, or maybe just caterwaulers. Anyway, there's nothing new about it.

"I'm old-fashioned and I like old-fashioned ways and old-fashioned girls. I always did. A fellow, when he is very young, may take the flashy type of girl out for a good time, but he still hopes to marry one who can cook a good dinner and be handy with a brace of babies. I still feel kind of queer when I see girls smoking. I should be used to it. If I had ever seen my mother smoking, I would have thought the world had turned over on its ear. Why, she doesn't even allow my two sisters to smoke now, and they're both married women. It's only recently that my brothers and I have dared to smoke in front of her. And she's just got around to admitting that a glass of wine isn't death and destruction. You don't get away from training like that," Bing said. "I never have."

THIS mild-mannered young man of few words is not "just a crooner" today. He is a husband and a father. He is, also, one of the most successful business men in Hollywood. A suite of offices on his studio lot are lettered, "BING CROSBY, LTD., INC." Within that suite of offices six people carry on the business which is Bing Crosby; the Select Music Corporation which publishes Bing's songs and the songs of others within the studio limits; his radio broadcasts and all the attendant business of the broadcasts; his picture contracts; his stables where horses are bred. He has recently formed a company along with Bill Le Baron and Leo McCary, to open a race-track at Del Mar.

His father handles his enormous fan mail. Bing is one of the few stars who, graciously and generously, sends photos out free. Bing's two brothers attend to all major matters, radio contracts, picture contracts, etc. Two secretaries carry on the minor details.

I watched him there on the set of "Waikiki Wedding." I had to look around before I could spot him. He's never in the foreground. He was smoking his pipe over in back of a group of extras. He was crooning "Bye, Bye, Blackbird" with Shirley Ross and Martha Raye. He was talking to the prop boys and the electricians. He picked up the script for the script girl when she dropped it.

I talked to the boys on the set while Bing changed his costume. They all agreed that Bing is the most undemanding star they have ever worked with. And they know. He has no personal vanity whatsoever. He goes about in old sweaters, tieless. And I had good reason to believe them when, a few nights later, I dropped in at NBC, while Bing was broadcasting. There he stood on the stage, the place jammed to the very walls, wearing a pair of brown trousers and a blue cotton shirt, open at the neck, swaying a little as he sang, as though he had just "run over from next door." Which is just exactly what he had done . . . come over from home just as he was.

He doesn't lunch in splendid isolation in his dressing-room. He doesn't even have a portable dressing-room on the set or so much as a chair, set apart and lettered, "Bing Crosby." He eats his lunches in the studio commissary, quite often at the counter—sometimes with Gary Cooper, George Raft, his brothers, or with Director Tuttle. He is never seen joshing with the girls. He is much more the "big brother" type with the girls in his pictures than the crooner or charmer.

I KNOW no story about Bing which so perfectly explains the kind heart of the man as this: A young woman had been writing Bing for years. Long, ardent, intelligent letters. She wrote that she was worried about herself. She feared that she was becoming a psychopathic case, for, preposterous as it might sound, Bing was wrecking her life. She couldn't make dates with the young men of her acquaintance because, whenever she did, she heard only Bing's voice; it haunted her and stood between her and reality. She realized how absurd she was, but the absurdity seemed to be more real than the tangible world around her. Eventually, she came to Hollywood to see Bing. Bing met her.

Did he pose and posture and romanticize himself, the more to inflame the inflammable heart of the girl? He did not. He showed her around the studio, wearing his old clothes. He emphasized the practical, workaday details of his work. He stripped off the glamor and showed her the grind beneath it. He took her home to dinner and introduced her to Dixie. Dixie, he explained, was the only girl he had ever gone out with in Hollywood. He put on carpet slippers, at home. He smoked his pipe. He and Dixie discussed the baby. Bing heard the baby's prayers. Bing hosed the front lawn. Bing ate too much at dinner. He was folksy and familiar as an old shoe. He was that girl's father and brother and the boy-next-door. And she went home, cured. She went home, Dixie and Bing's warm and grateful friend, as she is today. She went home cured of the fever in her veins, caused by the Crosby crooning and cured by the salty, kind good sense of Bing.

Bing doesn't like to go out partying. Once a month is his limit. Other nights he stays home, plays a card game called "Gin" with Dixie, puts out the lights at ten and is in bed at ten-thirty.

They still have old-fashioned Sunday dinners, as they had at home when sometimes twenty-five and never less than ten sat down at table. Now, on Sundays, there will be Bing's mother and father, brothers and their wives and thirteen Crosby grandchildren. It's fun to be at Uncle Bing's, the children declare, because Uncle Bing knows how to play with kids.

Bing sat on a platform covered with sand, on the set, as we talked. He said, "Yep, I'm old-fashioned, I guess. Sure, I spank the kids. They're bad actors, those three, and good paddy-whack wakes 'em up. I'm going to send them to public schools, too. Our ranch at Rancho Santa Fe is an attempt to get back to the family way of living. We raise our own vegetables and have an orchard large enough to give us fruit to preserve.

"I wouldn't stand for any of this husband-and-wife vacation stuff. When Dixie and I go off on vacations, we go together. No, I have no objection to Dixie working, if she wants to. It's almost old-fashioned by this time," laughed Bing, "for women not to work. I won't allow her to work Saturdays, Sundays or evenings. Working is all right, but none of this business of husband and wife going about alone. If I don't want to go to a preview or a party and Dixie does want to go, she goes with my brother, Larry, and his wife. Even then I tell Larry not to encourage her; I have hard enough work keeping her at home as it is.

"It's the kids I worry about," Bing said, blue eyes grave. "They haven't any need to wash dishes or mow lawns or hustle for fifty cents. Even if we made them go through the motions, they'd know they were just humoring the old man's quaint notions. It's harder to raise kids right when they have a silver spoon in their mouths than when they have no spoon at all," sighed Bing.

Deanna—Diminutive Diva

clear, bird-like voice singing a few notes.

"No, no, Deanna," the director interrupted. "Not that way. You must sing badly. You are supposed to be making fun of Binnie Barnes. Let's try it again."

"But if I do that, people will think that is the way I really sing," Deanna argued, on the verge of tears. "No one will believe I am a good singer."

She was finally convinced that singing a few notes incorrectly wouldn't give her audiences the wrong impression. Regardless of her first success as an actress, nothing to her is as important as her singing.

When the dramatic lessons, paid for by the studio, strained her voice, she refused to continue and said, "They'll have to take me as I am, without being an actress."

No doubt this decision had a great deal to do with her immediate success; for, next to her singing, her naturalness was one point the critics stressed in their reviews of the picture.

The next time I saw her, the picture was finished and had been previewed. Everyone immediately agreed that Deanna was, indeed, a wonder child.

She had been singing regularly on Eddie Cantor's radio program and had endeared herself to radio audiences, and it had been predicted that she would be a sensation in the picture. Mr. Cantor was going to New York for a few weeks and wanted Deanna to go along and broadcast from the East. It was decided that Deanna should not go to New York as a mere member of the program, but as a star in her own right. She was to be accompanied by her mother, her manager, Jack Sherrill, and her tutor. They were going to New York, Deanna told me, "to see the Statue of Liberty. I can't believe it is as big as they say," she added, confidentially.

She was less excited than anyone else over the trip, having expended most of her enthusiasm on a shopping tour the day before when two new coats, one fur and one cloth, had been added to her wardrobe. "But I'm going to get some clothes in New York," she told me. "I left them out purposely so I could shop there."

DEANNA'S arrival in New York was nothing short of triumphant. As she rode along on the train—her first lengthy trip—she could look out of the car window and see great signboards in every city covered with 24-sheets reading: "Orchids to you, Deanna Durbin!" There were newspapermen and cameramen at every station to interview her and photograph her. She was the center of attraction and had enough attention to turn the head of anyone, but while the attention of everyone else was riveted on Deanna, her whole interest was on the things she was going to see and do in the great City of New York.

"Being the center of attention is nothing new to Deanna," her sister told me. "I don't think she has ever been afraid of anyone in her life. She has always been the center of attraction, a fact which probably accounts for her unusual poise. She has entertained since she was a baby. As she grew older and was asked to sing in school and church affairs, she did it without fear."

Deanna isn't precocious in manner and not a bit the stage child. Certainly, she isn't impressed with her own importance. But neither is she impressed with the importance of anyone else. When she was introduced to Leopold Stokowski, the great conductor, who is co-starring with her in "100 Men and a Girl," she looked at him in a friendly but calm fashion and said, "Hello!" He returned her greeting in kind, and they had lunch together. He might have been an old friend. But afterward she displayed her real feelings when she said, "He is so wonderful, but why should I be afraid of him? He is just a human being."

Deanna adores her older, only sister, Florence, who insisted that the child had a voice when she was but five years old, and who, later, paid for Deanna's lessons with money she earned teaching school. Recently Florence got married, and Deanna was confronted with a major problem. Should she be her sister's bridesmaid, or should she sing at the wedding? It was vital to her to do both, she thought. She settled the matter by singing before the wedding and then running like mad out the side door of the church and reaching the bridal party in time to march up the aisle as a bridesmaid.

Probably Deanna will never forget the premiere of "The Good Earth," for, in addition to being the first opening she'd attended, it was the occasion when she wore her first long dress, a beautiful pink velvet. Thousands of ermines had sacrificed their lives to lend comfort and elegance to the occasion, to say nothing of the minks and sables. Even the street leading to the theatre was dressed in gala attire. The usual mob of enthusiastic fans was crowded outside the theatre, and each arrival brought forth its quota of "Ohs" and "Ahs" and "Oh, there's Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor."

Then, as though Fate had decreed it should be so, there was a slight pause in the arrivals before a shiny, new car drew up to the curb. From it stepped four grown people and a little girl in a pink velvet dress. The fans looked eagerly. One remarked, "Tourists, I guess," and the disappointed crowd relaxed. Suddenly, out of the momentary silence a shrill, young voice cried, "It's Deanna!"

Immediately the cry was taken up. The crowd screamed, waved and yelled unintelligible but reassuring comments. Not even the stars of the picture received such tribute. Little Deanna, with one picture to her credit, had arrived.

HER reaction to this reception endeared her to the crowd. She didn't seem embarrassed; neither did she appear too self-assured. She waved happily. She laughed and called out, "Hello, everybody!" Never once did she lose that poise which is as much a part of her as that happy smile.

It seemed to Deanna that Christmas was being prolonged into Spring. Her beautiful new car that her employer, Mr. Charles R. Rogers, had given her when she returned from New York; her first premiere and now this reception. She must be, she confided to her sister in a whisper, "the happiest girl in all the world."

After she had worn the dress a couple of times the thrill diminished, and she told her sister that she wasn't very fond of wearing grown-up clothes. But, according to her family, her favorite playthings at the age of three years were a pair of her sister's cast off, high-heeled shoes. For hours at a time she would clump and stumble around the house in those high heels, filling the family with misgivings at the dangers involved.

Strangely enough, Deanna has just as many fans among the grown-ups as she has among boys and girls her own age. Her fan mail has increased to such proportions that it can't be taken care of at home.

"Deanna tries to read it all," her mother told me, "but she hasn't time. A majority of the letters are from youngsters like herself, who write her all about themselves, their studies, their ambitions, and frequently they send her pictures of themselves. Deanna wants to answer every letter, but it is a physical impossibility, and she wants these boys and girls to know that it isn't neglect on her part that delays an acknowledgment of their letters."

Although she scarcely has time to think of them, she misses her former schoolmates just the same. Her mornings are spent with her tutor; her afternoons are more than filled with fittings, rehearsals for her Sunday broadcasts, make-up, learning new songs, experiments with new styles of hairdress and every afternoon at three o'clock a singing lesson.

She sees few motion pictures because of the lack of free evenings and, in short, Deanna is beginning to understand that with fame come responsibilities. The greatest drawback to her sudden popularity, she feels, is that she must give interviews.

"They ask me so many questions," she complained recently. But realizing that publicity is necessary to her career, she does her best. Probably they are the most non-committal interviews ever handed out by a star. She can answer questions with a "yes" or "no" and still be polite. She looks at you with an expression that says, "I don't want to do this, but I have to, and I'll be as nice as I can about it."

WHEN asked if she prefers history to algebra she will admit frankly that she gets bad marks in algebra. She is equally frank about everything, if one can be frank and amazingly reticent at the same time.

The day following her return from the East, Mr. Rogers was disturbed in his office by firm little footsteps walking up and down outside his office. Deanna was waiting to see him.

"They won't let me drive my new car," she cried, almost angrily. "They say I'm not old enough."

Mr. Rogers called the chief of police of the studio and learned the sad truth first-hand. Then he did things, and this major problem was solved forthwith by the issuance of a special permit which allows Deanna to drive her car within the confines of the studio lot. Deanna could smile again.

They are very clannish, this Durbin family. Nothing short of a disaster could keep any of them away from the Eddie Cantor broadcasts on which Deanna sings twice each Sunday. They gather at noon to see the first show. During the afternoon they visit and have a family dinner. In the evening they attend the second broadcast. Sometimes Mr. Cantor lets Deanna off from the second broadcast if she is working hard at the studio. She adores him and is grateful to him for giving her an opportunity to sing on his program, but she is glad and her audience disappointed, when she is let off once in awhile.

Deanna, though, wasn't brought to Hollywood to be put into the movies or on the air as so many children are. The Durbin family moved here from Winnipeg when Deanna was a year old to escape the rigors of the Canadian climate, which was undermining the health of her father.

Deanna was attending public school and doing all the things her schoolmates did, plus singing. At the same time, but entirely unbeknown to Deanna, M-G-M producers were scratching their heads over a scenario for the late Mme. Schumann-Heink. They were searching for a young girl who could sing, to portray the prima donna as a child. The casting director confided this to an actors' agent, who wasn't much interested but said he would keep his eyes open.

That very day a friend telephoned and told him of hearing Deanna sing. "The child is marvelous," she told him. A few hours later he heard her sing.

To Deanna it meant nothing to sing for him. Certainly she realized that it might mean a job, but singing was her job, a job she knew she could do well, so with the assurance of youth and no thought of stage fright, she gave her audition.

"I'm telling you, I had to hold onto my seat, I was so thrilled over her voice," the agent told me later, "and I had her out at M-G-M singing for the producer and casting director that afternoon."

Each person who heard her was more enthusiastic than the last and finally they telephoned to Louis B. Mayer, chief executive of the studio, who was in New York at the time, and he listened to Deanna sing over long-distance. She went home with a long-term contract in her pocket.

FROM then on Deanna attended school at the studio for three hours each day, the requirement for all children employed in a studio. Weeks went by, and Deanna experienced the fate of many another actress of far more experience. Madame Schumann-Heink was taken ill, and the picture was postponed time after time. Deanna was forgotten by everyone but the agent, who had faith in her. He got her on the Eddie Cantor program and about that time Universal began preparations for making "Three Smart Girls." The producers were interested in Deanna for the picture, but only if they could have her under contract.

With the passing of Madame Schumann-Heink, it seemed that Deanna's chances at her studio were at an end. Her agent went to the casting director and learned that he had no plans for her, so he asked for her release.

"Maybe I could get her a job some place else," he suggested. She was released and signed a contract with Universal to make "Three Smart Girls." Meanwhile she was growing more popular all the time on the radio. Mr. Mayer, in New York again, listened to her on the Sunday night broadcasts and chuckled with delight because his studio had such a "find" on its payroll. When he returned home he asked, "Well, what are we going to do with our little songbird?"

What happened when he learned that his little songbird had flown to another studio, I leave to your imagination. But it was too late to do anything about it except to rush Deanna into a short picture before her contract expired. Deanna doesn't care much for the short picture, "Every Sunday," which she made hurriedly. When asked if she didn't like the music, she replied, "Oh, the music was all right, but I didn't like the way they combed my hair."

The movies have had one bad effect on Deanna. In her first picture she had to bite her fingernails in one scene, a habit Deanna had never been allowed to practice. Pressed to do it "just for the picture," she found it such a delightful exhaust for fraught nerves that she continued it after the picture was finished. Now she must break herself of the bad habit all over again.

To date she is unspoiled about her success. Even her mother (the mothers usually become prima donnas before their children do) hasn't yet succumbed to the inevitable influence of constant deference, and she doesn't seem to me to be the kind who will. Deanna's money is being put into a trust fund.

Fate, luck or whatever you want to call it, may have furthered her career, of course, but there must be something in the quotation about the mouse-trap!

Wealthy and Wise

"I knew who started those reports about me. There wasn't any truth in them, but the only thing to do was to let them die out themselves." She is a wise young woman.

"I am twenty-six, you know," she reminded us.

But in experience, Sylvia is far wiser than her years.

There is Roumanian on her father's side, Russian on her mother's. Her parents come from a small town about a hundred miles east of Warsaw, the capital of Poland. When they lived there—before the World War—it was still a part of Russia.

Sylvia has the sophisticated traits of the Russian. By sophisticated, we mean freedom of personal actions, and thoughts unhampered by obvious conventions.

"My life," she says, "is an open book, but can I help it if a few of the pages are stuck together?"

On occasion she has been questioned about a few of the pages that are "stuck together." She resents this, for she has not quite learned that being a motion picture star means she is living in a figurative gold-fish bowl.

"There are personal things in my life that I can't share with everyone," Sylvia believes emphatically.

It was not so many moons ago, however, that Sylvia's name was linked with that of a producer whom, it was reported persistently, she was going to marry. As a matter of fact, her name has been linked with several in pictures.

Recently in Chicago, a reporter camped on Miss Sidney's doorstep at the hotel where she was stopping and prepared to follow her at a moment's notice, on the elopement she was supposedly about to enjoy.

BUT I was not there to elope with anyone. Even if I had wanted to," she added, "I couldn't have, for I hadn't yet received my final decree of divorce from my husband." That was Bennett Cerf, her first and, to date, only husband. "I was married and lived in a suburb just outside of the city. But my intrepid interviewer wouldn't believe that.

"It was like that when I first went to Hollywood," and she shook her head without much pleasure at the memory. "I was interviewed and asked some of the most extraordinary questions that I've ever listened to. I don't see why, just because one is in pictures, she should be asked questions that are not only personal but insultingly so. I turned around and asked the interviewer the same questions put to me. That didn't set so well. Someday I'd like to memorize a long list of scorching questions to pop at such people.

"I wasn't married at that time, but I've been married since, and I don't care to speak of it. My marriage is ancient history now, anyway. I'm no longer married, and I shan't marry again."

"Never is a long time," we remarked. There was no answer to this. Miss Sidney's face is firmly set.

"Have you ever been to a fortune-teller?"

She smiled broadly. "I had my fortune told by one in a tea-room. She told me I was going to fall in love three times."

"And be married?" we asked.

Sylvia shook her head. "She didn't say anything about marriage. Only about falling in love." She smiled cryptically.

You can take it or leave it about Sylvia's not remarrying. At the moment, she is having a happy time furnishing her new New York apartment. An interior decorator is going to fix it up for her along the simple lines she has in mind, and when she returns East after finishing her new talkie, "Dead End," her apartment will be ready for her. There'll be a house-warming—and all her old New York friends in attendance. Sylvia's not the kind of girl who lacks amusing company, for she's amusing herself and almost recklessly interested in having fun.

Much has been said about Miss Sidney's love for books. Not a mention of books when we saw her. She may enjoy them, but she's no walking library. Her real knowledge doesn't come from books, anyway. It comes from people. She's a very shrewd judge of human nature. She doesn't always follow her own hunches, but when she does, she is invariably right. Sometimes, she gives a person a long loop of rope because she doesn't want to hurt his feelings. Sometimes, she prefers to hurt feelings and have done with it.

She's a many sided girl. She enjoys simplicity. She enjoys her popularity. She enjoys her work. And yet, she has lapses into intense moodiness when she has to be by herself to work it off. She appears much taller and bigger on the screen than she is.

"That's because I usually have tall leading men," she explains. "When you see me on the screen with them it is a closeup or semi-closeup or else a long-shot, so taken that I am built up, and my chin comes above their shoulders. If I weren't built up to look taller, you wouldn't be able to see me. My head would barely touch the leading man's shoulder."

But though small in stature, Sylvia is tall in other respects, and she has a very clever head on her slim shoulders.

"Have you ever done any writing?" we inquired apropos of this.

"No. I don't know the first thing about it."

"You know how to live, don't you?" we asked.

She does.

"Well, writing is just simplified living."

But Sylvia is dubious, and time can wait, for she is still young—a free agent and—healthy, wealthy, and wise.

How could he tell her

why their Marriage had failed?

How could he say—"You've been careless about feminine hygiene"? Husbands can't be expected to know about "Lysol".

IT WOULD be so much easier, she thought, if he'd burst into a rage, instead of this indifferent kindness that hurt her so.

Family doctors—and too many husbands—know that one of the causes of discord between husband and wife is neglect of the feminine hygiene that is so necessary for intimate cleanliness.

If you are in any doubt regarding a wholesome, cleanly method of feminine hygiene, ask your doctor about "Lysol" disinfectant. It is recommended by many physicians and is used in many hospitals, for many antiseptic needs. Here are good reasons why:

THE 6 SPECIAL FEATURES OF "LYSOL"

1. NON-CAUSTIC . . . "Lysol", in the proper dilution, does not hurt or harm normal tissue. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.
2. EFFECTIVENESS . . . "Lysol" is an effective germicide, active under practical conditions . . . in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.) when other types of disinfectants may not work.
3. PENETRATION . . . "Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.
4. ECONOMY . . . "Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.
5. ODOR . . . Cleanly, disappears after use.
6. STABILITY . . . "Lysol" keeps its full strength no matter how long kept, or how often uncorked.

Don't be a Chrysanthemum!

SAYS Jane Heath

No girl can look truly super-smooth and glamourous with brows running rampant or a fringe of short hairs sprouting from her hair line. TWEEZETTE is the little beauty implement for removing face hairs automatically and painlessly, and a cap covers the pluckers so you can carry it in your purse wherever you go! $1.

don't forget

It isn't enough just to de-fringe yourself . . . the glamour girls all have that well-groomed look too! . . . Sleek, shining brows like wings . . . long, silky lashes. . . . KURLENE is a scientific formula for grooming—so always stroke your brows and lashes with it before retiring. Use KURLENE for daytime, too, and notice the lovely rainbow lights a touch of it puts in your lashes! 50c and $1.

remember

Spell eye beauty, "K-U-R-L-A-S-H," for only a frame of curling lashes can bring out the greatest charm of your eyes. So slip your lashes into KURLASH every day. In only 30 seconds they'll be perfectly and naturally curled without heat, cosmetics or practice. $1.

OTHER KURLASH PRODUCTS ARE:

TWISSORS—the tweezers with scissor-handles.

Flying to Fame

novel to do. But the joke proved to be on me.

"When the test was run off, Mr. Schulberg wanted me to start work at once. Of course, I couldn't. In the first place, there was no one to replace me on the airline, and I couldn't leave them flat during our busiest season. However, after some discussion, I was signed to begin work the following September, which was just about a year ago."

John Trent was born on his father's orange ranch in California. He was christened La Verne Brown and held firmly to the name until that eventful day that one of his passengers turned out to be a talent-finding movie producer. Being a fatalist, La Verne accepted this new stroke of luck much in the manner he has accepted life in general. "It's just one of those things," he'll tell you philosophically.

After completing his education as an electrical engineer, he immediately took up aviation as a career. His wish was to be a transport pilot and, with this aim in view, he began saving for a plane of his own. The day finally arrived when he actually bought one, thereby inaugurating his flying career practically and in earnest. Around the country he went barnstorming—which, as a matter of fact, is doing any and all things with a plane in order to pile up the hours of flying time required for a transport pilot's license.

"I barnstormed all over the south and middle west, getting everything from a dollar to a sack of corn as fare for a ride," Trent admitted with a twinkle in his eye. "We certainly had some times, too,—lots of thrills but no spills."

SPEAKING of them, John declares his greatest thrill, or scare—whichever you prefer to call it—came on his initial run as a co-pilot; that is, his first really exciting experience. Indeed, it was comparable only to his first day of facing the camera out in Movieville.

"After introducing myself to the pilot and noting his amused expression, of course I should have been on," John admitted, "for he certainly realized that I was plenty green. Anyway, it wasn't long after taking off that we ran into a thunder storm. Well, I had seen storms before, but always from the ground. That's where we stayed when I was piloting my own ship. Yep, we'd park safely on terra firma and indulge in a little poker with a glass of "cawn" to keep us warmed up.

"Not here though! Right into the middle of this big, bad, black one, we flew, and the only thing you could see besides the instrument panel, were jagged streaks of lightning. The pilot asked me to consult the maps and see where we were, as he didn't have the slightest idea! Said, not only that he didn't know, but couldn't be bothered about it, since that was my job. Well, the only thing I knew for sure was that maps or no maps, I'd probably meet my Maker any minute.

"However, we landed safely, and I asked my 'friend' if they encountered many of these storms. He promptly assured me that there were plenty with most of them heavier than the 'light' shower we'd been through. That was just about all I needed, and I don't mind telling you that I certainly spent a little time right then and there contemplating my future.

"Of course, what the pilot neglected to say was that he was flying the radio beam and could have gone around the storm if he'd wanted to. These little details I learned later and had a good laugh over the ride I'd been taken for!

"My next big fright, which was really a thrill as I think of it now, occurred the first time I faced a camera. Well, I was so scared that they had to take the scene over and over. As a matter of fact, when it was finally done to the director's satisfaction, they began calling me 'fifty take Trent.' That gives you an idea of how the camera threw me for a loss. Indeed, one of the men on the set said, 'Say, if we don't get on with this picture these kids will all be character actors by the time we finish!' Anyway, with the help of a patient director and a little outside coaching, I finally got the hang of things.

"My knowledge of aviation helps a lot in acting. Basically, believe it or not, they are comparable, for each, more or less, concerns relaxation and freedom from nerves. If you're acting, you have to walk into a room apparently unselfconsciously, timing yourself so as to arrive at a given point on a set speech. In flying, you must be equally relaxed and never become nervous or tense, for if you do, there'll be real trouble at the controls. Then, too, if there is anything that seems to go wrong, it's the pilot's or co-pilot's job to reassure the passengers. So, it's pretty important to be composed under all circumstances."

ROUGHLY SPEAKING, we'd say that John Trent is completely at ease. There is a naturalness and self-assurance about this native son of California that is phenomenal in a newcomer. In fact, insofar as poise is concerned, John starts out with what it took Robert Taylor almost a year of success to acquire. He promises to become a very popular screen personality. With fan mail pouring in before he's hardly begun, Trent seems a little bewildered by the rapidity with which things are happening about him.

He confesses that to date he's had only one disappointment in his brief movie career. That was when he had looked forward to piloting a plane on a publicity trip which he took for the studio. The purpose of this tour was to deliver prints of his second picture, "A Doctor's Diary," to exhibitors throughout the country and so, meet the people who were to show his films. An advanced starting date on his following production prevented the trip. Now, he is looking forward to the time he may be able to make it.

Trent confesses that he'd like sometime to do an aviation story. That would give him a chance not only to act, but be of service on the technical end of the production. There would be no blunders in this flying film, for he would be right on the spot to correct any errors that might happen, as only a person with his practical experience could.

"You see, in many aviation pictures, they make one common mistake," John explained. "You invariably see the pilot at the controls calmly gazing out of the window at the passing scenery. In the first place, no pilot takes his eyes off the instrument panel, with the possible exception of an occasional glance out to see whether it is clear or clouding up. Then, of course, there isn't anything to see anyway, as you fly at a high altitude, and there's nothing around but clouds and—more clouds!

"Well, I'm going to try to see to it that my picture—should I have one—doesn't commit such mistakes—and some of the others I've seen so often. There was one, for instance, that showed the side windows beside the pilot caked with snow and ice. Well, that never happens, no matter how cold it gets, because ice can't form there, due to the strong wind created by the motors, added to the terrific force of that induced by air speed. All these things are details perhaps, but to me, or to anyone who knows flying, they stick out like the traditional sore thumb."

We are now waiting to see John Trent in "The Great Gambini," in which picture he plays a romantic role. It isn't, to be sure, the flying film he's been waiting for, but it should do nicely until that one comes along. En passant, let us say that J.T. likes the movies muchly, but, nevertheless, still retains his standing as reserve pilot with his old airline at the nominal salary of a dollar a month. Just in case? Well, maybe.

too, I take that back. He bought himself his car And he's mad about the races. And he has a passion for barber-pole striped ties. Otherwise, he has no extravagances. I have to do his shopping or there just wouldn't be any done. I even bought his suits, such few as there were, before we came to Hollywood. Now that he is here, he realizes that he must dress well, and so he goes to a tailor. The other day," laughed Honore, "he wanted a pair of shorts to play tennis in. He didn't have any. He was wearing a pair of long white ducks. He got a pair of scissors and then and there, cut them off to his knees. The effect was sort of scalloped, to say the least."

I managed to say, "But will this go on? Don't you think he'll change, you'll both change? I mean, won't it get you, the Troc'ing, the glamorizing?"

"No," said Honore Ameche, "Don won't change. We won't change. I'll tell you why. It's because the babies are our whole lives. We're interested in them and each other. He isn't one bit different from the boy I used to 'go with,' meet Saturday afternoons for the movies or to visit an ice-cream parlor. Seldom both. Because we never had more than fifty cents to spend. It never mattered. It doesn't now. Don would tell me what a fine lawyer he was going to be and I believed in him. I knew he would make good then, as now."

And then Honore Ameche told me something of that young romance, of how Don's father, afraid that the lad would do something premature, sent him away to Marquette University, how they didn't meet again, save once, for six years. And that once was after Don had joined the Jackson Stock Company at Madison, Wisconsin. Honore saw the show and met him afterwards and didn't think she liked him very well. It was the only time she ever wavered.

More time passed and they met again. They knew what they had always known. And Don's young ardor flamed hot and high and the phone in Honore's home rang daily, nightly, hourly. Letters poured in, flowers, books, candies.

And when, at last, Don had the ring, he motored nearly three hundred miles in the dead of night, to give it to her. She waited up for him and, in the kitchen of the home where all of the romancing of Honore and her brothers and sisters had taken place, at three-thirty in the morning, Don placed the modest ring on her finger.

DAWN came over the midwestern prairies. The kitchen-faucets dripped. Birds stirred in their nests. They neither knew, nor cared. Honore was in a dog's palace with her young Florentine lover. Don was off on the strong wings of one of his songs. And there was something fitting in that the betrothal, the giving of the ring took place in a homely kitchen, surrounded by the warm realities of living—among which they still live, and always will.

"We've never had any money to spare," Honore was telling me. "We're saving, putting everything we can into trust funds and annuities and educational funds for the children, so that, in a few years, we'll be able to travel and see the world and have some fun. There have been the heavy expenses of the babies' births. Don has bought a small ranch for Grandma and Grandpa Ameche. Then there are his younger sisters and brothers, most of them still in schools. They come out here in the summer. This ring," said Mrs. Don, displaying, with refreshing pride, the lovely star sapphire girt with small diamonds, "Don gave me this last Christmas. I was supposed to have had it Christmas before last. But we had the baby instead." (A baby instead of a star sapphire! O, Hollywood, O Tempora, O Mores, what are we coming to?)

"But to go back home," smiled Mrs. Don. "Gabriel went to school with Don back home. Don used to help Gabe, an orphan, adopted by the good Brothers, with his Latin. And Gabe conceived for Don one of those devotions, those life-long fealties which make us know that Damon and Pythias really lived. In Gabe's eyes, as in mine, Don can do no wrong.

"Then, after we married and Don's work increased and the babies came and I was so ill and Don doing two jobs, his and mine, Gabriel came to help us out. I don't know now what we could do without him. He cooks like a streak. He takes care of the babies as efficiently as I do. He takes care of Don's clothes and is with him at the studio most of the time lately. Don, by the way, is no business man at all. He knows nothing whatsoever about insurance and income taxes and things like that. I take care of all that sort of thing.

"And then there's Anne. She came to us while we were in Chicago, too. And she and I divide up the work of the house and the babies. If Anne is busy cooking or something, I bathe and dress the babies. If Anne is with them I do the washing and ironing. They are in no sense of the word servants. They are members of our family. They all, Don, Gabe, Anne, the babies, call me 'Honey.' We all call Don 'Daddy.'

"Anne and Gabriel have their friends in, as we do ours, together or not as the case may be. They dance and play games and use the radio in the living-room. Sometimes we get someone to stay with the children and all four of us go to the movies. Saturday nights we often pile into the car and drive to Venice and go on the merry-go-rounds and to the fortune tellers and everywhere. We have a lot of fun. We just all pitch in together and get the chores done. Don does his share, too, if he has to. Of course, he doesn't have much time now, what with the studio and the radio work. But he's just as handy around the house and with the babies, as any one of us. And he's the most marvellous disciplinarian. I give him credit for the good behavior of our first child. I was so ill after his birth that the full care of the baby fell to Don. He did everything for him. And I must say he did a masterly job.

"There is never an unkind word in our home. It is the one thing that Don and I demand of our home—that it be perfectly harmonious. We wouldn't have regular servants now, not even if we needed them, not while Gabe and Anne are with us. It might place them in sort of equivocal positions. If and when Don and I do have company and want to be sort of 'elegant,' Anne and Gabe don uniforms. Gabe cooks, and they serve a marvellous dinner with all the finesse of accomplished retainers. They understand that this is part of the set-up, and they love it and enjoy the masquerade and never for one instant step out of character. It's simply a case of our being one for all and all for one, and there's never been one uncomfortable moment for any of us. Don dislikes the idea of servants. There is something in his sensitiveness which rebels against giving orders, drawing that sharp distinction between himself and his fellow man or woman. He just can't be the overlord. The autocrat isn't in him.

"It's all of a piece, too, the way he refuses to 'put on airs,' pretending to condescension he doesn't feel. He's too human, he's too raw to the hurt or the humbleness of others for anything like that."

Which is true of Don Ameche. True that he would never have any part of that erasing of and then rewriting the humbler pages of his "past." He wouldn't put a 'tiara' on his mother, who wears her motherhood, he says, as the only tiara she needs. He will not conceal the fact that his grandpappy kidnapped horses, that his Dad drove a taxi and became, later, the best saloon-keeper in Kenosha, Wis., where Dominic Felix was born. Said Don, "He was the best saloon-keeper in the business. No man ever left his place drunk. I don't see any sense in changing the story. I'm proud of it, not ashamed."

It's all of a piece, too, with the way he talks of the days when he was working in Kenosha with a gang of city workmen, rounding square street corners. That, he says, was the all-time low in futility!

He enjoys reminiscing about the days when he dug ditches, socked an Irish foreman, worked in a mattress factory testing the comfort of the finished product; the summer he spent loading one hundred pound bags of cement onto trucks, rather than stressing the fact that he attended four colleges, Columbia, in Iowa; Marquette, in Illinois; Georgetown in Washington, D. C. and the University of Wisconsin. He will lay emphasis on the fact that while the universities added to his store of knowledge, there wasn't a degree in the carload.

"I had the instincts of a minstrel," said Don. "I couldn't stand more than a year in any one place."

"He has only one idiosyncrasy," Mrs. Don told me, "only one trait which might be called temperamental. He can't eat his dinners at home! He doesn't like to know what he is going to eat. He likes to have a choice. He likes to have lots of people and lots of talk and noise around him."

The result? Almost every night in the week Don and Mrs. Don are to be seen dining at the Beverly Brown Derby.

And all of a piece, too, the way "juicers," property men, waiters, the toughest "critics" this side of Jordan, give him the beamish smile, the out-stretched hand whenever he is around.

"He's grand," declare his studio associates.

"He's so attractive," choruses feminine America.

"He's so good," says his wife.

Gee, Those Kids Are Wonderful!

He knew what I was dreaming. But how? His room is considerably down the hall from mine. I had, he told me, made no sound. Can you explain that? I can't.

"Our attorney was at the house the other night," resumed Aunt Cissie. "Freddie was on the floor playing with his electric trains, as any child likes to do. I left the room for a moment. I returned to find Freddie and our attorney involved in the most technical and legal disputation, having to do with maritime law. Freddie came forth with a quotation from Bowditch's 'Practical Navigator.' He won the argument. The attorney said, 'He knows fine legal points I have forgotten, if I ever knew them. When did he read Bowditch?' 'He never did,' I said.

IT isn't only in specific instances like this that Freddie constantly confounds me. It is the mature philosophy which seems to permeate his whole life. He never reads his reviews, for an instance. When I asked him one day why he isn't interested in what people say about his work, he said, 'When I'm working I do the very best I can. If it's good, that's fine, but I don't need to hear about it. If it's bad, I'm sorry but there's nothing I can do about it once it's done, so why read about it? I want to go on to other things.'

"He is two years ahead of his age in school work. He studies trigonometry, Latin, general science. And what is even more illuminating, he loves his work. He coöperates with his teacher, he coöperates with me, in every particular.

"He has, also, a sense of humor. I said to him recently, 'Freddie, when you grow up, you may want to be a director, a writer and an actor—you seem to have ability in all three lines.' 'All right, darling,' grinned Freddie, 'but when would I sleep?'

"He seems to have the sensitiveness to suffering, the fine humor of life which comes, ordinarily, only after many, many years of living. Perhaps," said Aunt Cissie, "there have been many, many years . . ."

GEE, those kids are wonderful!

I recall the time, years ago, when Jackie Coogan, having just made his great success in "The Kid," with Charlie Chaplin, came to New York. He was being entertained one day by an eminent editor. In course of conversation the editor said to him, "Give us an imitation of Chaplin, will you, Jackie?" The child looked at him, something inscrutable in his eyes and answered smoothly, "I never imitate Mr. Chaplin. Nobody could." There was only the slightest stress on the "Mr." It was a reproof so subtle, so delicately done that it has remained stamped, indelibly, on my mind.

It was then, for the first time, that I began to perceive something beyond clever mimicry in these children. I began to suspect that they are not, most of them, merely soft pieces of clay which are moulded and set in shapes and taught to go through their motions by adept directors. Meet them in any walk of life, confront them with any situation, personal, social, professional, and they will meet each one with adult ease, with intuitive, age-old wisdom and sensitivity. And yet, they're not obnoxious child prodigies—they're real kids at heart.

I TALKED, the other day, with young Bonita Granville, aged fourteen, on the set of "It's Love I'm After." Nearby sat the stars, Leslie Howard and Bette Davis, engaged, I felt sure, and with all due respect to their unquestioned intelligences, in a conversation far less adult than ours—or rather, Bonita's. For Bonita was discussing the horrendous child she played, a year ago, in "These Three." I said, "What did you think of her, Bonita?"

And Bonita replied gravely, "I felt awfully sorry for her. I felt a great pity for her. I know that she was, primarily, the victim of her environment. Her grandmother had spoiled her miserably and completely, you see. Until her only law was her own law. She knew no other. I've read quite a lot about the theories of the environmentalists and the behaviorists. I believe that the behaviorists have the last word. I suppose heredity plays its part, of course. But I do believe that that part is relatively small and can be guided by environment. I know that my behavior would be quite different from what it is if mother . . ." she grinned at her small, gentle mother, "if mother had not brought me up as she has."

I gasped, not so much at what Bonita was saying, as at the way in which she was saying it. Not as a precocious child who knows, and is exhibitionistically enjoying the effect she produces, but sensibly, in an ordinary conversational vein.

Bonita ran onto the stage to do a scene. Her mother murmured, with somewhat the same look of mystification as had veiled Aunt Cissie's eyes, "I don't understand how Bonita works as she does. She never studies her lines. She reads her scripts through once, very thoroughly, and then never looks at them again. She never so much as pulls down her dress or touches her hair when she is called to the set."

Leslie Howard remarked to me later, "She is the only actress I have ever played with, or actor, for that matter, who never goes up on her lines, is never flustered, has a surety of touch which is astonishing. All the more astonishing because she is much too highly strung."

Gee whiz, those kids are wonderful.

WHEN Shirley Temple was training with Jack Donahue for "Captain January," she couldn't seem to get one of the dance routines. Jack was puzzled. He had never known Shirley to fumble before. Later in the day Bill Robinson came on the set. He asked Shirley howcome she was missing out. She whispered confidentially, "Uncle Billy, I didn't really fumble the steps. I knew them all right. But you taught me to do this routine your way, and I didn't think I ought to give it away to anyone else."

On the set of "Heidi," recently, a rapacious reporter appeared. She drew Shirley aside and pinned her down with question marks. She said finally, "Tell me, Shirley, John Ford is your favorite director, isn't he?" Shirley moved away, and as she left, she said, "I think Mr. Ford is very, very nice." She had answered the undiplomatic question, with delicate, evasive diplomacy. She had answered, and she hadn't answered at all. It was a politic piece de resistance.

Shirley's mother told me how, at a formal luncheon recently given, one of the grown-up guests spilled a glass of water and was consequently embarrassed. And Shirley, reacting immediately to the lady's embarrassment said, "That's perfectly all right. I just spilled some peas in my lap!"

A very distinguished newspaper man was visiting Shirley. They were in the studio portrait gallery together. The eminent journalist was so excited at meeting the First Lady of the Juveniles that he was at a complete loss for words. But Shirley saved that situation by asking animatedly, "Do you know any riddles, Mr. ——?" That gave the uneasy gentleman his cue. He did know some riddles—and, instantly, he was at his ease.

Daddy George Temple told me, "Shirley frequently answers the phone herself, at home or in her dressing-room. She does it with such an adult, non-committal voice that no one ever suspects it is Shirley they are talking to. When they ask for her mother or for me, Shirley asks who it is; says, 'Just a moment, please,' and that is that. Only once did she have a contretemps. She slipped off her chair, plopped on the floor, reached at once for the telephone and said calmly, 'Will you repeat the message please? There's a lot of noise in here.'"

Time, place, circumstance or personage make no difference to the control, the perfect poise of Shirley. On the set of "Heidi," Shirley had long lines to speak and was supposed to pause when she heard the sound of a trumpet, which was to be blown by a prop-man as a sign that the goat herd was coming. The prop-man, however, engrossed in the scene, forgot to blow the horn. Director Allan Dwan hastily substituted a long "Baah," like a sheep. The whole company collapsed into suppressed laughter. But not Shirley. Shirley went right on with her lines without even a perceptible pause, and the scene was "in the box." Grown-up actors, said Director Dwan, would have halted and lost the scene, had they been making it. Shirley, the trouper, impervious to all extraneous incidents, smoothly saved it.

ONE of the ingredients of genius is, certainly, poise. Another seems to be deep, warm kindness of heart. When young Jane Withers, aged eleven, was making a recent personal appearance tour in the East, she found that the manager of the Palace Theatre in Cleveland, where Jane played, had upped the admission price from fifteen cents to a quarter for children. Many of the children came from distant parts of the city and had only their carfare and their fifteen cents. Jane noticed that they were being turned away. She rushed to the manager and said, "Please let them in whether they have enough pennies or not—and take it out of my salary." Needless to add that the youngsters were all admitted, and that the manager, being a gentleman, left Jane's salary free of deductions.

At a children's party Jane recently attended, one youngster was severely admonished by her mother for pointing at people. The little girl's woebegone face touched Jane's warm heart. And promptly and with apparent solemnity Jane said, "The only thing it's polite to point at is—French pastry." At which everyone, including the child's mother, laughed so heartily that the little girl stopped crying.

Several hundred youngsters, having had word-of-mouth information that Jane had gone into a Hollywood theatre one Saturday afternoon, waited in long queues for three hours until Jane came out, after the double-feature bill. And when Jane did appear, hundreds and hundreds of small, grubby autograph books were pressed upon her. The grown-ups in Jane's party, fearful that Jane would be exhausted, told her to get into the car, after the first fifty autographs. But Jane said, quietly, aside, 'If they had patience to stay here and wait three hours for autographs, I certainly ought to take the time to write them.'' And she did.

There is poetry in these children and pity, and there is, also, practicality. For instance, while Jane was motoring with her father a few days ago, she saw a motorcycle stuck in the mud, the owner vainly trying to extricate it. Jane, who has learned to rope expertly under the tutelage of the late Will Rogers' teacher, Shorty Miller, for her current role in "Wild And Woolly," suggested that they help him. She lassoed the handlebars slickly, and Papa Withers and the cyclist then took the rope and pulled the cycle out. When the extricated cyclist tried to thank her, she said, "Well, it just goes to show that everything we learn comes in handy sometime."

Another instance of the practicality of Jane's mind came to light when, the other day, her teacher, Miss Lola Figland, was reviewing the geography lesson about the five thrifty little nations of Europe—Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Holland and Switzerland. She pointed out that the number of people to the square mile, seven hundred, couldn't possibly live on what they produce on the land. "How," queried Miss Figland, "do you suppose they manage to live?" Jane answered, "If they can't find enough on the land, they can find the balance in the sea."

Jane, too, has her sly humor. In the schoolroom the other day, Miss Figland was looking at a picture of herself taken with Jane. Only the back of the teacher's head showed. Jane said consolingly, "Never mind, Teacher, everyone will know it is you because that big hairpin is sticking out as it always does!"

ONE could make a monumental mosaic of the marvelousness of these kids. But out of the mystery which obscures the answer to the riddle of how, in their little packet of years, they have managed to acquire what the majority of adults never acquire, three deductions emerge: One is that they seem to be, all of them, amenable to discipline, coöperative with their parents, their teachers, their directors. In other words, they are good children. They contradict the theory that genius finds lodging in children who are unmanageable and rebellious.

The other deduction is that they, all of them, are possessed of complete poise and self-possession.

The third is that they seem to share, in common, deep and unusual kindness of heart, consideration for others, compassion which holds out their small hands in helpfulness.

I can't explain it. It may be the result of intensive training at home. It may be that they were born more psychic than the average child. Or it may be, as Freddie Bartholomew's Aunt Cissie suggested—reincarnation. I'm not sure. I can only fall back, I fear, on the inept amazement of, "Gee, those kids are wonderful!"

ing, oily cream before they do appear. How can you tell when to begin? Well, perhaps last winter, you noticed with surprise that your skin seemed dry. You may never have given a thought to creams before, beyond a good, routine cold cream for cleansing. But there is the first warning—that dryness. I repeat, it isn't that a few lines in themselves are so terrible. All of us who really live and endure a full life's worries and cares are bound to collect a few character marks as we go along. In fact, I despise a blank, smooth, characterless face on an older person. But it's the webbed, wrinkled look that starts with the drying out of the skin at thirty and ends in an old, tired skin at forty, and which can be prevented, that I want you to guard against.

The old so-called tissue creams used to be horrible, heavy, greasy affairs. Nowadays, all the good brands are pleasant to use. Just a thin film is all that's necessary and a seemingly expensive jar will last and last. You needn't, if you don't want to, leave the cream on overnight. Put it on before you take a bath, and let the warmth from the tub help the oils to penetrate into your skin. Let the cream stay on for twenty minutes or half an hour while you're dressing or busy doing odd jobs around the house. Don't forget your neck, either. At least twice a week, let the neck enjoy a good, softening creambath, too.

WATCH the upper arms and the waistline. A thickened, mature fleshiness seems to settle upon these parts of the body as we get older. Sometimes, even though one is not actually too heavy, the settled, mature look comes just the same. 'Tis a lack of suppleness which causes it, and exercises will prevent and correct that fault. Such a loss of youth's suppleness is devastating to all sizes and shapes, but particularly so to short women. The movie stars are short, almost without exception. (When a girl five feet six or seven hits Hollywood, they look upon her as an Amazon.) The movie stars' bare arms, in evening gowns, must keep the slim, willowy look of youth. And the waistline—well, of course, it goes without saying that it must keep that trim, nipped-in look. Did you obsoive Miss Colbert in her skating costume in "I Met Him in Paris"? All over the theatre, I heard them whispering, "Doesn't she look adorable!" And a skating costume, dears, is about the most difficult garment to wear with its snug fit and short skirt.

WELL, there now, those are the salient points of youthfulness, I think: The texture of the skin, the jaw line, the brow, the upper arms, the waistline. Graying hair doesn't matter. You can dye it—rather, have it dyed, by the best possible hair artist you can afford. Or you can let it get gray, which, with your clear, lovely skin, good figure and young, sparkling eyes, will only render you that much more distinguished. A word about the care of gray and white hair. It needs frequent laundering to look its best, but everyone knows that soap is inclined to give it a yellowish cast. Write me for the best shampoo to use. It's good for all shades of hair, by the way, but particularly helpful for gray-ladies and delicate blondes. It works up into a lather like lightning. Only a little is needed to give a thorough shampoo. You need no rinses afterwards—just a good sousing with clear water.

As we get older, we must learn to be better and better make-up artists. We can't use the same casual dab of lipstick and puff of powder we used when we were twenty-one. If powder is used, it should be first reinforced with a powder base—the liquid ones, delightfully tinted to every known flesh tone—are the best. This base should be applied sparingly, evenly and carefully. Then use the lightest textured powder you can find, perhaps in two shades—a darker shade for the jowl line, where you are a bit too heavy, or for the nose, which is too prominent. Powder should cover the face and neck, leaving no line of demarcation. If you use rouge, it must be cream rouge, for cake rouge has a drying effect. The merest flush of rouge under the chin, if one's chin is too heavy, will reduce that annoying feature. You yourself must determine whether or not you are the type to get away with mad shades of lipstick and a dash of eye-shadow, or whether you should wear only the merest touch of rose-shaded lipstick and look sweet rather than sophisticated. I can really give only one rule for make-up for us older gals: Experiment for yourself and use your judgment. When in doubt, don't.

As we get older, too, we must all learn to be our own fashion advisers. We must study lines. For the woman with a heavy bust, a deep V neckline narrows her like magic. Heavy hips lose inches when a floor length sash of contrasting color to the gown is allowed to fall down the left-side-front of the figure. On tall, heavy women, the judicious use of long fringe, applied on a slanting line, gives evening dresses glamor. Do not think you must stick completely to black, navy and brown as you get older. The wine shades of red are made for you; they give the skin a glow. Spring green. Soft blues. Prints. And if you're very thin, the big splashy prints will give you needed fullness. But always soft colors—the mad shades are for the young. If your hair is white or gray, don't wear white or gray next to your face. A touch of pink at the neckline, if you please.

Be careful about the length of jackets as you get older. The very short, nipped-in and bolero effects are also for the young. Suit jackets should be at least hip length. Have a number of extra jackets in your wardrobe, which can be worn with various things. You may soothe your yearning for an occasional bright color with gay scarves, buckles, buttons, flowers and other gadgets. But heavy women, please, always tack scarves, belts and such in place, so that they won't fly in the breezes or shift around and make you look bigger than you are.

As we get older, we must settle upon a definite coiffure. Our hair must be "fixed" every day—that quaint old custom which nearly went out with the event of the casual, long bob. In general, I'd say that the lines which sweep up and give height and dignity, even though one is tall, are best. I like a short crisp bob on older women only when the hair is naturally wavy or curly and adaptable enough to "stay put." If your hair is long, the style of hair-do I like best is what used to be called the Elsie Ferguson coiffure, remember? Adapted a little—not so full around the face as it used to be fashionable to wear one's hair, but that general idea. This is the way to do it: Divide the hair across the crown, leaving the more generous half to the back. Roll the back hair up fan-wise, and smooth it across the crown of your head. Then take the front part and arrange it over this padding effect. You may part it where you wish, and soften it at ears and temples as you wish. Tuck the ends in by twisting the hair to the right or left and poking the ends under. If you have a lot of hair, you should have it thinned for this coiffure, for the line of the head will be lost, if you have too abundant tresses.

If your hair is rather short and thick and you don't wish to wear a bob, a charming effect is attained by swirling the hair to one side of the head and rolling and tucking till all the ends are out of sight. This can only be done with short, thick hair. It gives the look of the old French roll. The roll should be placed a little to one side of the center of the head and extend from the crown to the nape of the neck. Of course, the hair should be waved at front and sides and softened some around the face, or the effect will be freakish rather than charming.

Well, I hope I haven't made you all feel

"Only" a Western

I would like to say a word in behalf of Western pictures and Western players. It's true, they win no Academy Awards, but there are a-plenty worse pictures made.

Most of us, I am sure, harbor a false vanity toward them. We like to call them "blood and thunders," and scoff, in general, but if the truth were known, the majority of us still warm up to such lines as "Meet me at the hideout," and "Head him off at Devil's Gulch." And, what's more, we still like to see the hero save the homestead and get the girl. The trouble is, we won't admit it—not even to ourselves.

Many of us underestimate the acting in Westerns, too. We are prone to think that any actor, who specializes in horses, lariats and six-shooters, is sure to be a punk second-rater. But this is far from true. —Albert C. Keller, DeSoto, Mo.

The battle is still raging, and the question, "Who is King of Feminine Hearts—Bob Taylor or Tyrone Power?", hasn't been settled yet. Here are excerpts from just a handful of your letters. At this stage, Bob is far ahead of Ty. Remember, your votes will decide who will be King.—The Editor.

afar, ignoring the mud pies being thrown at my hero's head, for such must be the price of fame.—Opal Kostenbader, Sciota Mills, Ill. At present I have 151 pictures and 76 articles of my handsome hero, so there's no doubt my vote goes to him.—Jean Myers, Naperville, Ill. If Taylor would get a haircut, he wouldn't have to worry about handing over his crown to Ty. Otherwise he's tops with me.—Louise Brooks, Northampton, Mass. Let them turn against Bob for all the Tyrones in the world, but I'm going to stick by him.—Daisy Bess Brown, Grandfield, Okla. Bob has a clean-cut, masculine-looking profile, while Tyrone's is feminine.—Movie Fan. Ty Power may have a little more assurance in his acting, but he is a well-known type (like Buddy Rogers), while there's an "American-home-and-fireside" quality about Bob that is entirely his.—Vera Sheldon, Brooklyn, N. Y. Power is too much in love with life, himself, and getting ahead, ever to hold a firm place in American hearts. He won't last in pictures. Taylor will go far.—Janet Colvin, Huntington Beach, Calif. Power has the dumbest looking pan I ever saw.—Cecelia Schwarz, New York, N. Y. Bob's a grand fellow. Don't break him down by any petty remarks.—Ruth Watanabe, Dinuba, Calif. Power is a playboy. He goes with three girls while Taylor only goes with one. Power's legs look like those of a crane, and his face looks like the inside of a lemon pie. I'd be satisfied if I never saw that guy in another picture.—J. T. Taylor, Tex.

From the Power-ites

Tyrone Power is tall, dark and handsome, while Bob Taylor is merely tall and dark.—Dorothy Saunders, No. Platte, Neb. Ty gives me an awfully nice feeling when he looks at the heroine in that attractive manner of his. I just won't miss one of his pictures.—Thelma L. Smith. The crown that Valentino wore is not slipping, it has just been polished up and is being worn again after lying useless for a decade. Once again we are investing in scrapbooks, jars of paste and shears; again we are sending our hard-earned quarters for a precious, signed photograph. Power is King.—Mrs. H. Tallman, Omaha, Neb. I saw "Camille" against my better judgment and got stung. To me it was a series of stills—Garbo, Taylor, Garbo, Taylor. I think Power has it all over Taylor.—Helen Berry, Ephrata, Wash. Please make him a College Romeo and put him in a college picture.—Helen Cook, Rensselaer, N. Y. I never want to see Taylor again as long as I live! His face, mainly, gets on my nerves.—E. Lea, Wynnwood, Pa.

From the Neutral-ites

Personally, I wouldn't crown either one of them King, but I should like to crown the one who started all this commotion. Seriously, I enjoy seeing both of them on the screen and would even suggest both playing together in a picture, if I didn't think it would start some more of this catty chatter. I have pictures of each one in my room. (Bob's frame is a little bigger than Tyrone's!)—Blossom Browd, New York City. I don't think either one ever will be King, for another person is already there and has been for years—none other than Clark Gable.—Marion Guskey, San Jose, Calif. Phooey! I'll take Mickey Rooney first. Pretty boys with beautiful teeth and lovely smiles make nice extra men at parties, but as a steady boy friend, I'll have Gary Cooper.—Miriam Maskes, Chicago, Ill. It's too much trouble to decide which one I like best, because the more nice boy friends that come along, the more nice boy friends I like. It's the same way with actors. I still like Clark Gable, by the way, and I have a secret yen for Don Ameche.—Esther Skaggs, Indiana.

★★★★ Wee Willie Winkie

Shirley Temple is growing up and so are her pictures. For the transition period in the young lady's career—not to mention her physical development—her studio has wisely chosen a vehicle so good that its star is subordinated to the story. Never once—as has happened so often in the past—does "Wee Willie Winkie" reach a point where Shirley is forced to tap dance. In fact, she even sings only once—a brief and effective rendition of "Auld Lang Syne" at the deathbed of Victor McLaglen.

John Ford has directed the picture with noteworthy restraint, and never once gives in to the over-sentimental type of thing which some moviegoers have come to dread in Shirley Temple pictures. Altogether, "Wee Willie Winkie" is a fine, moving and exciting motion picture. It offers excellent entertainment for discriminating audiences who like only the best in films, and it will win little Miss Temple many new admirers among skeptics who have avoided her efforts in the past.

There are splendid performances by the entire cast, particularly that of Victor McLaglen. His "Sergeant MacDuff" is the best thing he's done since "The Informer." Others outstanding are C. Aubrey Smith, Cesar Romero, Michael Whalen, June Lang, Douglas Scott and Clyde Cook. —20th Century-Fox.

★★★ New Faces of 1937

This turns out to be vaudeville de luxe and well worth anyone's price of admission, if it's vaudeville entertainment you're after for the evening. Though the names alone could be counted on for bits of real entertainment, the plot has been so cleverly constructed that the whole picture can come under that heading. Joe Penner, Milton Berle, Parkyakarkus, Jerome Cowan, Harriet Hilliard, Lorraine Krueger, Patricia Wilder, Thelma Leeds, Tommy Mack and William Brady are just a few of the galaxy of stars here presented and each offers a bit of his or her own specialty—and in top form.

All this diversity of talent is tied together by a producer who is out to put on shows—preferably "flops" so he can coin a little money by underhanded methods. He inveigles enthusiastic talent into working for him, promising untold fame and money if they'll stick by him. Justice, of course, wins out, as it has a way of doing in celluloid, so the producer goes to his ruin and the cast to fame on their own when they take over the show. Romantic interest is kept at high pitch by Harriet Hilliard and handsome William Brady. Dancing numbers which deserve special mention are those of the Three Chocolateers, the Loria Brothers and attractive Ann Miller. Songs you'll hum on the way home are "New Faces" and "Love is Never Out of Season." Noteworthy also, are the elaborate sets which contribute to the effectiveness of the goings-on. You are no doubt familiar with the copyrighted antics of most of the cast, so we'll only add that they and the picture come up to expectations. —RKO.

★★ Parnell

Covering a little-known period in the history of Ireland, "Parnell," in the hands of Director Stahl, is a painstaking and carefully made picture aided and abetted by the names of Clark Gable and Myrna Loy and the performances of Miss Loy and several members of the supporting cast. As Charles Stewart Parnell, "the uncrowned king of Ireland," Clark Gable is too placid to convince audiences that he's the fiery patriot who came so close to winning home rule for Ireland. Myrna Loy, on the other hand, is charming and capable as the lovely Katie O'Shea, for whose love Parnell sacrifices his political career. Particular attention is paid to detail, and the production itself can only be described as handsome.

Most touching moment is a love scene played by Gable and Loy against a background of London fog. Among the numerous excellent performances by the supporting cast, the outstanding ones are contributed by Edna Mae Oliver, Billie Burke, Alan Marshall, Donald Crisp, George Zucco, Montagu Love and Berton Churchill, and a brief speech by Brandon Tynan, as an old Irish patriot, drew cheers from a preview audience. But "Parnell" is still a dull picture. Directed by John M. Stahl.—M-G-M.

★ The Great Gambini

If you're addicted to murder-mysteries, you really shouldn't pass up this particular picture. For you will find enough "mystery" to keep you guessing right through the last reel and part of the way home. You will swear that at least six characters in the story committed the murder and will be pleasantly surprised to find yourself all wrong when Paramount lets you in on the secret. The story has some novel twists which add to the entertainment. For instance, after it has been shown that each character in the play could logically have

HELEN! YOU'VE BEEN HOLDING OUT ON ME—I NEVER KNEW YOU HAD SUCH A GORGEOUS FIGURE
THANKS TO IRONIZED YEAST

THOUSANDS GAIN 10 TO 25 LBS.—QUICK WITH NEW IRONIZED YEAST TABLETS

WHY be ashamed to be seen because of a skinny, scrawny figure? Thousands of girls have put on 10 to 25 pounds of solid flesh in a few weeks—with these amazing little Ironized Yeast tablets.

No matter how thin and rundown you may be, you may easily gain normal, attractive curves this quick way—also naturally clear skin, new pep, and all the new friends and good times these bring.

Why they build up so quick

Doctors now say thousands of people are thin and rundown only because they don't get enough yeast vitamins (Vitamin B) and iron in their daily food.

Now, by a new process, the vitamins from the special rich yeast used in making English ale, world-renowned for its medicinal properties, are concentrated to 7 times their strength in ordinary yeast. This 7-power concentrate is combined with 3 kinds of iron (organic, inorganic and hemoglobin iron). Pasteurized English ale yeast and other valuable tonic ingredients are added. Finally, for your protection and benefit, every batch of Ironized Yeast is tested and retested biologically, to insure full vitamin strength.

committed the crime, a new note in murder films is handed the audience by interrupting the picture before the denouement, and giving the audience a minute in which to solve the murder—with the time clocked off on the screen.

Akim Tamiroff is a magician and mind reader who warns the parties interested of the impending murder, and then mysteriously appears to help solve it, thereby putting William Demarest, the not-so-smart detective and his stooge, Edward Brophy, to shame. Tamiroff easily dominates the picture with his excellent performance, while other roles are well handled by Reginald Denny, Genevieve Tobin, Marian Marsh and John Trent. Directed by Charles Vidor.—Paramount.

★★ Mountain Music

Bob Burns and Martha Raye pep up that part of Arkansas which is this picture's locale. Burns, somewhat pixilated by a fall on his head in his youth, is subject to a dual personality which comes upon him whenever he gets a blow on the head, and out of which he emerges only when drenched with water. When the story opens, Bob is to marry Terry Walker, to end the feud between their two families, but she loves his brother, John Howard. Burns gets a rap on the head and leaves the bride at the altar. Running away, he appropriates a swanky car and meets Martha Raye. Being still semi-conscious, he falls madly in love with her. Their love affair is hectic and hilarious, with Martha able to hold his love only by bumping him on the head occasionally.

Burns and his inimitable Arkan-saws are excellent, as is "Moutha" Raye. The supporting cast includes Fuzzy Knight, John Howard, Terry Walker, Olin Howland, Jan Duggan, and Charles Timblin, who aid and abet the two comedians with good effect. Though the script is pretty sketchy in spots, the crazy antics of Burns and Martha Raye make up for its deficiencies. Directed by Robert Florey.—Paramount.

★ Sweetheart of the Navy

Down along the waterfront Cecilia Parker runs a joint which isn't doing so well because most of the sailor lads prefer visiting to spending. Cecilia's partner, a rat of the first water, runs out on her with all the dough, leaving our heroine in what can only be described as a fix. But the Navy always comes through, and this time they plan a boxing match between the bullying fleet champ and Eric Linden, a gob with Annapolis ambitions. The fleet commandant calls off the fight, but Eric, who has fallen in love with Miss Parker, goes through with things anyway, wins the fight and saves the day, if not the picture, for his loved one.

This is a minor item on the month's entertainment calendar—one of the reasons why dual bills were born. Miss Parker is too demure for her role, but she puts over an agreeable song called, "I Want You to Want Me." Eric Linden tries hard to be convincing as the sailor boy, and Roger Imhoff turns in a workmanlike performance as the fleet commandant. Best performance in the picture is that of Bernadene Hays, who plays a tough cafe hostess. Directed by Duncan Mansfield.—Grand National.

EYE CREAM

Aids in counteracting dry condition of skin around the eyes which causes wrinkles, crows-feet, etc. Smooths, softens and refines texture of skin. A rich cream containing the precious vitamin "D".

The first and worst signs of age or fatigue show their traces more definitely and quickly in the tender area around the eyes. Eye wrinkles, lined eyelids, crows-feet, puffiness and circles are apt to make their appearance early in this region. These tender and sensitive skin tissues lose their natural oils much more quickly than any other facial area.

Maybelline Eye Cream, unlike ordinary facial creams, is especially designed for the care and preservation of the youthful appearance of the skin around the eyes. The fine, rich, blended oils contained in this cream are highly beneficial to this area, and there is the added benefit of "sunshine" element in wonderful vitamin "D". jaunt to publicize a bevy of screen cuties and round up new talent. He is so phenomenally unsuccessful, his bosses fire him, but he runs across Jeanne Madden on an amateur program and brings her back to Hollywood. Balance of the picture is concerned with his efforts, first to get the girl a career, and then to get her a husband, preferably himself.

Don Woods is personable and competent in the lead, and Miss Madden does well as the singer who becomes a picture star. Best in the supporting cast are Rosalind Marquis, as the menace, Fred Lawrence as a movie star, and Joseph Crehan and Charles Halton, as producers. Directed by William Clemens.—Warner Bros.

★ Wild Money

For the first few reels you'll be wondering what connection the title can possibly have with this picture. For never were pennies squeezed within an inch of their lives as they are here by Edward Everett Horton. We find him as the parsimonious auditor of a newspaper, and the role gives him a grand chance to exploit all the old tricks and some new ones besides. When our hero goes on a resort vacation the money breaks loose. Being on the groundfloor when a millionaire's kidnapping takes place, Horton "scoops" his own smart-aleck reporters, and spares no expense in keeping the story exclusive until he can "break" the complete event. How he manages to outwit rival reporters as well as his own at every turn, provides plenty of hilarity. One reporter he can't outwit, however, is attractive Louise Campbell, femme news-sleuth, who has designs on the fluttery Horton heart.

Others in the cast are Lynne Overman, Esther Dale, Lucien Littlefield, and Benny Baker. They do competent work, while the rest of the cast is satisfactory in every respect. But "Wild Money" is still a Horton picture from first to last. Directed by Louis King.—Paramount.

★ You Can't Beat Love

You won't lose sleep over this picture, but you probably won't fall asleep during it, either. In short, it's pretty fair entertainment considering that nothing sensational was expected of it. Preston Foster's performance outshines the rest. Here he has a new type of role—that of a playboy who can't resist a dare. This trait gets him and his faithful valet, Herbert Mundin, into no end of troubles, from ditch-digging to running for mayor. Trying to get the mayoralty presents more difficulties than running into corrupt city politics, for Foster finds that it's Joan Fontaine's father whom he is aiming to defeat. It's a little tough to try to win the daughter while beating the father, but this situation provides an amusing plot on which to hang the story. The conflict between Foster and the crooked chief of police, Berton Churchill, and Paul Hurst, as Butch Mehaffey, who would like to do a little police-chiefing himself, provides the really hilarious moments.

Joan Fontaine in her second film proves that she is really a good movie bet, though right now stronger on the looks than the histrionics. An outstandingly good characterization is given by Barbara Pepper as the voluptuous moll of Harold Huber, one of the city's first racketeers, and also by Paul Guilfoyle, as Louie the Weasel, Huber's right-hand man. William Brisbane and Alan Bruce are acceptable in smaller roles. Directed by Christy Cabanne.—RKO-Radio.

ture, with no variation on the original theme. This time the robbers ply their trade by dynamiting armored payroll cars, but they get their just dues in the final reel, after the inevitable chase scene. Robert Wilcox is a young employe of the armored car concern who is fired because he has had a prison record. He joins up with the gangsters, and they're the only ones who don't know he's really spying on them. Everything in the plot unfolds just as you expect it will, and the whole thing adds up to minor melodrama for the less fastidious audiences.

The best performance in the piece is that of Irving Pichel as a philosophical but cold-blooded chief of the mobsters. Novelty of his role is that he's the only member of the mob who doesn't talk in the accepted gangster vernacular. Cesar Romero is competent as Pichel's aide, and Robert Wilcox and Judith Barrett handle the romantic leads effectively. Best in the supporting cast are Bill Lundigan, David Oliver and Tom Kennedy. Directed by Lewis Foster.—Universal.

★★ Ever Since Eve

An ugly duckling by day—a glamorous beauty by night. Before you say "Where have I heard that plot before?" let us inform you that it's the theme of the new Marion Davies picture—a theme which Marion has employed more than once before, but not with such success.

This time she's a stenographer who continually loses her job because of her sex appeal. Determined to work in spite of her breathless beauty, she dons a wig and horn-rimmed glasses and gets herself a position with Robert Montgomery, a young author whose hobby is anything but work. You know the rest of the story, of course, but the script writers have inserted several good gags and situations, and there is an amusing broad comedy thread supplied by Patsy Kelly and Allan Jenkins. Bob Montgomery makes his author completely believable, and there are capable performances by Louise Fazenda, as a publisher and Frank McHugh, as a writer of The Motorcycle Girls series. Miss Davies is more at home in her wig and glasses than she is in her more glamorous moments. Directed by Lloyd Bacon.—Warner Bros.

★ Midnight Madonna

The main purpose of this slightly over-sentimental melodrama is to introduce Kitty Clancy, a personable young lady of four who looks much like the early Shirley Temple. News of a new child actress on the film horizon is not always glad tidings, but in this case it must be reported that Miss Clancy is cute without being precocious, and she doesn't seem to have the bag of tricks which makes you want to lay hands on the usual kiddie star.

The plot of the picture has to do with the parents' fight over the custody of their daughter. The husband, a meanie, convinces a judge the child should be his, even though his real reason is to come into his daughter's inheritance. But he reckons without Warren William, an honest gambler who falls in love with the child's mother, kidnaps the judge and makes a few changes in the situation.

Mr. William ably portrays his sympathetic role, and there are good performances by Robert Baldwin and Mady Correl, as the child's parents. In the supporting cast, Edward Ellis, as the judge, is outstanding. Directed by James Flood.—Paramount.

★ The Emperor's Candlesticks

"The Emperor's Candlesticks" ranks as one of the season's major disappointments. With a cast headed by William Powell, Luise Rainer and Robert Young, audiences have a right to expect big—or at least fairly entertaining—things of this film. Unfortunately, the big moment never arrives, and the whole thing somehow fails to come off. Most of the blame belongs to the director, who never once achieves the light touch so necessary to a plot saturated with intrigue and the slick doings of international spies. The production is handsomely mounted, indicating that a good deal of money has been spent on it. It must be admitted that when M-G-M makes a flop, it makes a brilliant one.

The story revolves about a Polish spy (William Powell), a Russian spy (Luise Rainer) and a pair of silver candlesticks. Each of the principals has hidden an important message in one of the candlesticks, and most of the picture concerns their efforts to retrieve them. William Powell gives his usual smooth performance in spite of the fact that he objected to his role throughout the picture's shooting. Robert Young does what he can with a rather negative role, and Frank Morgan tries to be amusing with no engaging dialogue to aid him. Maureen O'Sullivan is adequate. Biggest disappointment is the work of Luise Rainer, last year's winner of the Academy's gold statuette. Miss Rainer, whose previous performances have all been brilliant, gives her role an overtone of heavy tragedy which is exactly what it doesn't need. We imagine there was a knock on her door the morning after the preview, and a voice said, "Miss Rainer, I'm the man for the statuette." Directed by George Fitzmaurice. —M-G-M.

I had to do it."

The reaction was invariably the same. Everyone said, "Wasn't Lionel Barrymore wonderful?" True enough he is and the very things that endear him to us are these tricks we have come to know so well.

EDWARD ARNOLD seldom goes the limit on scene-stealing unless as a last resort. One of the better known heavies, he too has his little ways of preventing colleagues from taking a scene. It is frequently said, "Edward Arnold walked away with the picture. Gee, he's clever!"

There are probably more speculations about Arnold than all the young Lotharios that keep ladies' hearts fluttering each season. One among the many is just how he manages such a hearty laugh, at such odd moments during his pictures. This, probably, more than any other thing, has accounted for a large part of his humanness as a picture personality.

Again it is the old story. Those witnessing the film naturally turn their eyes to him when they hear this deep guffaw. The person playing in the scene with him is momentarily lost. As a result, Arnold holds his audience more during the time he is before the camera than the people who play scenes with him.

An amusing incident of Mr. Arnold's never being at a loss for retaliation happened during a recent picture. It seems one of the better known stage actresses played opposite him and, in one scene, continually edged Arnold around until he was back to the camera—an old stage trick. Arnold let her finish, then facing away from the lens, he calmly began scratching his rear extremity. Needless to say the lady's scene was lost, all eyes were on Mr. Arnold and the portion of his anatomy that itched.

Victor Moore is another old timer who has captured a nation and holds the interest of all who see him. For many years one of the leading professionals in the theatre, he has now become an outstanding personality on the screen.

Needless to say, he is among the cleverest comedians ever to stride across a sound stage. When he outsmarts his co-workers and walks off with the honors, it's something of interest to every movie fan.

Victor Moore has attuned his acting to his facial expressions and with the finesse of a diplomat makes a strong bid for sympathy in everything he does. Life equipped him with a pathetic appearance and, with this to start on, Moore has trained his voice to match his looks. To all this, he has added a natural sense of comedy timing when reading lines.

In one of his pictures he played the part of Moon Face, the killer. Naturally, when he told people he was a desperado they laughed, and when he turned his pathetic face to the audience, with a shrug, he threw them into fits of laughter. He cleverly portrays the type person who tries and tries, but gets little, yet is never disheartened.

In "Make Way for Tomorrow," he portrayed a Grandfather who, married for fifty years, was separated from his wife in their old age. It was a pathetic part and the invincible Moore played it to the hilt, with the result that he walked away with top billing.

Everyone to his own taste, of course. My taste would be to see these pastmasters in this movie art all together, each with his bag of tricks. This in the vernacular of Hollywood would be gigantic!

Information Desk

Unsettled, medicine forgotten, Clark moved restlessly from job to job. A lean, lanky, disillusioned fellow, purposeless, yet with a strong hunger for life that drove him on and on. Acting, when he got his first part, was just another job to him—no different from driving a truck or sawing a log. Through his association with a cheap little barnstorming company, he met Franz Doerfler, the girl whose love was to change the contours of his life. She was strangely attracted to this sullen, reckless chap. She sensed his great unhappiness. She wanted to help him. For three years they were inseparable. Their romance is a tale of mutual sacrifices, of willing sharing of the few worldly possessions they owned. It is the most beautiful thing in Clark Gable's life. Several times he proposed marriage and was refused. To Franz, Clark was her baby. Marriage would have spoiled that relationship.

And so they drifted apart, Clark to sudden fame, Franz to obscurity. In 1924, when he was 23, Gable married Josephine Dillon, elocution teacher, and several years his senior. Their marriage didn't last, but, somehow, having been married did things to Clark's character, gave him the feeling that he had come of age, that his life was of some worth. Through Lionel Barrymore, under whose direction he had played a Broadway role, he was given a screen test at M-G-M. Neither his studio nor Barrymore has ever had cause to regret this generosity. Ever since his success in "A Free Soul," with Norma Shearer, he has been the world's Number One screen actor. On the upswing of his career, Clark married Rhea Langham. At present the couple is separated, though they have never been divorced.

LORETTA YOUNG (Last printed October 1936. Total number of requests since then, 389.) The bright sun of California ripened Loretta Young early. Into the brief span of her twenty-four years, she has packed more real life than many a woman twice her years. At fourteen she played opposite Lon Chaney in "Laugh, Clown, Laugh." At seventeen she became the bride of Grant Withers in one of Hollywood's most glamorous elopements. A year later, saddened, matured, she divorced her dream man when she found that you can't live on dreams alone. Thus, at eighteen, Loretta Young was a divorcee, a woman whose bitter experience had given her the poise and wisdom which would not permit her ever again to marry unwisely.

At eighteen she could point with justifiable pride to a career—a career that had been first foreshadowed when she was four, and Mae Murray had been so captivated with the charm of little Gretchen Young (the name with which she was christened) that she had pleaded with Gretchen's mother to let her adopt the child, and ultimately compromised by making Mrs. Young accept tuition for Gretchen's dancing lessons. A career that was imperiled by the beauty of Loretta's two older sisters, Polly Ann and Sally, and by the fact that Mrs. Young had very rigid ideas of how little Gretchen should be brought up and immured her precious baby in a convent, instead of having her make the rounds of the producers as so many other movie mothers would have done.

But the luck which has always turned against Loretta Young in love was with her when it came to carving a career for herself. Her sisters had gone shopping with Mrs. Young when a call came from the studio for Polly Ann. Because money was money, and Loretta knew the family finances couldn't afford passing up any opportunity, she answered the call herself, giving her name as Polly Ann, and proudly bringing home her first pay check.

Later, cast opposite the great Chaney—solely because of her beautiful face, Loretta got her first taste of gall. Her director was a tough Irishman. He knew the kid couldn't act. But he thought he knew how to make her act. His method was cruel but effective. He insulted Loretta, made her life a hell on earth, so that the strong emotions she gave way to on the set were real. He taught her what it feels like to act. To him, more than to anyone else, she owes her career.

But, just as surely as you envy Loretta that career, she envies you the love that has made your life happy. She has known only the love that saddens. She was in love with George Brent. He married Ruth Chatterton. She was devoted to a handsome young business man. He died of an operation. She was swept blindly into a romance with an actor whom she knew she could never marry, and only when she realized how much she loved him did she renounce him—a renunciation followed by a critical illness and nervous breakdown. Despite persistent personal troubles, she has gone right on making pictures, and you see her next in "Wife, Doctor, and Nurse," with Warner Baxter.

AMERICA! Let me thank all those fan clubs who have sent in their addresses so far to Modern Screen's Information Desk. It has been real swell of you to be so prompt, and I can assure you that your promptness will pay big dividends in the form of new members for your club and new popularity for the star to whom your club is devoted.

To those club members who didn't happen to see the notice in the August issue, let me explain why it is that the Information Desk is so anxious to have the address of your club. We are preparing a Fan Club Directory (which will contain the names and addresses of all clubs) to assist those fans who would like to join some club in honor of their favorite, but don't know whether one exists or where to find it. We want to make this Directory as complete as possible, and to do so need the coöperation of every club in the United States and Canada. So let's be hearing from you real soon!

SHIRLEY TEMPLE (Last printed November 1936. Total number of requests since then 378.) First little lady of the land is Shirley Temple, and she cashes a fatter pay check than the President of the United States. At the age of six, she signed a seven-year contract involving almost half a million dollars, and that was right after she had performed for her bosses in only one little picture. The funny thing was that the only one gambling in the deal was Shirley. The kid should have stalled for more dough.

A question everyone wants answered is, "Who's the genius behind Shirley Temple?" In these days of ghost writers and ghost everything else, no one can take a celebrity at face value. It's sophisticated to believe in ghosts, and we all want to know who does the ghosting for Shirley. And, as a matter of fact, twenty-five per cent of Shirley's laurels could in all fairness be shifted to other brows. With a less aggressive and intelligent mother, it is hard to say what might have become of her. It was her mother who sent the three-year-old baby to dancing school; her mother again who brought the tot's fancy steps and dimples to the attention of Educational Pictures' scouts.

And though tiny Shirley managed to negotiate the rest of the uphill road to fame in high, Mother Temple's services have never become superfluous. It's Mother Temple that keeps the child unspoiled, keeps her, above all, a real child.

While we're at this business of enumerating the geniuses in Shirley's young life, it mightn't be a bad idea to mention Dame Fortune, the kind old gal who arranged for Shirley an unexpected and unconventional rendezvous with a very important Fox songwriter. Dressed impeccably in her finest gingham, Shirley was attending the preview of one of her Baby Burlesques. The little tike wanted a real lowdown on the critics. Instead, all her attention gravitated to a nice man who flirted with her out of the corner of his eye while he arranged a date with her ma at the Fox Studios. And that was the heavy date that won Shirley the role in "Stand Up and Cheer" with Jimmy Dunn that skyrocketed her to immediate stardom.

They say that birds of a feather flock together, and it's no wonder that people with brains and talent flock around little Shirley. There is no genius behind Shirley Temple. But there are plenty around her. Not the least of the clever things they've done for Shirley is to put Johanna Speyri's beautiful story, "Heidi," into scenario form for her, and the picture's now in production.

RACHEL GILMAN, Newark, New Jersey: Lily Pons' pet hobby is the collection of little nick-nacks that are of no earthly use, but usually of great antiquity or sentimental value. Her collection includes a jewel box that once belonged to Queen Marie Antoinette (the poor gal that lost her head in the French revolution); a snuff box that Lord Nelson used for an occasional hearty sneeze; and a tiny music box, made of tortoise shell, that plays a cute little Austrian folk song.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE . . .

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

Draw me!

TRY FOR AN Art SCHOLARSHIP

Copy this girl and send us your drawing — perhaps you'll win a COMPLETE FEDERAL COURSE FREE! This contest is for amateurs, so if you like to draw do not hesitate to enter.

Prizes for Five Best Drawings — FIVE COMPLETE ART COURSES FREE, including drawing outfits. (Value of each course, $215.00.)

FREE! Each contestant whose drawing shows sufficient merit will receive a grading and advice as to whether he or she has, in our estimation, artistic talent worth developing.

Nowadays design and color play an important part in the sale of almost everything. Therefore the artist, who designs merchandise or illustrates advertising has become a real factor in modern industry. Machines can never displace him. Many Federal students, both men and girls who are now commercial designers or illustrators capable of earning $1000 to $5000 yearly have been trained by the Federal Course. Here's a splendid opportunity to test your talent. Read the rules and send your drawing to the address below.

RULES

This contest open only to amateurs, 16 years old or more. Professional commercial artists and students of Federal Schools are not eligible. 1. Make drawing of girl 8 inches high, on paper 9 inches high. Draw only the girl, no lettering. 2. Use only pencil or pen. 3. We return no drawings. 4. Print your name, address, age, occupation on back of drawing. 5. All drawings must be received by August 31st, 1937. Prizes will be awarded for drawings best in proportion and neatness by Federal Schools Faculty.

Happy Relief From Painful Backache

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

Little Tommy Kelly, the Bronx Tom Sawyer, hasn't had much time to get his bearings in Hollywood, for he's been rushed right into "Adventures of T. S."

GOODBYE DANDRUFF!

The Truth About Soap Shampoos

1. Bacteria and dandruff scattered but not removed by ordinary soap shampoo.

Soap Shampoo

2. All bacteria, dandruff and other foreign matter completely destroyed and removed by Fitch Shampoo.

Fitch Shampoo

Tested and Approved 4580 Good Housekeeping Bureau

There is a simple, easy way to rid yourself of dandruff with the very first application. All that is necessary is to use a shampoo that completely dissolves dandruff and then washes it away.

Repeated laboratory, as well as practical, tests show that ordinary shampoos will not dissolve dandruff. Fitch's Dandruff Remover Shampoo dissolves every speck of dandruff instantly—under a money-back guarantee—and then washes it away. It rinses clean in hard or soft water. Equally as good for blondes as brunettes. Try it today! Sold at drug counters. Professional applications at beauty and barber shops.

After and between Fitch Shampoos Fitch's Ideal Hair Tonic is the ideal preparation to stimulate the hair roots and give new life, luster and beauty to your hair

Gregory Ratoff, since becoming director on "Life of a Lancer Spy," seems to have quite forgotten that he was once the crankiest actor on the lot about quitting on the dot of five. The first day's shooting, six o'clock came, and still no sign from the director. At seven, he pleaded with Dolores Del Rio to stay for "just one more scene of your beYOUtiful acting," and at nine, he conceded that the company might eat a sandwich, but just one apiece. At one, Ratoff agreed that it was getting late, and at 1:30, the company left for home with Ratoff's generous wish that they sleep well. To do just that, all the principals slept for the greater part of the next day, and Director Ratoff was deeply grieved at their tardiness on the set.

And who was the glamorous beauty at a recent cocktail party who left her teeth in a sandwich? Those pearly teeth, you know, on many of the cinema beauties, are put there by a Hollywood dentist. They're porcelain caps over the original teeth, and woe be to anyone who gets hungry enough to forget that she's a glamor girl.

A mere $1,500,000, which includes a beard for Tyrone Power, has been allotted for the "Stanley and Livingstone" opus—and most of that has been put in the well-manicured hands of Osa Johnson, who will conduct the location trip through darkest Africa. At a press luncheon given by the studio recently, Osa surprised everyone by turning out to be the ultra-feminine type. It was impossible to imagine her staring a lion in the face, or setting off to shoot an elephant before breakfast. Feminine to the last detail, she even arrived at the luncheon in her honor an hour late.

The good citizens of Culver City, where the sun sometimes softens the Chamber of Commerce, have circulated a petition to change the name of their abode to Hollywood. Culver City, they have suddenly realized, is the home of some of the biggest studios. People all over the world see their product and believe, in Culver City's opinion, that it comes from Hollywood. And that's why the Chamber of Commerce wants the change in title. And Hollywood, after seeing some of the pictures, will probably change its name to Culver City.

Swimming pools are as common as berets in this part of the country, but leave it to Sam Goldwyn to fix up the most colossal, stupendous and also the wettest of the lot—981,250 gallons of it, to be exact. The pool covers an acre out on the Goldwyn holdings, and you'll be seeing it in "Hurricane," if the cast hasn't swallowed it up. For C. Aubrey Smith and Raymond Massey constructed a diving board on the edge of this supposed South Sea isthmus, and Dorothy Lamour and Mary Astor are taking advantage of the situation by taking diving lessons every morning while the picture is in production.

Out on the "Exclusive" set, Charlie Ruggles ran head on to a camera in his rush to get out for lunch. By the time he returned to the set, one eye was a livid purple. Director Al Hall greeted him joyfully, "Say, that was swell of you, Charlie! We'll shoot that scene right where Fred MacMurray gives you the shiner." Charlie was so flabbergasted that the scene with Fred was shot before he had a chance to say anything. When Hall said cheerfully, "Okay, Charlie, wipe it off now, and we'll go on to another scene," Ruggles said wearily, "Okay, but I'll need a good beefsteak to wipe it off on."

Charles Boyer and his little lady, Pat Paterson, take in the "Parnell" preview.

Mrs. Barclay Warburton jr. plays an exciting game of tennis—

TENNIS—Mrs. Warburton plays a man's game of tennis—hard-driving, strategic. Her appearance draws a gallery, whether she is playing at Palm Beach or in Southampton. As for smoking, "All I want to smoke," says Mrs. Warburton, "is Camels. Camels are so mild, they never get on my nerves!"

WHAT TO WEAR—Mrs. Warburton (foreground above) looks charmingly cool in white sharkskin, after a hard game of tennis. The pleated shorts, knee-top length—the new longer type—are preferred by this unerring stylist. "It's like a woman to enjoy costlier things. So, naturally, I smoke costlier tobaccos," says Mrs. Warburton. "Smoking Camels perks up my energy... gives me the grandest lift!"

TEA—Mrs. Barclay Warburton, Jr. entertains frequently at "Sandblown," her Southampton place, and at "Saracen Farm," the family estate near Philadelphia. "An appetizing dish," she remarks, "has a fuller flavor when a Camel keeps it company. There's no denying—smoking Camels at mealtime helps digestion!" As you smoke Camels, the flow of digestive fluids is increased. Alkaline digestive fluids that mean so much to mealtime enjoyment!

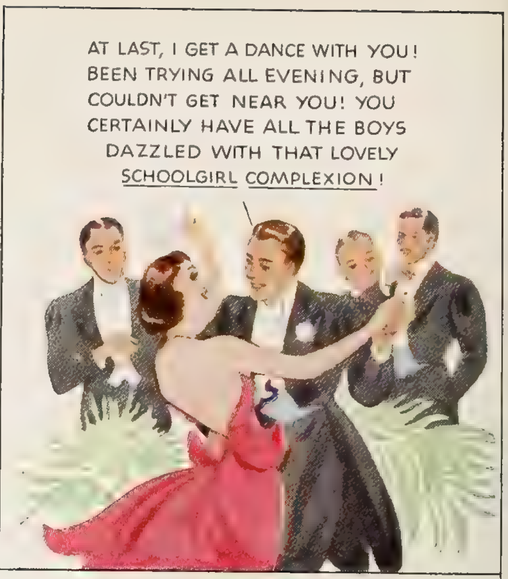
SO YOU WON'T DANCE, GINGER ROGERS!

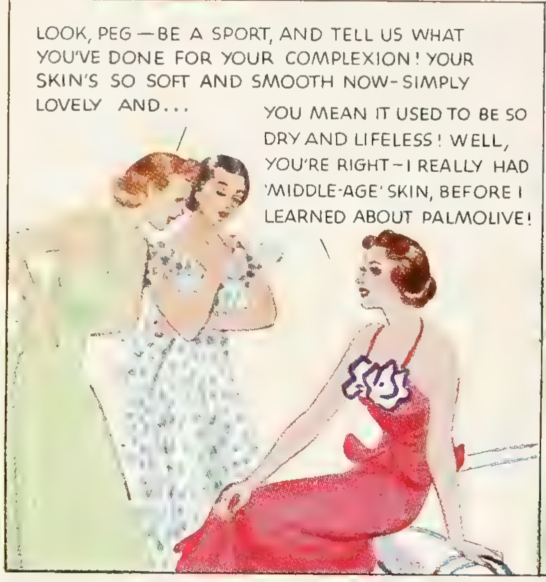
NO MORE WORRY

ABOUT DRY, LIFELESS "MIDDLE-AGE" SKIN!

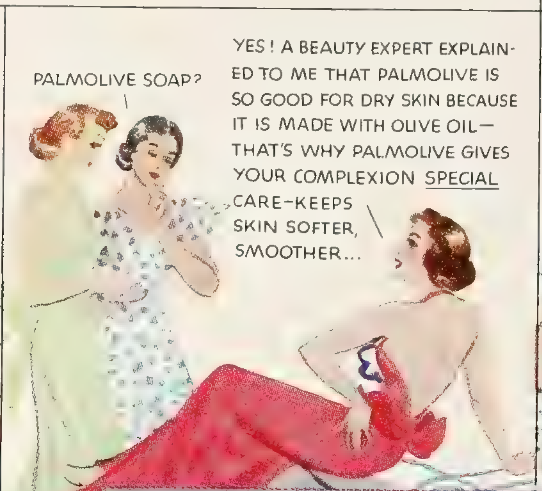
Every girl should read Peg's story!



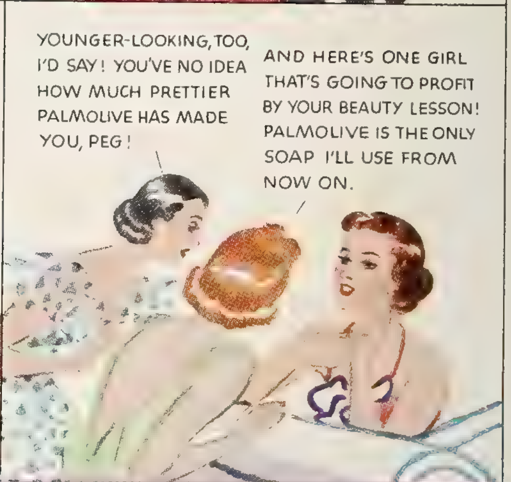
AT LAST, I GET A DANCE WITH YOU! BEEN TRYING ALL EVENING, BUT COULDN'T GET NEAR YOU! YOU CERTAINLY HAVE ALL THE BOYS DAZZLED WITH THAT LOVELY SCHOOLGIRL COMPLEXION!



LOOK, PEG — BE A SPORT, AND TELL US WHAT YOU'VE DONE FOR YOUR COMPLEXION! YOUR SKIN'S SO SOFT AND SMOOTH NOW - SIMPLY LOVELY AND...
YOU MEAN IT USED TO BE SO DRY AND LIFELESS! WELL, YOU'RE RIGHT - I REALLY HAD 'MIDDLE-AGE' SKIN, BEFORE I LEARNED ABOUT PALMOLIVE!



PALMOLIVE SOAP?
YES! A BEAUTY EXPERT EXPLAINED TO ME THAT PALMOLIVE IS SO GOOD FOR DRY SKIN BECAUSE IT IS MADE WITH OLIVE OIL — THAT'S WHY PALMOLIVE GIVES YOUR COMPLEXION SPECIAL CARE - KEEPS SKIN SOFTER, SMOOTHER...



YOUNGER-LOOKING, TOO, I'D SAY! YOU'VE NO IDEA HOW MUCH PRETTIER PALMOLIVE HAS MADE YOU, PEG!
AND HERE'S ONE GIRL THAT'S GOING TO PROFIT BY YOUR BEAUTY LESSON! PALMOLIVE IS THE ONLY SOAP I'LL USE FROM NOW ON.

WHY PALMOLIVE, MADE WITH OLIVE OIL, GIVES COMPLEXIONS A SPECIAL CARE ... KEEPS SKIN SOFT, SMOOTH, YOUNG!

Palmolive is made from a special blend of Olive and Palm Oils—nature's finest beauty oils. Naturally, a soap made with these beauty oils has a different and very special lather. Palmolive's lather is so soothing, so kind to your skin. It cleanses gently, yet with a thoroughness that removes every bit of dirt and cosmetics. Keeps your skin soft, smooth and fresh . . . alive with beauty!

KEEP THAT "SCHOOLGIRL COMPLEXION" . . . GUARD AGAINST "MIDDLE-AGE" SKIN

[UNTIL SHE SMILES]

She evades close-ups...Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored the warning of "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

"SURELY," you say, "surely the world's at this girl's feet!" Blessed with beauty and dowered with grace—life seems to have given her its best.

But there is a thief that robs her loveliness, that steals away her charm. That thief is her dull, dingy and unattractive smile. Tragic? Yes, but that's the price she pays for neglect—a penalty she could have avoided.

NEVER NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

Play safe—don't risk an attractive smile—don't pay the penalties of tender gums and dull and dingy teeth! When you see that telltale warning tinge of "pink" on your tooth brush—see your dentist immediately—let him advise you.

While there may be nothing seriously wrong, don't take chances—let your dentist decide. Often, however, he will explain your condition as a "simple case of sensitive gums—gums that are the victims of our modern menus—gums robbed of work by today's soft and creamy foods." And his advice will probably be "more work and resistance for lazy gums" and, often, "the helpful stimulation of Ipana Tooth Paste and massage."

For Ipana, with massage, is especially designed to help the gums as well as keep teeth clean and sparkling. Massage a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. Circulation quickens in the gums. Gums become firmer—your teeth brighter, more lustrous.

Millions of people already have adopted the Ipana Tooth Paste and massage dental health routine. It's one simple, easy way of helping to prevent dental disorders—and with your gums more vigorous and healthy, your teeth sparkling and bright—you never need be ashamed of your smile!

REVIEWS · A TOUR

★★★★ The Life of Emile Zola

A fine and beautifully made picture, "Zola" offers Paul Muni the best chance to display his virtuosity since "The Story of Louis Pasteur," which won him the Academy Award for 1936. The Academy may as well hand Mr. Muni a permanent award, for his portrayal of the crusading French novelist is even more poignant and finely wrought than his characterization of Pasteur.

Muni takes Zola through his early struggles, through his success with Nana, through the period of his smug satisfaction with wealth and position, and on to his fiery crusade against injustice, inspired by the cruel espionage case which sent Captain Alfred Dreyfus to Devil's Island. Muni rises to his greatest heights in a court scene. Usually this type of thing is an actor's holiday, but Muni, handling it with quiet and reserve, makes it an inspired piece of acting.

A large supporting cast contributes excellent performances. Joseph Schildkraut and Gale Sondergaard, as Alfred and Lucie Dreyfus; Gloria Holden, as Zola's wife; Erin O'Brien-Moore, as Nana, and Morris Carnovsky, as Anatole France, are all outstanding. Directed by William Dieterle.—Warner Bros.

★★★ The Firefly

An operetta written by Otto Harbach and Rudolf Friml twenty-five years ago, "The Firefly" comes to the screen as a delightful and captivating musical which will more than please lovers of this type of entertainment. In case you weren't around a quarter of a century ago, "The Firefly" is a love story against a background of war between France and Spain during the time of Napoleon. That's all you need to know, since the story and the romance is at all times overshadowed by the music, which is the real star of the picture. Friml's music includes such beautiful melodies as "Giannina Mia," "A Woman's Kiss" and the lovely "Sympathy."

The picture shows Jeanette MacDonald definitely improving as an actress. Besides her unusual excellent vocal work, it offers her a chance to exhibit her dancing talent. In the male lead, Allan Jones is a surprise hit. He is in fine voice, and his pleasant personality makes him certain star material. Because Jones is so outstanding, the Nelson Eddy fans won't be too disappointed at the absence of Nelson as Jeanette's singing partner.

Outstanding in the supporting cast are Warren William, Douglas Dumbrille and a young Mexican boy named Robert Spindola, who looks and acts like Harpo Marx. Directed by Robert Z. Leonard. —M-G-M.

★★★ It's Love I'm After

Here is high comedy stirred up to its frothiest state, and dished out by a pair of champion disher-outers—Leslie Howard and Bette Davis, with the able assistance of Olivia de Havilland, Eric Blore and a fine supporting cast.

The story is completely nonsensical, and the players follow through in the same vein. Mr. H. and Miss D. are a pair of Shakespearean performers, and they're actors both on-stage and off. They're as much in love with each other as they are fond of a good rough-and-tumble fight, all of which means that when they aren't in each other's arms they're at each other's throats. The plot starts rolling when Miss de Havilland, an over-eager Howard fan, tries to make love to him. Her fiance (Patric Knowles) and Howard cook up a plan which will make the actor obnoxious to her. Unfortunately, her love for him increases with his every new villainy. When he threatens her with "a fate worse than death" she shouts "Goody!" It's that kind of a picture. However, Bette Davis joins the battle and proceeds to alter the situation in a hurry.

"It's Love I'm After" maintains a whirlwind pace that had a preview audience gasping for breath. Davis and Howard are gloriously funny, and they barely manage to steal the picture out of the competent hands of Olivia de Havilland and Eric Blore. Directed by Archie Mayo.—Warner Bros.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★★ Stella Dallas

As honest and forthright as it is dramatic and exciting, "Stella Dallas" ranks as one of the best pictures of the year. Well-deserved acclaim goes to Producer Sam Goldwyn, whose idiosyncrasies of speech are in such strange contrast to the splendid quality of his films. To make a talking picture superior to one of the most memorable films of the silent days is an achievement very few picture-making gentlemen have attained.

Perhaps the lion's share of the credit belongs to Director King Vidor, for he gets a brace of superb performances out of players whose efforts heretofore have never been particularly outstanding. Barbara Stanwyck, who has always been an actress of definite limitations, performs so skillfully in the title role that she is bound to receive serious consideration for this year's Academy Award.

Anne Shirley, as the daughter, is almost as good as Miss Stanwyck, and Allan Hale, as a drunken friend of the family, turns in a grand comedy portrayal. John Boles, as Miss Stanwyck's husband, is excellent, and Barbara O'Neill, as a society matron, is both attractive and capable. In addition, there is a splendid bit by Margaret Main, in the role of Miss Stanwyck's mother.

"Stella Dallas" has everything a fine picture should have. See it, by all means.—Samuel Goldwyn.

★★★ The Toast of New York

Delving into the battles and crises of the Wall Street financial wizards of the past century, RKO-Radio has emerged with an hour and a half of lusty, well-knit screen entertainment. How faithful the screen story is to history we don't know, nor does it matter. The picture, for the most part, combines good fun and exciting drama, which is often more than you can say for history.

Story deals with the rise and fall of Jim Fisk, who battled Cornelius Vanderbilt and Daniel Drew for Wall Street's financial throne. Edward Arnold makes Fisk a vital and interesting character, although it must be admitted that his portrayal is an exact duplicate of his "Diamond Jim Brady" of a few years ago. Mr. A. probably feels that as long as he can build a better Diamond Jim than his neighbor, the world will beat a path to the box office.

Best acting in the picture is furnished by Cary Grant, as Fisk's companion, and Frances Farmer, as Josie Mansfield, the gal whom Jim Fisk made New York's favorite actress. Grant adds to his acting stature with each new performance, and Miss Farmer, the most un-Hollywoodish looking girl in town, makes her role outstanding. Jack Oakie supplies ingratiating comedy, and there are fine portrayals of Drew and Vanderbilt by Donald Meek and Clarence Kolb. Directed by Rowland Lee.—RKO-Radio.

★★★ Topper

"Topper" is tops for laughs, and Roland Young is responsible for most of them. In fact, he steals the show—though this is the widely heralded "come-back" picture of Constance Bennett. Constance proves that she deserves another chance, however, by giving an excellent performance and looking pretty beautiful besides.

The film is one of the most original and cleverly presented that we've seen for some time. It's about a fun-loving couple—Constance Bennett and Cary Grant—who are killed in an automobile accident, and from then on the real fun starts. For they turn into two of the gayest and giddiest spooks ever to haunt the screen. Their one and only worry about being dead is that they may not be able to enter the Pearly Gates, neither having done any good deeds that he can remember. So they pick "Topper," Roland Young, as the object on whom they will perform their good deed. For Topper is the hen-pecked husband of Billie Burke, who's been taking all the fun out of his life for the past twenty years. But after the two ghosts, who can make themselves visible or invisible at will, get to work on the old boy, all is changed.

Photographic effects are outstanding—and each one of the occasions when Constance Bennett and Cary Grant fade into thin air is more uproarious than the last. In fact, this is a picture which you don't want to miss. Directed by Norman McCleod.—Hal Roach.

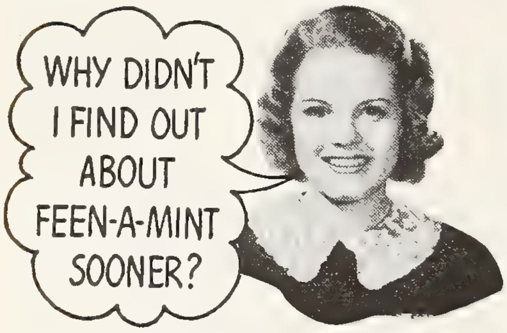
CONSTIPATED? STOMACH UPSET?

REMEMBER BOTH when you choose a laxative

EVER notice how often constipation is accompanied by an upset stomach? It's doubly important then, to choose your laxative as you would your food. Avoid heavy, greasy indigestibles. Take FEEN-A-MINT, the delicious chewing gum laxative. It's not a heavy, bulky dose. Has nothing to further burden an already overtaxed digestion. On the contrary, the very act of chewing increases the flow of mouth juices that aid digestion.

Moreover, FEEN-A-MINT's tasteless, laxative ingredient does not act in the stomach. Acts only in the intestine, which is where constipation exists—where you want the right results. No griping, nausea, discomfort, or lost sleep.



WHY DIDN'T I FIND OUT ABOUT FEEN-A-MINT SOONER?

Do you feel dull, headachy, out of sorts, due to constipation? Let FEEN-A-MINT help put the sunshine back in life. You will like its delicious flavor, and you'll find that no other type of laxative can do exactly what FEEN-A-MINT does. 6034—The newest version of the ever-popular two-piece dress achieves a nubby surface with the popcorn stitch, below.

THEY LOOK so smart and sleek and expertly tailored, anyone might assume that these new knit fashions are hard to make, but they aren't. They are so absurdly simple that a beginner can tackle them without qualms.

The two-piece dress flaunts four important new fashion details. Made of chiffon zephyr yarn it is soft as silk. Nubby surface, little girl collar, and the triangular bodice all proclaim that it came right from the Paris showings.

The hand-knit tailored jacket is going places this year over all wool frocks. Slightly widened shoulders, unbelted waistline, and elongated bodice give it an air of fine tailoring. Glenmoor tweed is the yarn. Send for your knitting instructions today. They're absolutely free.

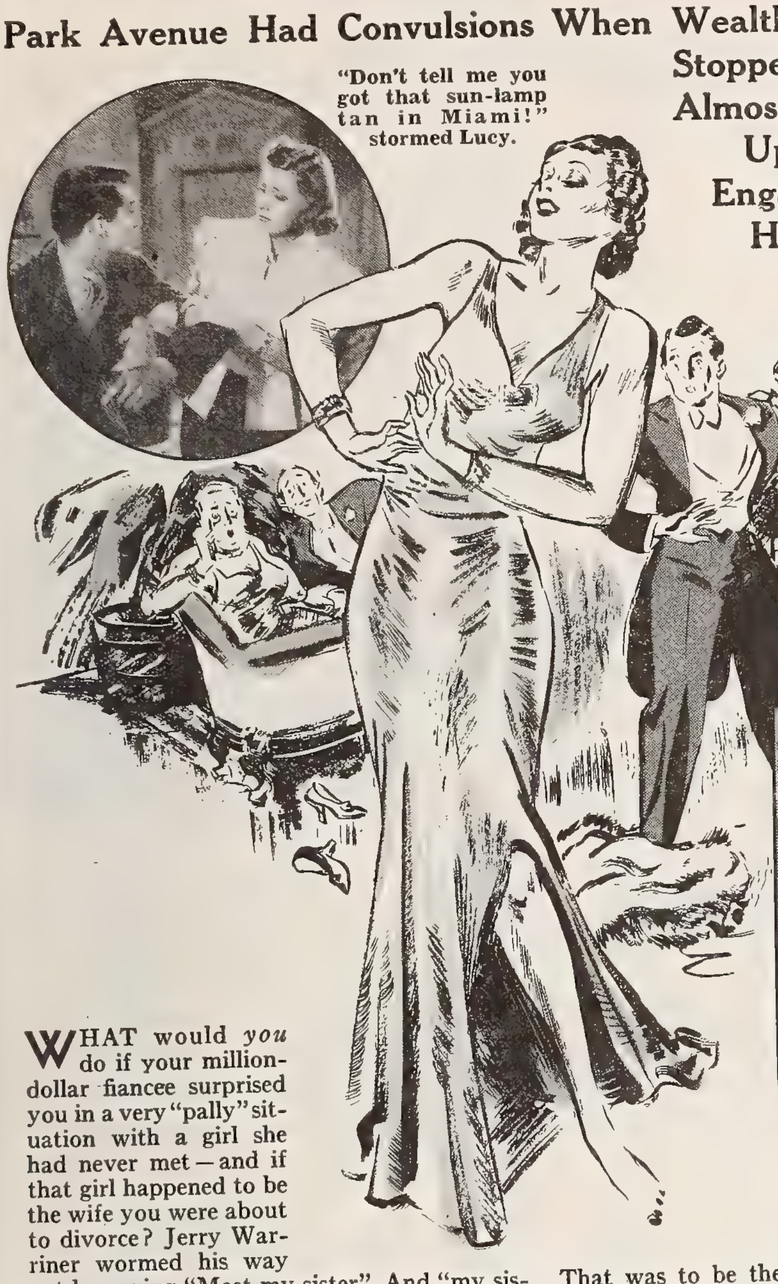
How a Society Bride's Sensational Dance Stopped a Divorce

Park Avenue Had Convulsions When Wealthy Lucy Warriner Stopped At Nothing (Well, Almost Nothing) To Break Up Her Husband's Engagement Party for His Next "Wife"



"Don't tell me you got that sun-lamp tan in Miami!" stormed Lucy.

Who'd have dreamt that lovely Lucy Warriner would ever shock society—even to save her marriage.

Still happy socialites—til debutantes and divorces interfered.

Lucy and her singing teacher tried desperately to explain their night out.

Why did his wife have to hide Jerry in the bedroom when her best friend visited her?

WHAT would you do if your million-dollar fiancee surprised you in a very "pally" situation with a girl she had never met—and if that girl happened to be the wife you were about to divorce? Jerry Warriner wormed his way out by saying "Meet my sister". And "my sister" proceeded to put on a hair-raising act that scandalized society, and brought Jerry's house of cards tumbling round his handsome head.

Let's turn back the calendar and see how it all started. One fine winter afternoon, home comes Jerry with a vivid sun-lamp tan. From what should have been a Florida vacation! But was it? No, indeed! Jerry, the benighted soul, finally tried to explain that he had whiled away a week or two in a gin and poker marathon with his one-time pals!

Now that in itself might have been enough to besmirch the fairest picture of domestic bliss. But Lucy was a lady. She was determined to play dumb and not utter even one tiny little word of reproach. She was prepared to welcome her wandering boy with sweetness and light. Only Fate barged in, as Fate will do, and upset Lucy's neat little apple-cart.

"Yoo-hoo, Lucy! Surprise! I'm home", shouted Jerry. But only the dog barked. A glance at the table revealed the morning paper still untouched, and Lucy's letters unopened. When lovely Lucy finally did arrive, it was in last night's evening clothes, and with her tall, dark and handsome singing teacher in tow. Jerry, still smarting from Lucy's accusations about his "Florida" siesta, refused to listen to explanations, and the happy home life of the Warriners was shattered with a resounding crash.

Nothing would assuage Jerry's wounded sensibilities but a divorce, which he promptly proceeded to procure.

Time flitted by. Another 24 hours and the Warriner divorce decree was to become final. That was to be the cue for Jerry to announce his engagement to the madcap heiress—Barbara Vance. But Lucy stamped her pretty foot and shouted "No". She wasn't going to allow any such thing. She wasn't giving up her one true love to "the girl with millions of dollars and no sense", just because her husband refused to recognize facts. But oh, what to do? How to make Jerry see the light?

Then an idea struck Lucy as lightning strikes a tree. That night the wealthy Vances were throwing a hotcha party for Jerry and their Barbara. Society's darlings would be there en masse—and that, Lucy decided, was the time to strut her stuff.

How she posed as poor Jerry's sister, how she threw the party into an uproar with a dance that made the assembled dowagers' eyes pop, makes one of the most hilarious sequences ever thrown on the screen.

But what happens after that to Lucy and Jerry's romance is the really big surprise you'll find in Columbia's new picture, "THE AWFUL TRUTH"—the fastest, gayest, most exhilarating comedy in years. Irene Dunne plays the wife, Lucy Warriner, and if you saw "Theodora Goes Wild", you have some idea of her comedy capabilities. In one scene, Lucy is stopped on the road by two motorcycle cops because her radio is going full blast. She's lost the control knob and can't turn it down. The policeman tries to fix it. "We don't have to do this", he says. "It's only a favor to you".

"It's no favor", says Lucy. "We enjoy the music".

COP: "Have you people been drinking"?

LUCY: "No. Have you people"?

COP: "What's your license number"?

LUCY: "I don't know. They change it every year. What's the license number on your motorcycle? No fair looking now"!

And so it goes merrily on. Cary Grant is Jerry Warriner—handsome, debonair, and with a charming wit that gets him out of the tightest places. You'll be quoting and requoting his clever lines.

Don't miss "The Awful Truth". It's a grand screen play, the work of Dwight Taylor and Vina Delmar, author of "Bad Girl", remember? And none other than Leo McCarey, of "Ruggles of Red Gap" fame, directed. When is it coming to your theatre? You'll see it in the papers. Keep your eyes peeled for the announcement.

THEY'RE GOIN' PLACES.!

Profiles, pluck and perseverance are making them stars of tomorrow

BY MACK HUGHES

Here's Robert Allen, making good on second trial.

Robert Kent's had five leading ladies—the Dionne Quints.

Robert Baldwin's stepping along cinematically and headed for success.

DID YOU ever think of capitalizing on your appearance? You know, there's no reason why you shouldn't, if you're lucky enough to be one of those fortunate "born good-looking" people. If you had a voice you'd train it and go on the stage, even prepare for opera if it was that good, wouldn't you? So why not do the same with a set of features that you were graced with at birth?

Everyone likes to look at anything attractive—a beautiful girl, a handsome man or even a magnificent horse. And so, it follows that the logical thing to do is to sell your profile, if it's of the salable variety. This is just what a few of the newcomers to pictures have done.

Maybe you've been wondering who this attractive young man or that beautiful girl you've seen in the movies recently, is. Well, keep them in mind, for you're going to see more of them in bigger and better parts within the next year. For many of the boys and girls you've seen so often on the magazine pages are now in Hollywood being groomed for movies. Among them are several young men fortunate enough to be six feet tall and handsome enough to arrest the attention of movie scouts.

First on the list is Douglas Blackley, better known to fans as Robert Kent. For years Bob was one of the leading models in New York. This in itself is no mean stunt where only a hundred out of 5000 people in the profession manage to make a living. However, Bob was what is known as a godsend to photographers. He was camera proof. This means that he could be "shot" from any angle and still look good to the client—the man who selects the copy. Naturally there is one goal this leads to—motion pictures.

Doug was full of hope and determination, which makes a sound base for ambition and, as a result he began studying with movies in mind. He soon became the pet of the artists, for he could express moods for them. But, he was still as far away from Hollywood as when he began and the harder he tried to crash the gates, the colder were his receptions at the picture offices.

Now if you think that a few disappointments could discourage young Kent, you're wrong. They only served to prod him on. After all, his life as a model had not been easy to get started. He was used to self-discipline. For, if he was to face a camera there was to be no night life for him. Regular hours and little play had been his lot.

He finally landed a job in stock for the summer and, with this training, he invaded the sanctums of moviedom again. One scout said that he would cover Kent's performance and that if he could really act, he'd have a chance at pictures. Luck was against Bob for, no sooner was he in Maine than his appendix acted up and he had to return to New York. Much to his surprise the scout had missed the show and called him in to do a test from a scene in it. Needless to say, he made the grade and left for Hollywood. Since being there he has steadily worked and among his more recent pictures was "Reunion," with those loveable little girls, the Dionne Quints.

Another handsome gent who got a chance at talkies was Ted Bauer, now christened Robert Allen. His was a far different story and quite as interesting, even though the results are a little astonishing.

Allen was for many years the highest paid model in New York. He worked more often than others. One day he posed for a soap ad—a nice, homey scene in a bath tub, and once it was published he was immediately called into consultation by the movie moguls. Soon after this conference, Bob went to the Coast and his company had big plans for their "Soap Boy."

However, being young and im-

FAMILY FAVORITES

BY
MARJORIE DEEN

"If you're looking for a sure-fire family hit in the food line, then make it with apples," advises Billie Burke. And she has oodles of knockout suggestions and recipes to tempt you. These home-kitchen-tested, accurate recipes appear in handy form on Page 74.

Courtesy New York & New England Apple Institute

TASTES vary. That statement is as true of foods as it is of film folks, and it explains why there are so many stars and so many recipes. Yes, one fan's darling is another person's pet peeve, just as surely as 'one man's dish is another man's poison.' But everyone will be in complete agreement when it comes to Billie Burke and the special dishes she recommends. They're swell.

"If you're looking for a real family favorite in the food line, then make it with apples," advised Miss Burke, who is pretty much of an all-round family favorite herself, due to her ability to please the women in the audience, amuse the children and make the masculine contingent feel strong and protective.

WHEREAS, with very many foods, you'll find that some people will like them prepared in one way, some in another, just about everyone likes apples in any form," Billie continued with an air of conviction that permitted no contradiction on my part. But who was I to argue, since I agreed with her so completely? Besides, I fully appreciated the timeliness of her suggestions and would have tried to lead the conversation around to just these very fruits had Miss Burke failed to mention them herself.

These coming months find apples engaging the attention of every good housewife. Shining red eating apples, polished and piled high in a bowl on the dining-room table or buffet . . . firm, juicy green ones stored in a cool spot to be made into pies and puddings . . . golden ones for salads . . . apple dishes too numerous to keep track of, but delicious, every one!

Certainly the collection of made-with-apples dishes that I have for you should be welcome right now. Some are Miss Burke's, some derive from other sources, but all are worth your attention. So be sure to turn to Page 74 where you will find a number of them. Look them over and save those that have special appeal, for future reference, if not for immediate trial. If you don't, you'll surely regret your oversight when your green grocer says to you one of these fine mornings, "Some apples today, Madame? They're particularly fine and the price is 'way down."

But let's not go shopping or recipe hunting just yet. Instead let's return to Miss Burke, busily at work in as charming a kitchen as you could well imagine, preparing a special apple concoction for her daughter, Patricia Ziegfeld. This lovely gal is a softie for her man's home cooking.

When her amazingly young-looking mother is working at the studio, Patricia accepts with good humor the fine meals prepared by the real cook of the household, I learned. But when the picture is completed (she had just finished making "Topper" when I saw her), and before the next one starts (she'll be doing "The Bride Wore Red"), then young Miss Ziegfeld insistently requests her mother to make a "personal appearance" in the culinary department to fix up one or two of the special dishes for which she is famous. It's an occasion that is all too rare, according to Patricia, but she vows that it's a real treat. So Miss Burke, always the devoted parent, proudly complies.

Of course, Miss Burke mentioned Apple Pie first. You will find her recipe for this particular treat on Page 74, as I told you before, but as I repeat again for fear you will overlook this fact and fail to notice that we are now giving you at least four home-kitchen-tested, detailed and accurate recipes in each and every issue of MODERN SCREEN.

The filling suggested for Miss Burke's favorite Apple Pie can be used either for the two-crust variety or the single-crust, deep-dish type. It has an excellent flavor—spices and lemon and almonds assure that—and is especially delicious served hot. Try brushing the top with unbeaten egg white before baking, as suggested, for this procedure produces a browner crust. The second time you make it (you see, I take it for granted that in this case one good turn certainly deserves another), follow the egg yolk suggestion noted at the end of the recipe.

And see if you don't like this pie with the Fluffy Lemon Sauce poured over each spicy slice. The sauce happens to be one that goes with the Apple Tapioca recipe, you'll notice, but I tried it out on the pie with such success that I hasten to pass on the suggestion to you.

That particular Tapicoa recipe I just mentioned is certainly pretty special when this same sauce accompanies it, especially if the pudding is made with "pink" Apple Sauce and is garnished with thin apple slices with the skin left on to add another note of color. Both these dishes—the pie and the pudding—are pictured for you on the opposite page, together with a few of the other apple treats that I'm going to tell you (Continued on page 75)

DON'T LOOK NOW, PETE–BUT THAT MRS. ROYCE IS EYEING THE TABLECLOTH AGAIN!
I TOLD YOU SHE'D NOTICE!.. THAT LAZY SOAP OUR LADY USES DOESN'T WASH CLEAN. I WISH SHE'D CHANGE TO FELS-NAPTHA SOAP AND GET RID OF TATTLE-TALE GRAY

Bird alive, how people's eyebrows do go up—if there's the faintest hint of tattle-tale gray in your linens and things.

But why risk it? Why put up with half-clean-clothes—when Fels-Naptha Soap makes it so easy to hurry out ALL the dirt.

That's because Fels-Naptha brings you two peppy cleaners instead of one. Its richer golden soap and lots of naptha loosen the grimiest, deep-down dirt. When the wash is over, your clothes are so sweet and white it's a thrill to iron them.

You'll love the gentle way Fels-Naptha treats your hands, too. There's soothing glycerine in every golden bar.

Ask your grocer for Fels-Naptha today and try it! You'll have easier washes! Lovelier washes! And none of that pesky tattle-tale gray! COPR. FELS & CO., 1937

Above, what's this, a new romance? Virginia Bruce and Brian Aherne get set for the rhumba. And, right, Miriam Hopkins and Director Goulding caught nightclubbing.

When Madeleine Carroll and Hubby Captain Philip Astley left Hollywood for a short vacation in the mountains, Madeleine asked her neighbor to look after her thoroughbred Dalmation. The hound, said Madeleine proudly, was a marvelous watch dog—and now her friend is the last to doubt her word. For when he arrived that night, his charge met him at the front gate with bared fangs. When the master of the house attempted to open the gate, the conscientious guardian lunged at him. So he spent the night at a hotel, while the dog proudly guarded his home and fireside.

Tyrone Power's girl the other evening was his grandmother, Mrs. Adelaide Reaume. He took her to a popular cocktail hang-out which features swing music. When Tyrone introduced his grandmother to the band leader, she informed that gent that she played a bit of popular music herself. The delighted band leader invited her to sit down at the piano and go to it. So Grandmother sat down and startled the customers by swinging out with "Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life" and "The World Is Waiting for the Sunrise." Those in on swing terminology say that Grandma was really in the groove and took those numbers right to town!

As days and nights grow spicier, so does our gossip . . . all 'bout who's rushing who and who's rushing where in Cinemalan

The Stanwyck-Taylor duo still keeps Hollywood intrigued. Barbara looks sorta nautical, and Bob has that off-to-sea look, too.

Overheard conversation between Freddie Bartholomew and his director on the set.

Director: "Okay, Freddie, just go in and try this scene. It's new, so I won't be too critical."

Freddie: "Just what do you mean by critical?"

Director: "Well, it's like picking things apart—criticizing."

Freddie: "Oh, I see. I had an idea the word criticism meant evaluation."

At the preview of her picture, "Topper," Connie Bennett arrived looking very attractive in a polka dot suit, black skull cap and a string of sables. With her came Lady Ashley, now Mrs. Doug Fairbanks, Sr., also looking very attractive in a polka dot suit, black skull cap and a string of you-know-whats. No hair pulled. The gals are close friends, and they had planned their twin showing beforehand.

Jack Haley's small son came back from the Beverly Hills playground where some of the movie children play and reported a conversation he overheard. One little boy, it seems, was bragging about what a swell new Dad he had. A little girl in the group piped up; "Yes, he really is nice. Brother and I liked him a lot last year when we had him." All the Haleys are willing to swear on a stack of scenarios.

Now that Gene Markey and Joan Bennett are divorced, Gene has gone back to his former lady fair, Gloria Swanson. Six years ago, before Gene married Joan, he was Gloria's constant companion. Herbert Marshall, who used to go with Gloria, is still seen about with Lee Russell. And Joan has been dividing her time between several gentlemen. It's all rather complicated.

Eddie Cantor is the proudest man on his lot. During the production of "Ali Baba Goes to Town," he is occupying the late Will Rogers' bungalow, the first person to use it since Rogers' death. Because of the long-standing friendship between her husband and Eddie, Mrs. Rogers asked him to use the quarters when she heard he was making a picture at her late husband's studio.

We may be all wrong, but at the moment this is written Alice Faye has temporarily shelved Tony Martin for Wayne Morris. "Kid Galahad" introduced himself to Alice at a night spot and asked for a date, and she gave him several. It was all as simple as that. But we don't recommend the practice. Your first date sometimes turns out to be with the bouncer.

At the premiere of "Wee Willie Winkie," with Eddie Cantor at the microphone introducing the glitterous and the glamorous as they came in, Shirley Temple pronounced the occasion a joyous one. Said Shirley to the radio listeners, "This is the happiest day of my life. This morning I was promoted to Grade Four-A in school, and this is my first world premiere!" That's a lot to happen to one little girl in a single day, even when it's a little girl who has more money in the bank than any other little fourth-grade lady in the land, and probably more than some of the old-timers 'way up in the sixth and seventh grades.

Most fun of the evening, for the crowds outsid

was the arrival attired in kilts and whiskbrooms and clutched the microphone recite a poem which went like this:

Oh, dear little Shirley,
Please be a good girlie
And you can see "Wee Willie Winkie,"
But never go out with Mortimer Stinky.

During the "Broadway Melody" retakes, Bob Taylor spent almost as much time with a jeweler as he did before the cameras. Finally he selected a lovely diamond bracelet, and someone asked him the inevitable question, "Is it for Barbara Stanwyck?" "No," said Mr. T., "it's for a cousin in Chicago." Note to Miss Stanwyck: Has your gentleman friend any relatives in Chicago?

Most amusing yarn of the month is the tale concerning a prominent screen and radio comedian. During a joyous tour of the late spots recently, he spied a hot dog stand which took his fancy. He stopped in merely to purchase a hamburger, but by the time he parked his car he forgot his original intention and wound up by buying the hot dog stand and presenting it to a total stranger.

Saw Shirley Ross in the Derby whipping out a sack of tobacco and brown cigarette papers. Rolling her own—but only for Art's sake. She has to roll 'em for her role in "Blossoms on Broadway."

You've probably heard that before "Broadway Melody" was released it went through a long period of retakes. Numerous reasons for the refurbishing have been floating about, but the most authentic is that when the picture was first completed the producers discovered that George Murphy had stolen the male acting honors from the romantic lead, Bob Taylor. So "Broadway Melody" went back to the sound stages for a slight operation on Mr. Murphy's role.

Coiffure Note (Men's Dept.): The fluffy hair worn by George Raft in "Souls at Sea" was a weighty problem for his studio, as well as for its wearer. Mr. R., who has always played slick-haired guys, suddenly found himself confronted with an order from the front office to refrain from oiling his locks during the shooting of the picture. George, who likes to wear his hair slicked down on his social engagements, felt that the studio was trying to

Went out to look over the Stanwyck and Taylor ranches the other day out in Reseda, in San Fernando Valley. Barbara's rural retreat, now in process of construction, will be a more or less sumptuous affair. Two houses are already being completed, and more barns than you can shake a horse at. Down the road a piece, as we ranchers put it, is the forthcoming Taylor menage. It is much smaller than Barbara's, but Bob calls it home. Its main advantage is that it's only five minutes from the Stanwyck estate.

Trouble in Culver City: Freddie Bartholomew's Aunt Cissy—his legal guardian—is said to be conferring with lawyers regarding the financial status of her young charge. Aunt Cissy, they say, complains that Freddie's salary is much lower than the $1300. weekly which he's supposed to be getting, and she feels that an immediate adjustment is in order. Otherwise, she says, she'll pack up Freddie and put him back in school in England.

You really should have been out at Jimmy Stewart's on Moving Day. It seems Jimmy's mother and sister came to Hollywood for a visit of several months, so Mr. S. rented a new home to accommodate the family. The day they arrived he was in the middle of packing. Mother S. took one horrified look at her son's efforts and banished him from the house, while she emptied all his trunks and put things back in a more organized manner. All of which leads Jimmy to believe that a boy's best friend, after all, is his mother.

"Life of a Lancer Spy," which is full of British accents and the clicking of British heels, is now finished. What we wanted you to know is that one of the extras, portraying a soldier, took his orders seriously. When they told him to click his heels, he clicked them so hard he wrenched his back.

One of the bigger social events of the past month was the opening of the Beverly Hills Tennis Club. Owned by Fred Perry and Ellsworth Vines, most of its members are from the movie colony. Some of the highlights on opening night were: Gloria Stuart buying champagne cocktails for the photographers, Groucho Marx executing his own version of the rhumba with Eleanore Whitney, and Bob Taylor and Barbara Stanwyck, arriving in light flannel slacks and yachting regalia.

Day after the opening of the Tennis Club, Groucho Marx and Ellsworth Vines engaged Charlie Chaplin and Fred Perry in the battle of the century. Groucho arrived on the court first and promptly zipped himself into a sleeping bag, for a nap, while waiting for his opponents. Most of the actual tennis was played by Perry and Vines, who volleyed ferociously at each other, while Groucho and Charlie engaged in amiable conversation over their section of the net. P. S. Groucho's team lost.

Johnny Downs and Eleanore Whitney must have "called the calling off, off," for they're going places together again!

Someone showed us some statistics—and it must have been true because it was in print—which proved that Warner Baxter had earned more money in pictures in 1936 than any other male star in Hollywood. If you think this sounds a bit on the fantastic side, remember that Warner has been under contract to one studio for a good many years, and that his salary has been increased every time option time came around.

Travel Note: Mr. and Mrs. Gene Raymond (she was the former Jeanette MacDonald, said to be in pictures) returned from their Hawaiian honeymoon with two beautiful sets of tan and twenty extra pounds of unwanted flesh. The extra poundage was equally divided—ten apiece—and it is our duty to report that their first week in Hollywood banished it in a hurry. The Raymonds are now completely moved into the new home Gene bought before the wedding. The only other item about them is this: if Gene ever finds himself out of work, he can be consoled by the fact that the little wife, starting October 1st, will be pulling in $5,000. weekly on a radio program.

The opening of Bing Crosby's Delmar race-track was really a one-man show. President Crosby greeted early customers at the gate. Later, Bing acted as master of ceremonies for a radio broadcast from the track. Official starter was Bing Crosby. Now guess whose horse won the first race. You're right.

Everyone's still wondering who won that baseball game between the Comedians and the Leading Men. An annual affair, with the profits going to charity, this year's contest drew 20,000 breathless fans, most of whom came for a glimpse of Robert Taylor, who captained the Leading Men's team. When the loudspeaker announced: "Robert Taylor is now approaching home plate," the spectators gasped. Mr T. approached home plate, smiled for the assemblage, and disappeared for the afternoon. It seems he doesn't play baseball. There was a rumor that the Comedians had won!

Shirley Temple sadly disappointed some visitors on the set of "Heidi" the other day. When she learned there was company on the set she thought it would be a fine idea to entertain them, just as any other little girl would, with her repertoire of two piano selections. So Shirley pounded away on the piano, and the visitors gave up all hope of seeing what they came for—a sample of little Miss T.'s million-dollar histrionics.

The romance between Loretta Young and Producer Joe Mankiewicz marches on, with both principals showing a lot of interest in each other. On a recent week-end in Santa Barbara, Loretta was wearing a diamond engagement ring and a platinum wedding band. She claims they were props, however—wore them in "Wife, Doctor and Nurse," and simply forgot to take them off. Maybe!

The Rosalind Russell-Bob Montgomery feud must be over. At least, they've taken to kidding each other again. It seems, in this case, that Rosalind owed Bob ten dollars on a bet. Next morning, on the set of "Live, Love and Learn," Mr. M. received a luscious-looking salad bowl, in the center of which was a whole pineapple. And when our hero reached for the pineapple, the top half came off and out rolled hundreds of pennies. He hasn't had time to count them, but he suspects when he does they'll add up to ten dollars.

Too Much Is Too Much

I love a good movie. Give me one good movie, a newsreel and a comedy, and I have had a swell afternoon or evening's entertainment. But multiply that menu by two, and I've had too much. The theatres seem to be vying with each other in seeing which can give the public the most for their money. It seems to me, however, they are merely cutting their own throats, because I know we often choose some other form of entertainment rather than spend such a long period in one spot. And I'm not alone in this sentiment, believe me. Many others have told me they feel the same way.

We often go just for one feature on the bill, but what happens? We have to sit through the second whether we like it or not in order to see our choice. I have to leave my baby at home with a girl who's paid by the hour, and with such endless programs, the price of the show is doubled for me. There are hundreds of mothers in this same fix. What's more, double features cause so much eyestrain that I invariably go home with a headache and that doped feeling.

I'd much rather get my money's worth on one good feature that I could dream about rather than get a nightmare from trying to think about half a dozen heroes and heroines The brain can absorb just so much at one time.

How soon will theatre managers realize that they aren't nourishing us, but are overfeeding us, and as a result, we're getting a bad case of movie gout?—Mrs. W. R. Giedt, Chicago, Ill.

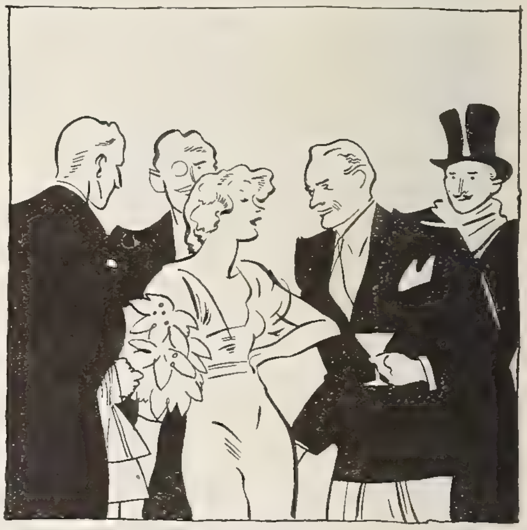
Dating the Stars

I'm a middle-aged housewife. Not hard to look at but certainly not fascinating. Yet I have a different date every day. My husband, modern to his fingertips in that respect, doesn't object in the least. In fact, he encourages these dates. He says they keep me in a happy, pleasant frame of mind, and keep our own romance alive.



What more could a girl ask than to have her pick of "star dates"? It's all in knowin' how, m' deahs!

Here's an exclusive peek at my date book:

Monday: Skiing with Melvyn Douglas. He's fascinating, don't you think?

Tuesday: Saw Errol Flynn for two hours today. He makes love divinely.

'N' ME

Wednesday: Kidded along delightfully by Bob Montgomery and enjoyed it immensely.

Thursday: Nelson Eddy sang to me today. Has a marvelous voice, so rich and vibrant.

Friday: Going places with Bob Taylor and are the women jealous! Terribly. They, too, adore him.

Saturday: Night-clubbing with Ben Bernie. Dark clouds are forgotten; there's only the silver lining when I'm with the Old Maestro.

Sunday: Ending a perfect week with Bill Powell. Such a man-of-the-world! So sophisticated and magnetic. One of the most enjoyable dates so far.—Virginia Lee Hall, Ronceverte, W. Va.

More Taylor Talk

Clark Gable was compared with Rudolph Valentino because Valentino was good. Robert Taylor is compared with Gable because Gable is good. And now Tyrone Power is being compared with Taylor because Taylor is good! Of course, Tyrone is handsome and charming, but is that any reason to say that Bob isn't? In reel life, Taylor takes the roles that are given to him and portrays them to the best of his ability. In real life, he is a modest, unassuming bachelor, who lives a good, clean life. Take it from me, Bob Taylor is a one hundred per cent American and one of whom we can be very proud.—Jim Hart, Charlotte, N. C.

A Robert Kent Rave

At last, we have what America really wants, that lovable, and what's more important, real young actor, Robert Kent. The most surprising thing about him is that you can actually believe he's true. He's not so handsome that you get him confused with the scenery, but he's plenty handsome enough to give your heart the flip-flops. And lovable. Ahhhhh! There's where he really scores.

There's much talk about Miss America, the typical American girl. What about the typical American man, Robert Kent? Show me a more sincere actor, if you can. Show me one who could have been more appealing as Bill Smith in "That I May Live," or as Nick Mare in "Angel's Holiday."

You can take your matinée idols, girls. I'll take Robert Kent, the genuine, any old day in the week.—Rochelle Collins, Jackson, Miss.

It's the Little Things That Get You Down

Maybe it isn't right to criticize pictures that you enjoy, but when you feel you know a character in a book through and through, you expect that character to be the same in pictures. I'm referring to Bill Boyd as Hopalong Cassidy and Jimmy Ellison as Johnny Nelson.

I wonder if producers know that Nelson always wore two guns, and that neither he nor Hoppy would have been caught dead with anything but wooden-handled guns. They considered pearl handles fit only for dudes or show-offs, not for men who depended upon their guns to keep themselves alive. And Bill Cassidy got the nickname "Hopalong" because of his limp. But where, oh where, is that limp when you see him on the screen?

These are small things but they are important. I've heard more than one person say he's disappointed in the movie version of books because of these discrepancies.—Mona Cummings, Kansas City, Mo.

WORLD'S MOST POPULAR LAXATIVE

SCIENTIFICALLY IMPROVED!

EX-LAX NOW BETTER THAN EVER!

TASTES BETTER THAN EVER ACTS BETTER THAN EVER MORE GENTLE THAN EVER
... and you'll FEEL BETTER after taking it

FOR OVER 30 years, millions of people have been proclaiming Ex-Lax "the ideal laxative" . . . "Ex-Lax is everything a good laxative should be!" they told us.

But, in the world of science, there are no such words as "good enough." Skilled chemists are constantly at work, seeking new means of making good products better! And in the Ex-Lax laboratories the "impossible" has been accomplished!

After a long period of patient effort, a way has been found actually to improve Ex-Lax . . . to make it even better than ever before. A more satisfactory and efficient laxative in every way!

- TASTES BETTER THAN EVER! No matter how much you may have liked Ex-Lax before, it tastes even better now! Its delicious all-chocolate flavor is smoother and richer than ever!
- ACTS BETTER THAN EVER! Always dependable in action, Ex-Lax is now even more effective! It empties the bowels more thoroughly—more smoothly—in less time than before.
- MORE GENTLE THAN EVER! Ever famous for its mildness, Ex-Lax is today so remarkably gentle that, except for the relief you get, you scarcely realize you have taken a laxative. No shock—no violence!

Ex-Lax works by the "Gentle Nudge" system. It simply gives your intestines a gentle nudge at the point where constipation exists, emptying the bowels thoroughly but easily and comfortably!

Ex-Lax won't upset your system or disturb your digestion. It won't cause stomach pains, nausea or weakness. Ex-Lax affords as near a natural bowel movement as any laxative can give.

If you are suffering from headaches, biliousness, or that dull "blue" feeling so often caused by constipation—you'll feel better after taking Ex-Lax! And you'll be grateful for the absence of "forcing" and strain that make the action of a harsh cathartic such an unpleasant experience.

Your druggist now has the new Scientifically Improved Ex-Lax in 10c and 25c sizes! The box is the same as always—but the contents are better than ever! Get a box today!

FREE! If you prefer to try Ex-Lax at our expense, write for free sample to Ex-Lax, Dept. MM107, Box 170, Times-Plaza Sta., Brooklyn, N.Y.

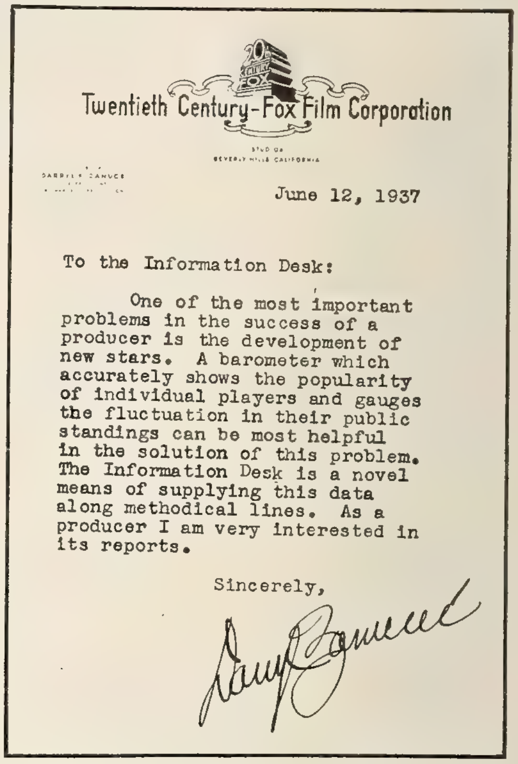
Darryl Zanuck looks at our Barometer to gauge the box office value of his players

At the right, we are printing a letter sent us recently by the Vice-President of 20th Century-Fox, Darryl Zanuck, which should be of great interest to all our readers. He, like so many prominent producers, is coming to depend more and more on our trusty Barometer, for he is a man with keen business sense and realizes that you, who write to the Information Desk, are the public who must be pleased in the theatres. He knows that it is a fair, impartial survey which tells accurately, from day to day and from month to month, which stars are most popular with You. Help complete the tale the needle tells, the tale producers must read and recognize, by sending in your own requests—as many as you please.



Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corporation

June 12, 1937

To the Information Desk:

One of the most important problems in the success of a producer is the development of new stars. A barometer which accurately shows the popularity of individual players and gauges the fluctuation in their public standings can be most helpful in the solution of this problem. The Information Desk is a novel means of supplying this data along methodical lines. As a producer I am very interested in its reports.

Sincerely,

> If you'd like to see a brief synopsis of your favorite's life in this department, and, incidentally, help boost his or her standing in our Barometer, fill in and send us the coupon on this page, or just write. Try to save yourself 2c by using postcards whenever possible. We answer general questions, too, either here or by mail. Address: The Information Desk, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. DEANNA DURBIN (First printing. Total number of requests 1573.) Canada now has the Dionne quintuplets and Deanna Durbin. Of course, you heard that voice in "Three Smart Girls." It's got the country ga-ga. Deanna was born with the prosaic name of Edna Mae Durbin in Winnipeg, Canada, Dec. 4, 1922, but she didn't stay home very long. At the ripe age of one or so, she and her family packed up and left for Hollywood, not however, for the reason you're thinking. No, the Durbin family didn't give a hoot about breaking into the movies, either singly or in a group. They merely wanted to duck those storm-bitten Canadian winters.

It didn't take the Durbins long to find out that they had a voice on their hands. When Deanna was a tiny tot, she began singing children's songs, not with the usual piping parlor tones of the usual infant, but with rare richness and clarity. By the time she was ten, her sister, Edith, a nationally known fencer, and a teacher in a Los Angeles high school, was so positive Deanna had the spark that mattered that she took her savings and led the child by the hand—quite willingly—to the nearest voice teacher. "As early as I can remember anything," Deanna says of those days, "I've always known I was going to sing." Sing she did.

Two years later, she was making public appearances at clubs, benefits and church entertainments. There she was spotted by an actor's agent and hustled off to see Andres de Segurola, former Metropolitan Opera star, whose pupils include such toppers as Marion Talley and Mary McCormic. The Señor raved about the Durbin throat, and from him, the girl was speeded to M-G-M, to be tested for the part of Mme. Schumann-Heink as a child, in "Gran." But the picture was never made, for the opera singer took ill. Deanna was placed, instead, in a nondescript short called "Every Sunday." Her three-months' contract expired and, believe it or not, the powers-that-be let her go, not realizing the bargain girl they had on their lot. But Deanna sallied forth and soon won a long-term contract from Universal. Meanwhile, Cantor put her on his Sunday broadcasts at one thousand per. Nice goings for a fourteen-year-old.

You know the happy ending of this story, all about the stir she created in "Three Smart Girls." From that she was hurried into "100 Men and a Girl," and her studio bosses are hatching all kinds of wondrous plans for her future. But there's a dark shadow across the little girl's path of happiness. She's a normal kid, and she'd like to have real pals, even as you and you. But fame, and lots of charted hours, make it kind of tough to chum around with girls and boys the way she did when she was going to Manchester Avenue School and the Brete Harte Junior High School in Los Angeles. Recently, a girl she used to know, who's moved out of town, came back just to visit Deanna. And was Deanna happy!

Singing and roller skating are her chief delights just now. She says she wants to be an opera singer, that movie acting's just child's play to her. She hates spinach and algebra. She goes to school four hours a day, and besides, takes singing and dancing lessons. She has brown hair and blue eyes, weighs 105 pounds, and is five feet two. But, by the time this appears, she may have grown an inch, for she's at the shooting-up stage. Wherever she goes her pet cocker spaniel, Tippy, is sure to follow. Yes, and she's got a sports sedan, which, however, she can only ride around the studio lot, until she grows up.

Your deluge of requests has simply overwhelmed us, but we're doing the best we can to give you what you want.

ERROL FLYNN (Last printed May 1937. Total number of requests since then 647.) You've heard so much about the great big adventure man, Errol Flynn, who thinks nothing of skipping out on his studio to get in on a Spanish war or visit his native Ireland or go in search of gold or go to pick up a new Chinese dialect, and then come back to write books about his jaunts and so on, that you, like us, must be pretty fed up on that part of him. Did you know that Errol and David Niven are charming hosts at cocktail house-warming parties out Hollywood way? Flynn, the Irishman, and Niven, the Englishman, get along famously in the bachelor quarters they keep together whenever Lili Damita is away. And they don't believe in letting the guests scramble for themselves, either. They entertain them in regal fashion. Hence, their home is a gathering place for the few old-fashioned souls left in town who don't want to be alone, but enjoy a good rousing shindig with plenty of capering, highballs and shop talk. Perhaps Flynn's flair for hosting dates back to his boyhood wish to be a bartender, who knows?

Like most Irishmen, this one believes firmly in luck. Says he has no superstitions, but he won't go under ladders, won't start pictures on the thirteenth, always

SO

BY IDA ZEITLIN

What's the idea, Ginger, of

Left, as you like to see Ginger—light and gay and dancing on air in one of those grand musicals that she and Astaire have made famous.

And, right, as Ginger wants you to like her, emoting along with the Helen Hayeses and the Hepburns. Yes, she made a screen test for "Mary of Scotland" and was so good she fooled people. Next, with Katie Hepburn in "Stage Door."

YOU WON'T DANCE!

WE WANT Astaire and Rogers! We want Astaire and Rogers! We want Astaire and Rogers!"

The cry went up the moment they were introduced as an incidental comedy duo in "Flying Down to Rio" and danced off with the show. It grew and swelled and lifted them together into third place among movie moneymakers, topped only by Shirley Temple and Clark Gable. According to the box-office barometer, you still want Astaire and Rogers as a dancing team. You're going to get them. Box-office won't be denied, but neither will progress and change be denied. And you're not going to get them exclusively as a team.

Astaire's contract calls for two pictures a year, one with Ginger. Ginger's contract calls for four pictures a year, two of them musicals, one of the two with Fred. By the laws of arithmetic, that gives you Ginger in two pictures, and possibly three, minus the partner with whom she climbed—floated, rather—to the top. And those two nonmusicals give Ginger her chance to prove herself in another field.

It's a chance she has long set her heart on. But Ginger's is a tranquil heart. She is not the kind to grit her teeth and claw and kick and storm for what she wants. Gayety is her essence on the screen. Offscreen, it's an inward serenity, which comes from an acceptance of things as they are. She is ambitious, but she's also reasonable. She takes what comes, and what came was dancing.

Now it looks as if something else were coming—a chance to act in a variety of parts. And Ginger's like a girl going to meet a long awaited friend. She's done nothing to force his coming, but now that he's here, her eyes are warm with pleasure and her arms wide open in welcome.

By which I don't mean to imply that she didn't—and doesn't—like to dance. "But you can't go on dancing forever. Even if you could, you wouldn't want to. You get tired of doing the same thing over and over, people get tired of seeing you. And, then, there's the whole world of the screen closed to you except for one type of thing."

Her quiet voice held no hint of impatience. Indeed, she gives you the feeling that impatience has no part in her make-up. If you detect anything below the surface, it's a note of soft laughter, as though, however firmly she holds her views, she has that gift of perspective which saves her from being ponderous about them.

"Look," she said, a little smile in the blue eyes that met mine squarely, "I don't think I'm another Duse. Would you make that clear? I'm like a producer who puts an untried actress under contract. He's not sure whether the little dear has talent or not. He just hopes and keeps his fingers crossed. That's me. Some day I'm going to act. Even if I have to wait till I'm old and grayhaired, even if I have to do it in my own little theatre, in my own little backyard, with the chickens and ducks for an audience, I don't care. I think it'll be fun."

Ginger was ten when it was first borne upon her that acting was her metier. "I played the lead in a little thing my mother wrote, and my own death scene had me in tears. We were in this fort—my husband, who must have been all of twelve, and I—surrounded by Indians. Crash comes an arrow through the window, and stabs him in the back. He falls over the table wanting to park your dancing shoes for the highfalutin' drama?

Fred's marriage to Lillian Lamont has convinced him that a man alone is a man lonesome.

Fred talks about his mother first—simply because he knew her first. Good reason?

When he made his first film with Colbert, look who she was—and who he wasn't!

HE'S LEARNED FROM

THOUGH THERE was no sunlight in sunny California that day, Fred MacMurray wore dark glasses. "They're for protection just the same," he insisted.

"Against me?"

"Against the interview. Make me feel less conspicuous. I can hide out behind 'em and pretend I'm in a dark corner, kind of talking to myself."

He wasn't kidding either. Leaning back in his chair, one long leg crossed over the other in an attitude of relaxation, he looked anything but at ease. There was a hunted air about him, and once or twice when the door opened, he started up like a man condemned and hoping that this might be a reprieve.

I've met players before who were made uncomfortable by the necessity of talking about themselves. MacMurray tops them all. So acute is his embarrassment that your first impulse is to put him out of his misery and say, "Forget it." Having conquered that noble but impractical idea, you cast about for some way of easing the situation. In this case he had provided the cue himself.

"Well, why don't you pretend you're talking to yourself? I'll turn my back if you like."

He guffawed briefly because of his ever-present consciousness of the ordeal still ahead. "Am I that bad?"

"Besides, you won't really be talking about yourself. It's the women in your life."

"Out of the frying pan into the fire. O. K. Let's make a stab at it." His eyes sought the ceiling for inspiration. "Well, I guess the most important thing I've learned from women is that they're nice people to have around." He began to look more cheerful. "How's that for a starter? Not that I'm saying it just to get started, you know. I really mean it." Because of the glasses, I couldn't be sure whether he was ribbing me or not. But he went on gravely enough.

"And, look, I'm not talking about women generally. Maybe they're all nice to have around. I wouldn't know. I'm not the kind of guy that loses sleep trying to figure them out and add them up. I suppose they're as different from each other as men or horses or books or restaurants. I only know about the ones I've had around me, and they're the ones I'm talking about.

"Take my mother first, because I knew her first." His grin flashed out. "Well, I learned from her that mothers like their kids." It was characteristic of MacMurray, shying away as he does from any hint of emotional display to use "like" for "love." "And whatever two-by-four thing the kid manages to do, his mother thinks it's pretty nifty. And I learned that grandmothers and aunts are almost as bad. I spent the summers with mine. Mothers worry more about discipline. Aunts and grandmothers think you're too cute for words and let you get away with murder. Sure I took advantage of them. What brat wouldn't?

"Don't expect me to say I was a nice little, good little boy, and my mother made me that way. Because if I did, I'd only be proving what an awful liar I grew into. I was about as good as most boys. We'll let it go at that."

Fred MacMurray gives the very fair sex plenty of credit for

BY CAROLINE S. HOYT

"You have to suffer to be good-looking," Carole Lombard told Fred. And she was right!

THE LADIES

He hesitated, pushed his fingers through his crisp hair, looked for a moment like a little boy lost. "This is going to be tough." Then he set his lips and pushed on. "A kid's a kid, and doesn't think much about things. Whatever happens, he takes it pretty much for granted. My mother had to work to support us both. That's the way things were. I'd never know 'em any different, so that's the way I thought it had to be. It wasn't till I got old enough to have some sense that I began thinking about it. And then I realized what women'll do for their kids, that the kids come first, and they come second or fourth or not at all.

"I had scarlet fever once. We lived in a rooming house in Madison, and I had to go to the contagious hospital. My mother worked all day, and I remember her coming way out there every night just to look at me through the window. They wouldn't let her in. She must have been pretty doggone tired too, but she never missed a day. Of course I watched for her, and I suppose I'd have thought it was pretty funny at the time if she hadn't come. But I can't help thinking of it now, when I sometimes hear people gabbing about selfish women. Say," he brought himself up short, "I don't sound like a preacher or something, do I?"

He took a fresh grip on himself. "Then there was the time she fell and broke her hip. I was trying to break into the studios as a prop-boy or juicer or offstage tootle, anything I could get. I couldn't get to first base. I couldn't even peek through a (Continued on page 93)

making him what he is today

Shyness is the chief MacMurray characteristic, but the women in his life are helping Fred to overcome this great handicap.

Ten years ago, "Seventh Heaven" made Janet Gaynor a star overnight.

SHE KNEW WHAT SHE WANTED

BY MURIEL BABCOCK

THERE IS a lot of stuff being written these days about "A Star Is (Re)Born" in the person of red-headed Janet Gaynor. People in Hollywood are saying, "Oh, isn't it wonderful, Janet Gaynor is in again! She has staged the most marvelous comeback!"

Tish, tosh, as Mr. Wodehouse might say. Janet, whose astute mental processes have safely steered her through a precarious predatory Hollywood and a career fraught with dangerous shoals, has simply given added proof of her good head work.

For, little Gaynor, for whom everybody was recently so sorry because they thought she wasn't getting the breaks, always has been a potent load of dynamite as a Career Girl. "A Star Is Born" is only another milestone along the pathway she marked out for herself some years back. She deserves lots of credit.

In the same breath with being impressed by her comeback, Hollywood is remarking a trifle disparagingly that the leading role in "A Star Is Born," first of the pictures to show a Gaynor different from the sweet, sugary ingenue of the past, was actress proof, that any one of a half dozen competent stars could have played it to perfection, that she had the benefit of marvelous color photography, the expert guidance of David Selznick, who produced a "David Copperfield," a fine director and skillful, handsome leading man, Fredric March.

ALL TRUE, perhaps, but as in any success story which reveals its protagonist had the lucky breaks, it is worth while pointing out that the lucky person knew where to find and what to do with those breaks. That he, or she, calculated carefully what was best to do and—did it.

The Gaynor's finest piece of head work in the more than ten years since "Seventh Heaven" had its premiere (May 6, 1927) was when she landed firmly on her two little feet in "A Star Is Born." Here's the story:

When Winfield Sheehan, Janet's friend and mentor, departed from Fox, Janet had two pictures left to make under her contract. She was getting older, her cycle as an ingenue was about completed, the new studio boss was a man who concentrated on realistic, hard-hitting stories with masculine drive and punch. Even though he might have admired her accomplishments, he was not attuned as a producer to her special qualifications.

Janet sensed this. She realized her future lay elsewhere. But where? Through skillful manœuvering, the first of her two last films was handled on a loan-out basis. She went to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, greatest woman star studio in the film industry, to appear with Robert Taylor in "Small Town Girl." This studio, so lucky with other feminine stars, failed with Janet. The picture was not the success they thought it would be.

THEN Darryl Zanuck decided to make "Ladies in Love." Like the gambler he is, he tossed Janet into a picture with three other big woman names—Constance Bennett, Loretta Young, and the new ingenue threat, Simone Simon, whom the gossips said was being groomed to supplant Gaynor. If this Zanuck coup d'état had been successful, it would have been hailed as a daring stroke of genius. It flopped, and so it was just a very bad idea. And that was that.

Janet's box-office draw seemed to be slipping, but she was still in demand. Script after script came to her. She talked with this producer and that. But she bided her time. She came to the conclusion that David Selznick, young and brilliant, was the man she wanted to guide her future. When "A Star Is Born" script was proffered, she knew she had what she wanted. She had the producer she sought; she had a modern story, with a role that was meaty and gave her the opportunity to be both youthful and yet show maturity; she had a chance to appear in a color film that would reveal her beauty as black and white photography had never done. She found what she had been looking for, and she took it.

So what is all (Continued on page 80)

Today, another picture is credited with Janet's "comeback."

Janet Gaynor, a star reborn? Tch! She's merely marked another milestone along the path she planned for herself years ago

Janet Gaynor and Fredric March in a love scene from the most talked about film of the year, "A Star Is Born."

MANUEL, THE LOVABLE

When you read this story, you'll know why a Metro executive said, "If Spence doesn't play Manuel, nobody else will!"

John and Susy, the Tracy youngsters, with charming Mrs. T. They're pretty proud of their favorite actor.

BY IDA ZEITLIN

AN AUDIENCE came streaming out of a theatre. The women were dabbing wet handkerchiefs at their tear-swollen faces. The men, of course, were dry-eyed, smiling down at their companions with the superior control of their sex, though it must be remarked that their smiles held a special gentleness. One of them pulled out a large white square and offered it to his lady. "Have a dry one," he said. She used it, then turned to stuff it back into his breast pocket, but paused halfway. "I suppose those are dewdrops," she sniffled, and wiped two tears from the corners of his eyes.

If you should witness a similar scene, you needn't bother looking at the name on the theatre marquee. It will be "Captains Courageous." For of all the stories recently told on the screen, only this one of the Portuguese fisherman and the boy he saved from more than one kind of death has so shaken its beholders. Maybe next day the carpers will begin to pick flaws, shake their wise heads and complain that this should have been left out and that put in. But while they're watching it, even the most supercilious are drawn under its spell of tenderness and truth. If, as one writer put it, God is "a sense of warmth about the heart, a rush of tears to the eyes," then as surely as through any human experience, God reveals himself through the heart of Manuel.

Tall words maybe, but I offer no apologies. To me it was a new experience in picture-going and calls for new language. Producers, writers, directors, actors joined to make it a new experience, and where the responsibility of one begins and the other ends, it's impossible to say. Yet to the onlooker, it is Manuel's spirit which dominates the story—Manuel's spirit, as given substance by Spencer Tracy, long recognized as a fine actor, but now lifted to a high place of his own.

Tracy struggled against playing the part. He pleaded with Bud Lighton, the producer, and Victor Fleming, the director, to be let off. "Ill be leaping all over the Continent with my dialect," he protested. They assured him that the exact dialect didn't matter. Manuel had lived for years among Gloucester fishermen. He might have acquired any one of a dozen mongrel dialects.

Then he found another argument. "I've always played rough-and-tumble parts. This story's religion or something. Those scenes where he talks about his father—suppose I don't bring 'em off, they'll be horrible—sitting there in the boat, talking about fishermen's heaven, a guy thirty-seven years old—you'll have your audiences reaching for bigger and wider hats."

They prevailed upon him to take the script home and read it to Mrs. Tracy, whose judgment he trusts. She urged him to give it a trial.

"Suppose they don't believe in me," he said. "It's got to be on the level. Otherwise they'll laugh."

Then she laughed. "At the idea," she explained later, "that he could ever be anything but on the level. I was in the stock company where he got his first part. He had no tricks, no technique, he didn't know how to make up and he looked awful. What carried him through was the great sincerity and naturalness which he had from the start. If Spencer has any fault in acting, it's that he doesn't let himself go. He's always afraid of being hammy, so rather than overplay he underacts. Whatever he's done, I always felt he had more to give, and in this part he'd have to let himself go and give it."

He made some tests, and, when they were run off, he groaned. All he could see was the curly hair. "They'll think it's Harpo Marx," he growled. "Do me a favor, Vic. Test a couple of other guys. The part calls for something—I don't know—something good, fine sweet—"

"That's why, Spence," they grinned.

"Yah!" said Spence.

JEAN ARTHUR—when

Those who knew her before she

BY DORA ALBERT

ON THE stage a group of actors were rehearsing. If you had known much about Broadway personalities, you would have been able to recognize several of them as veterans of the theatre. Dorothy Gish, for instance, and the sophisticated, dapper-looking Osgood Perkins.

There was one girl, though, whom you would not have recognized, for she had never appeared on Broadway before. A beautiful girl with blue eyes and shimmering hair.

As the rehearsal ended, the director said, "We'll have the dress rehearsal tomorrow."

The girl with the bright blue eyes clenched her hands at her side. Fear, panic, discouragement flashed in her eyes.

"Mr. Perkins," she said in a frightened, throaty voice, "please may I ask you something?"

He turned around, amazed at the panic he heard in that voice.

"Please don't think me silly," the girl said, "but I'm scared. All of you are experienced actors, and I don't know the first thing about the stage. Why, I don't even know about stage make-up. How am I going to find out what kind of make-up I'll need for the dress rehearsal tomorrow? Could you help me?"

"Well, err-r—ahem," said Mr. Perkins, "naturally I know nothing about make-up for women, but I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll send you to a friend of mine who can help you. She's quite expert."

HE SENT her to a New York actress. She listened very humbly to everything the woman had to say and followed her directions implicitly.

The timorous, frightened girl was Jean Arthur, star of "Easy Living," whose name, today, is a synonym for temperament in Hollywood. Hardly a month passes that you do not hear stories about her outbursts, her quarrels with directors, with her studio, with the members of her cast. You hear of her breaking three appointments in a row with some harassed writer, of her offering to pay met Fame reveal some intimate facts about this unpredictable star another writer not to write the story of her life.

When I talked to people who knew Jean before she was a success in pictures, I discovered that the Jean Arthur they knew was very different from the girl Hollywood knows today. Everyone—writers, directors, actors and producers—agreed with absolute unanimity that the girl they knew was anything but temperamental.

Recently, when Jean was appearing in a picture and didn't like the wig the director gave her to wear, she tore it off, threw it on the floor and jumped on it. And when the director remonstrated with her, she said, "I don't like this dress either," and started to wreck it.

A somewhat similar situation arose when Jean Arthur appeared in her first play, "Foreign Affairs," but she behaved very differently about it. She confessed to a member of the cast that she didn't like her costume, which she was afraid was drab and uninteresting. But she wore it just the same. Today, Jean Arthur fights tooth and nail for her rights.

WHEN HER first play failed and the cast was paid only a portion of the final week's salary, she did not go into a tantrum, but was very meek and did nothing.

The Broadway producers to whom I spoke—Chamberlain Brown, Herman Shumlin and L. Lawrence Weber—all agreed that Jean Arthur had been grand to work with before her success in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town" and other potent box-office pictures.

"The first day she appeared for rehearsals of 'Lysistrata," Mr. Brown told me, "she knew all her lines by heart."

"And is that unusual?"

"Very. Miss Arthur is an exceptionally painstaking worker. All the members of the cast liked her, and so did I. Some time later I tried to get her for a revival of 'The Trial of Mary Dugan,' but she was leaving for the Coast."

"She was a conscientious trouper," Sam Jaffe, who appeared with her in "The Bride of Torozko," told me. "Nothing was too much work for her, and she was never satisfied with her performance. She used to hang on every word Mr. Shumlin, the producer, said."

WHEN JEAN was appearing in "The Curtain Rises," her most successful play on Broadway, she was ill and run-down but never murmured a word of complaint. No one would have guessed that she was ill, save for the fact that the moment a scene was over, she would have the maid spread something on the floor, and she would lie down and rest, so that she might save the little strength she had for her work.

"When rehearsals were called," Benjamin M. Kaye, the author of "The Curtain Rises," told me, "she didn't mind how many hours she had to work over a piece of business. Once when I asked Jean and her husband to come to my house to go over the script, she told me apologetically that they had a theatre engagement and asked if I would mind if they came when the show was over. Of course, I said it would be all right, and as soon as the play was over, Jean rushed right up.

"She was thinking about the script all the time, and occasionally she would make suggestions about it. They were always suggestions that would improve the play, and it apparently never occurred to her, as it does to so many actresses, to ask for revisions that would build up her own role."

Before success struck Jean Arthur, she was very naïve. She had a childish, unsophisticated quality that charmed everyone.

"One day I complimented her on a tea gown she wore in 'The Curtain Rises,'" Mr. Kaye continued. "A look of pleasure flashed over her face, and she said happily, 'I'm so glad you like it. It cost only six dollars.'

"Once she came to my house with her husband to discuss a certain act of the play. In the act it was necessary for one of the characters to recite some blank verse, so I looked over a number of books to find a suitable bit, but finding nothing appropriate, I made some up.

"When Jean came over, I read it and asked her how she liked it.

"'Why, it's perfect,' she enthused. 'How did you ever find a quotation that fitted so well into the act? Who wrote it?'

"When I told her I did, she looked at me slightly baffled and said, 'You didn't (Continued on page 78)

And here she is as the star of "Easy Living" with handsome Ray Milland as her romantic interest. Frank Ross is still head man in Jean's private life.

Gene Autry's 3 R's were ridin', ropin' and rhythm. He's such an ardent cowboy that he doesn't own a citizen's suit of clothes.

This star of the plains was not discovered by a movie talent scout! Your patronage made him famous as the singing cowboy.

PUBLIC COWBOY

BY FRANC DILLON

HE'S THE most popular cowboy star on the screen, but Hollywood never heard of him until recently! Box-office check-ups and magazine contests in the past several months prove that he's among the first ten box-office attractions, but ask anyone on Hollywood Boulevard who Gene Autry is, and you're more likely than not to get a dead pan.

While New York has its Empire State Building and San Francisco its bridge—in Tioga, Texas, they have a little log cabin to which the citizenry point with pride when visitors hit the town. It's the log cabin where Gene Autry was born; the only star, too, to be born in a log cabin. Right now, Tioga is considering changing its name to Autry Springs in honor of its foremost citizen.

It seems fantastic that a star so popular could be unknown in Hollywood, but it is easily explained. Hollywood looks down its nose at the cowboys. A Western picture hasn't much drawing power in the film colony except at a children's matinee.

But do the cowboys feel slighted? Don't be silly. With all the rest of the country at their feet, they probably don't even know that they have been overlooked. They live in a world of their own and wouldn't exchange places with any of the top dramatic stars if they could.

Boys born in log cabins are supposed to become presidents, but Gene is probably a bigger influence on American youth than he would be if he were sitting in the executive chair in Washington, D.C. Ask any small boy of your acquaintance about Gene, and you will probably find him better informed about the cowboy than he is about Abe Lincoln.

Gene maintains a business office, as few stars do, on account of the thousands of fan letters that come to him. It was no different from any other office, when I stopped in one morning, until Gene made his appearance. Whereupon it took on all the color of the Western scene.

He drove up the alley behind the building, jumped out of his car as though he were dismounting from a galloping horse and ran up the fire escape four steps at a time.

"Hello!" he said from the doorway, glancing about and including everyone in the room. He threw his white, ten-gallon hat on a desk and sat down behind it. His shirt was green checkered and a silk handkerchief, neatly tied, served for a necktie. He wore tan jodhpurs, boots and a white jacket, which had been well tailored from a gay Navajo rug on which was a design in red and black.

He has blue eyes, light brown hair, a calm, pleasant expression and is as mild as a glass of milk. It is hard to realize that, really, he is a tough guy. He wouldn't be caught dead trying to balance a cup of tea on his knee, but give him a horse, a rope, a gun and his guitar, and he'll stir up a Western picture in no time.

He is like a breath of the plains. And when he sings his cowboy songs, he sings them as they should be sung—to the cattle on the range. He isn't unmindful of his audience—oh, never! He is too good a showman for that. But the plains are in his heart, and he sings as he was taught by his father. His first three R's weren't reading, writing and 'rithmetic, but riding, roping and rhythm.

"I can't remember the first time I rode a horse," he told me in his Texas drawl, which his years on the stage haven't rubbed out.

"Some actors are ashamed to act in Westerns," he said with an amused smile, "but to my mind there's nothing to be ashamed of. I have more fun, I'm sure, than I would making any other kind of picture. I like to be outdoors, to ride and to sing. I'm no Caruso," he added slyly. "I'd never charm audiences at the Met. I understand they don't care for yodelling.

"Another advantage in making Westerns is that a Western star has a better chance to stay in pictures a long time," he continued. "Five years is pretty long for a dramatic star to stay on top, but most of (Continued on page 83)

for Hollywood's usual ballyhoo was decidedly absent

Don't try to change your type to suit some silly fad, warns Ann Sothern, who learned that lesson early in her career.

When a good break comes along, be ready to live up to it. Alice Faye proved she could, as the box-office ticker indicates.

BEAUTY GETS

SLIPCOVERS are coming off. Fall millinery is going on. Last year's coats are being taken to that little furrier downtown who can do wonders, my dear—and so reasonably! And thousands upon thousands of young people all over the land are sitting down to portable typewriters and writing, "I am making application for . . ."

Heaven help us, it isn't going to be much easier for all those youngsters this year than it was last. Harder, maybe. However, though this fact isn't proven by statistics, I definitely have the feeling that it's easier for a girl to get a job than for a man to get a job. A girl can almost always find something, so cheer up, ladies. The aim of dis yere article is to give a few pointers in job-getting, in job-holding and in job-advancement.

I don't want to fall into the trite, easy trap of saying, "Preserve a neat, well-groomed appearance" and other self-evident bromides. Sakes alive! Any fool knows that a neat, well-groomed appearance is desirable, whether you're trying to get a job or a man. There's more to it than that, though I shall not, of course, neglect neatness and good grooming in this article any more than I expect you to neglect them in your own lives.

It occurs to me at this point that the finest type of college girl has come to be regarded as the likeliest type of employee. There are a number of organizations who wish to employ college girls only. And what is it the college girl has which so strongly recommends her? Not the A.B. degree, dears, that isn't it at all. It's a combination of wholesomeness, youthful dignity, that clean, scrubbed look—as well as brains. It's compounded of suitable, sensible clothes—though never so sensible that they're dreary; make-up, yes, but make-up sparingly used on a clear, healthy skin. It's compounded also of good teeth, well-kept hands, a nice speaking voice and manners. The college girl doesn't dye her hair, wear pointed brassieres, nor go without a girdle if she needs one. She doesn't wear great gobs of mascara nor ill-matched lipstick and rouge. She looks like a lady—a modern, frank, able-to-take-care-of-herself lady, but nevertheless a lady. Certainly, one doesn't have to go to college to look like a lady. I'm telling you what recommends the college girl.

Some weeks ago, R. H. Cochrane, President of Universal Pictures introduced me to young Jean Rogers,

GIRL WANTED

It takes more than neatness and good grooming to land that job—

All beauty contest winners don't rate film contracts, but there's a reason why Jean Rogers' case was different.

If you would be trim-looking, wear your hair as Kay Francis does. A long bob is too partyfied for the office.

THE JOB

newly put under contract to the studio, and with practically no experience to her name. Telling me why he had chosen Miss Rogers out of the legions who seek his office, Mr. Cochrane said in effect that he had chosen her, for one reason, because she looked and spoke like a lady. If you think I'm overstressing this, it's simply because we've all grown careless in these modern days. We have come to think that it's rather chic to be slapdash and overcasual in speech and manners and rather chic to be a bit garish about make-up and dress.

When you inexperienced girls go job-seeking, make your appearance set as high a standard for you as you can. Another trite, easy dogma of the beauty and fashion writing tribe is to emphasize the tailored suit. A good suit is simply swell, but if you can't afford a good one, don't compromise on a cheap one. Far better a nice-looking, if inexpensive, black or navy blue dress, with slight touches of white, palest pink or red, according to which does the most for you. Or a quiet print frock, with a plain jacket matching the background of the print. Remember that you'll have considerable walking (and sitting) to do, so give a thought to comfort. We still have some warm days ahead and you don't want to go applying for a job all hot and mussed up. Carry a purse-size bottle of skin freshener with you and take time out on the weary trek to fix your face and hair. By all means wear gloves. They'll keep your hands clean and add to this neat, well-groomed appearance. Give thought to your shoes. They should be comfortable, so that your face won't show the pain you're suffering from those too-tight pumps. But they should be good-looking, too, and not too all-fired sensible. A walking oxford, with a built-up leather heel; a one-strap affair with built-up heel—the strap wide enough to hold your foot firmly on the long walks. Not high, slender heels, but straight, medium heels with a broad base.

I'd suggest that a long, fluffy bob be shortened or curled up to look shorter. You want to look trim and efficient and there definitely is something partyfied about a long bob. (Continued on page 91)

ACCIDENT MAN

That's what Wayne Morris calls himself

Mr. Morris, don'tcha know it's not perlite to squirt a lemon in Bette Davis' eye, even though it's in a scene from "Kid Galahad"? And right, a portrait of Wayne, the new heart throb.

BY MARTHA KERR

I'M THE big accident man around here," Wayne Morris told me over the lunch table in the Green Room at his studio. He sat in his shirt sleeves, almost two hundred pounds of good nature. His blue eyes have little laugh wrinkles around them and his light-brown hair is the kind that won't stay put. Six feet two, he's slim as a reed, and his shoulders are so wide you think you are looking at two people. And what a smile! It seems always to be on the verge of popping out.

He doesn't know the why or wherefore of his popularity and is sure it's accidental, but will tell you enthusiastically that he "sure likes accidents."

Wayne wasn't discovered in the boxing ring, as you might suppose after seeing the way he took care of himself in "Kid Galahad." Neither did he arrive in films by the New York stage. It all happened in this simple fashion: his family moved to Pasadena, and he had no friends there. He was nineteen, in good health, enthusiastic, with lots of time on his hands. Anything could have happened. He had tried several things.

Two years of college proved to him that he was never cut out for a student. He'd spent one summer vacation as a forest ranger. He'd earnestly tried the printing business in order to follow in his father's footsteps. He'd shipped as a sailor on a tramp steamer bound for Australia and learned that the life of a seaman was a bit too salty for him. But never, in all his life, thus far, had he considered acting. He wasn't even a movie fan and not particularly interested in the theatre either. He was, however, lonesome, and it was because he was a stranger in Pasadena that he upped and joined the Community Players. Figured he wouldn't have to work too hard, might have some fun and at least would make some friends.

When he got dressed up in a luxuriant crop of whiskers for his first bit on the stage, he knew he didn't rate as an actor. "But I was someone to carry the beard around," he laughed.

He stayed with the Community Players for three years, appeared in forty-three roles, in forty-two of which he played an old man.

IT was a happy break that when he played his forty-third role, a boy his own age in "Yellow Jacket," a film scout saw him and immediately offered him a contract to work in pictures. Believe it or not, Wayne refused the contract because he had five more months to go before graduation.

"So you see," he said soberly, "it really is an accident that I'm here. They could easily have forgotten me, but when I graduated, the contract was still waiting, so I signed."

The preview of "Kid Galahad" a year later did things for Wayne. His role was one of the plums of the season, and he had proved that he was able to handle it. The critics were delighted with him, and what a kick jaded Hollywood got when in marched the "Kid," literally surrounded by the proud Morris family. There were his mother, father, grandmother, brother and his brother's girl, to say nothing of several cousins.

"In case I turned out to be a flop in the picture, I had my own claque," said Wayne. "And I was nervous, I'll tell you," he added modestly.

They say that after the pre-

MAYBE IT'S LUCK

but whatever it is, Dorothy Lamour's crashing movies is fantastic

DOROTHY LAMOUR looked like a little girl trying to appear grown up when she came into the studio one afternoon recently, fifteen minutes early for her appointment. Her quiet entrance and shy manner seemed as out of place in the busy publicity offices as did her dainty costume. She was wearing an afternoon suit consisting of a black crepe skirt and powder blue linen jacket, hand-stitched with heavy black thread; a little bonnet-like hat that added to the illusion of extreme youth, and a string of silver fox furs that reached from her shoulders to the floor.

"They're building me up as a Glamor Girl," she laughed, as though apologizing for the furs on a warm day. But when did silver foxes ever need excusing? And certainly there is no indication that Dorothy needs to be "built up" as a glamor girl, for she came that way.

They are saying around Hollywood that Dorothy is a lucky girl. Being chosen to play the only important feminine role in "Hurricane," a big spectacle of the South Seas, was one big break, and signing a very lucrative contract to sing on the Chase and Sanborn radio hour every Sunday afternoon was another. Both these commitments are extra-curricular work, supplementing her long-term movie contract.

DOROTHY is the first to admit she has a lot to be thankful for. She has what it takes, but for years she couldn't get closer to Hollywood than Chicago. Privately, she must pucker those full, red lips in a wry little smile when she remembers the long, hard struggle she had to get within shouting distance of a motion picture studio.

Born in New Orleans of French parents, Dorothy has the happy combination of the warm, rich coloring of her race, the charm and grace of a Southern-bred girl, plus a natural ability to act. Her retiring manner and lovable disposition, her eagerness to coöperate and please in her work, have endeared her to everyone she meets.

"Carole Lombard is my best friend," she declared. "I never could tell you how she helped me when I worked with her in 'Swing High, Swing Low.' Morning after morning she came to the studio an hour earlier than she had to, just to make sure that my make-up and clothes were right. Everything was new to me, but she took me in hand and told me what to do. She talked to the director and had my part built up; she talked to the cameramen and saw that I was properly lighted. I don't know what I would have done without her."

Later, when she was told it was bad publicity for a glamor girl to have a husband, she said, "I can't stop talking about my husband. Why, he taught me all I know about singing, and I want him to have the credit."

Dorothy was destined for success, for she has a spirit to win which first demonstrated itself when, at the age of three, she stood on a busy street corner in Birmingham, Alabama, singing a war-time

It makes Dorothy shudder when she thinks how many times she was tempted to bob her hair. Her thirty-inch tresses played an important part in her cinema break.

For gala nights Mary's chiffon embroidered in crystal beads is a glittering success.

Phyllis Brooks wears this wool ensemble of navy blue and luggage tan.

Mary Carlisle's box coat of stiff velvet serves for both daytime and informal wear.

FASHION IS the major study of every pretty girl going away to college, even though the grim halls of higher learning don't give her credit for it. Her high school does not recognize the necessity of training her in the whys and wherefores of what to wear, either, but help is right at hand. A motion picture theatre will give a bright girl enough knowledge of figure-molding economics, trends in modern dress history, and the science of grabbing the spotlight at campus social events to win highest honors from her fellow students.

The new picture that gives the best tips on the sort of young and dashing clothes that are best for campus wear is "Double or Nothing." Bing Crosby is the star, but if you are looking for fashions, you won't have eyes for anyone but Mary Carlisle. Designer Edith Head has a special gift for designing young clothes that are both well-bred and giddy, demure yet dramatic, and the clothes she has made for Mary Carlisle are every girl's dream of what a campus wardrobe should be. A girl can get fashion tips, too, from some of the clothes that blonde Phyllis Brooks wears in "In Old Chicago."

Now, you girls who are just going into a job this Fall or staying at home can profitably join us in our motion picture theatre classroom, of course, but the lessons to be learned here are really more vital to the girl who is going away to be seen in a brand-new setting. The moment she sets foot on the campus, the big examination will take place. Is she a knockout or a dud? Dressing effectively is going to play a big part in the verdict on her.

An essential of dressing effectively where you are making a first impression is—don't be obvious. Don't be so demure and cute, so casual and sportsy, or so slinky and sleek that you can be summed up at first glance and pigeon-holed as a type. It's better to select a costume that is extreme in only one way, one that is extremely becoming. You may be the best athlete from your prep school, but at college you want to look like the all-around type that is set to go places—football games, formal dances, long hikes, or dinner for two at the college inn, so don't spoil your prospects by giving a first impression of a girl who would be swell at sports but never dramatic enough to make a grand entrance at the first frat dance.

The ensemble that Phyllis Brooks is wearing in the accompanying photograph, or the dress and box coat that Mary Carlisle wears are ideal for that first appearance on the campus. They are what college girls call "soft" clothes and what all the smartest are wearing in revolt against spectator sports dresses and tailored shirtmaker frocks. There is no such thing as a spectator sports frock, according to college girls. Either you are an active participant, wearing sweater and skirt, or shorts, or a ski suit, or you are a languid lily on the sidelines, in which case you should show up these muscular athletic girls by wearing the softest and most feminine outfit consistent with good taste for daytime wear.

Katharine Hepburn's cried "Wolf" too often to suit newspaper photographers

BY ROBERT H. McILWAINE

If players act their ages, they're called colorless, so

THEY CAN'T BE NATURAL

SOME FOLKS claim that nobody loves a fat man, while others say the same of a show-off. However, everyone loves a glamorous movie star, although there is hardly one among the stellar ranks who is not a show-off—in fact, equal even unto any village cut-up—when it comes to being the self-appointed center of attraction.

In all the village of Hollywood, there isn't much that could be termed completely natural. Just why, in all probability, is due to the influence of what is known as "the industry." Even the gentry surrounding the city of make-believe seem, to an outsider, to be exhibitionists. Perhaps for this reason we have come to think of Katharine Hepburn, Carole Lombard, Margaret Sullavan, and even a few of our handsome Lotharios, as being somewhat on the smart-alecky side. Consequently, when the opportunity presents itself to see them, in the flesh, you're occasionally surprised to find they would like to be human, but are not very often permitted to take advantage of this luxury.

Publicized as Hollywood's foremost show-off, Katharine Hepburn wears the crown with nonchalance. Born in New Haven, she could easily be publicized as the Connecticut Cut-up! However, there is a more human side to Katie and at the risk of playing Pollyanna, I'm going to take her side and tell a few of the things she put up with before she started "dishing it out." Yes, she has taken it in the past—and usually on the chin.

During the lean days when a burning desire to act sent Katie on the rounds of theatrical offices, she led a dog's life. Literally fired from many companies and ritzed by the thespians fortunate enough to be set, Hepburn didn't get a chance to show temperament. One look at her chin will prove that she was determined to get to the top and show them that she was good.

She wasted no time in doing this, once she was in Hollywood. With her first picture, she became an overnight sensation. No sooner was the country resounding with cheers (Continued on page 99)

JAMES CAGNEY'S TRUE LIFE STORY

BY GLADYS HALL

Intimate facts and thrilling sidelights on a New York lad who made good on Broadway and in Hollywood

IN A CORNER saloon on Eighth Street and Avenue D, in New York, some thirty odd years ago, the genial Irish proprietor was treating his genial Irish cronies to beers, to fat black cigars and pipe tobacco, to chunks of boisterous pride, back-slappings and begorras. For, on that day of July 17th, a second son had been born to the Cagneys of Avenue D. And, shure, the proprietor was none other than James Cagney himself, now, by the Blessed Saints above, James Cagney, Senior. Black Irish was the elder Cagney, but with the free hand, the heart of gold that passed out many a free beer to those who were down on their luck.

Many a burden was lifted from the heart that bore it by the father of the son who, also, would lift the burdens of the oppressed, fight the fight of the downtrodden. "Father was a star in his own right," said the grown Jim Cagney. "His world was his public, too. His home-comings were always events to us kids. I can remember him, swaggering in, hat a little cocked over one eye, especially if he had a beer or so in him, fending us off as we hurled ourselves against him, saying gruffly, 'If I thought you meant it, I'd let you have it,' giving us a light upper cut to the chin with one fist, then swallowing us up in bear hugs and kisses as tender as our mother's." He died when Jimmy was eighteen. That was in 1918.

BUT ON that hot July day on Avenue D in a darkened bedroom of the flat which the Cagneys—mother, father, Harry and now the baby, James—called home, a woman with lines of pride, erasing the lines of pain, looked down on the fuzz of red hair, the dark eyes, the steady pointing fingers of the mite who was the just-born James Francis Cagney, Second.

Said his mother, "He will make his mark in the world, this one."

This was surely a prophetic remark. At the age of five, the small boy was spending hours upon his small, flat stomach, tongue thrust in cheek, breath coming a little short, drawing, copying. He made copies of advertising sketches in the few magazines which found their way, second-hand, into the Cagney home. He put the things he saw and some of the things neither he nor any man ever saw, but only dreamed, on paper.

He seemed to care as much for drawing as he did for the teeming, multifold activities of the crowded streets on which he lived his childhood. He always spoke softly, scarcely above a whisper, so that you had to bend close to hear what he was saying. "Whispering Jim Cagney" they call him here in Hollywood. "Speak up, will ya," was what they shouted at him on the sidewalks of New York.

"I always talked softly," says Jimmy, "and I can explain it. I didn't want to attract attention to myself. I thought that, by speaking softly, I would pass unnoticed. It seems contradictory, I know, because of the theory that actors are actors inasmuch as, primarily, they are exhibitionists. I believe that to be so. Yet, it is true that my whole life has been spent in an effort to avoid being noticed. On the stage or screen, it is different, because—I am not myself when I am acting."

In due course of time the elder Cagney dispersed other free beers and delighted begorras—at the births of Edward, William, and, lastly, Jeanne, the last baby, and the only girl.

All the children went to the public schools in the districts in which they lived. There was nothing at all remarkable, Jimmy says, about his school days, except, perhaps, that in a neighborhood where good boys were lean pickin's he was a good boy. He was quiet and well-behaved. He seemed to be born with gentle manners. He learned his lessons well and earned good marks. He never played hookey nor "sassed" the teacher. He was never told to "see the Principal." He was never a problem child.

NOT THAT he didn't join heartily in the life on the streets. He did—on Eighth Street, later on 79th (in Yorkville), and still later on 96th Street—the extent of the city migrations of the Cagneys.

He was an ardent member of his gang, the Up-The-Blocks. There were, also, the Down-The-Blocks and the Middle-Of-The-Blocks. Furious and often bloody was the rivalry between these gangs. Jimmy held his own, but always quietly and, when possible, bloodlessly.

Baby carriages have come a long way since 1901 and so has little Jimmy Cagney, who celebrated his first birthday in all this finery. Pretty elegant?

He trained with some of the kids in the cellar clubs, kids who were "training" to be fighters. "I never liked punchers," he told me. "I liked boxers. If a kid could box, I didn't care whether he could break an egg with his punches or not." He was known as "Cellar-door Cagney" because of his prowess in doing tap dances on the slanting cellar doors, where so much of the life of the neighboorhood kids was lived. He played marbles, shot crap, swapped junk and boasted with the best of them.

He had, also, the care and responsibility of his young brother, Bill. He became very adept at ways and means of getting rid of Bill, who tagged him patiently, perpetually, with the small boy's hero-worship of an elder brother. Now, with beautiful irony, young Bill is his brother's manager in Hollywood. "And he still tags me," laughed Jimmy.

Jimmy's first pal was a lad named Moishie Weisslitz. They were seatmates in school and gangmates in the Up-The-Blocks. Then Moishie moved away.

"We didn't meet again for nearly twenty years," said Jimmy. "Then, one day, my wife and I were on a Long Beach, Long Island, train. I said to Frances, 'There's a fellow sitting ahead of us whom I haven't seen for twenty years. He won't remember me, but I'm going to speak to him.' I'd only seen the back of his neck and his ears. I went over, tapped him on the shoulder and said, 'Hello, Moishie.' And without so much as looking up, he came right back with 'Hello, Jim.'

"That's friendship. Most of my best friends," said Jimmy, "have been Jews."

From the very beginning, there was something innately fastidious and gentle and sensitive about the boy who was to become known as a tough guy on the screen. There is something fine and exceptional about a man who, as a boy, went through so crude a childhood and emerged with only pity for the bitter bread he saw broken all around him.

At fourteen, a tried and true member of the gang known as "The Up-The-Blocks," Jim took time out from his many activities for this informal shot.

Baseball, boxing—the clean sports—appealed to Jimmy then. They appeal to him now, too. He neither smokes nor drinks, for he saw too much of it.

When Jimmy was six or seven the family moved to 79th Street, and later to 96th Street. Living on the last-named block made an indelible mark on Jimmy. "There was a pall of tragedy over that street—96th between Third and Lexington Avenue," says Jimmy today. "I used to sit on my mother's lap, in the early gray mornings," he continued, "watching for my father to come home. I'd see a little chap, like a skinny gray shadow coming out of the crevices of the walls, foraging in the garbage cans for his breakfast. He was snagging food for his sagging little belly. He was a boy who sat next to me at school. And he was the chap who, later, went to the chair for murder. He first got twenty years to life for a stick-up, was sent to Dannemora and there carved up another prisoner—and burned for it.

POVERTY," said Jimmy, "was the exact cause of that old schoolmate of mine going to the chair. He was one of seven kids. His father was a bricklayer. Bricklayers work only in certain seasons. His mother was too busy to take care of the kids.

"It's a funny thing, but the elder brothers in such families—the boys who have to take care and do take care of the younger ones—always turn out okay. This fellow was a younger brother, and he got the chair. He was at Sing Sing when I went up there with a semi-professional team to play the Sing Sing team. I saw him. He and I had played ball, under different conditions, on the sidewalks of New York. Yet, were the conditions so different for him? I think not. I think they were shaping him, inexorably, beyond his volition, for the end he was to meet. I don't believe it was his fault. He was weak-bodied, on the verge of tuberculosis, mentally deficient, and poverty did the rest.

"There was another chap, too, a still younger brother in the same family. He did a stick-up, too. An Italian club. They caught him. Shots were fired, and a cop was killed. He was badly wounded. While he was bleeding to death, dying, they kicked him down five flights of stairs and out into the street. When he asked for water they said, 'It's water you want, is it?'—and with that they flung swill in his face. When he asked for a blanket because he was cold, they said, 'Cold, are you?'—and gave him for a coverlet—the corpse of the policeman he had shot. He was tubercular, too. After that kicking and mauling, he was paralyzed from the waist down. He went to Sing Sing, too. You see, these fellows never had a chance. They strike, blindly and bestially, at the blind and bestial forces which have, first, struck bludgeoning blows at them.

"Yep, there was something sinister about that street. There were always crêpes on the doors on 96th Street. A miasma hung over the place. One side of the block was lined with wretched tenements. On the other side, where we lived, the houses and flats were fairly substantial. That is New York. On the 'bad side,' there were always ambulances backed up to doorways to pick up the broken bodies of kids who had fallen off the roofs, or who had been bashed up in family rows. There was always a hearse picking up some little body which hadn't been able to stand the gaff. There were always 'contagion' signs, placarding the doors. The air was constantly made hideous by the shrieks and screams of the kids and the sobs and moans of the mothers. And in those gray mornings, there were the pale shadows of the thin-bellied little chaps ferreting out food from the garbage pails.

"We escaped contamination, if that is what it is," said Jimmy, "thanks to our mother. Thanks to the fact that she made a twenty-four-hour job of being a mother. She was, and is, a very definite and forceful character. Irish and courageous. Her mother was an Irish girl. Her father,

"Penny Arcade's" Broadway audiences didn't realize it then, but the gent simply known as James Cagney and the gal called Joan Blondell were potential pitcher stars.

born in Oslo, was a sailor and machinist. A grand old man, fierce and vigorous. He lived with us when I was a kid, and I was scared to death of him. Our worst punishment was to be told, 'You'll have to sleep with Grandpa tonight.' For old Henry Nelson slept 'with one eye open,' and if I so much as twitched a muscle, he was thundering at me.

"My father's people were Irish and had been in the paint and varnish business in New York. They were hard-working, respectable, God-fearing and, at one time, well-to-do.

OUR MOTHER'S chief ambition in life was to 'get the kids an education.' She had terrific drive, and she drove, consistently and without detours, in that one direction. When a relative left her a modest legacy, she wouldn't touch it.

"She put it by as an educational fund for us. She took a great, intelligent interest in medicine. She was the direct cause of Harry and Edward becoming doctors. And splendid doctors they are, too, the one in Woodside, the other in Jackson Heights, Long Island. When she was ill she would describe and make notes of her own symptoms so that she could discuss them, intelligently, with the boys.

"She used herself as a case history. When she was in the hospital for an operation she did the same thing. She kept a chart of her own condition, the causes contributing to it, the medical and surgical care, the results, good and bad. When, later, she suffered from a heart condition, she took the same detached and scientific interest in that. Never strong in body, she more than compensated for that by the strength of her mind and character.

"And she was a mother twenty-four hours of the day. That was her job, and she did it, full time, over time. She pitted herself firmly against the forces of our environment—the streets, the schools, the boys we met, the things we were bound to hear, the influences we couldn't wholly escape.

"She talked with us, not at us. She told us that what you give in this life you also get back in kind. She taught us that what you do is done, again, to you. She showed us, clearly, that ugliness, crime and vulgarity pay their own dividends in ugliness, crime and vulgarity.

"She decorated our lives," said her son, "as pleasantly as circumstances permitted. We always had jolly Christmases, stockings hung up on the gas jets, candies and toys, a turkey dinner. We only had one or two Christmas trees, because, in those days, Christmas trees were lit with candles. One Christmas ours caught on fire and old Grandpop Nelson had to snatch it, a burning brand, from the front room and heave it into the street. After that we never had another. Walk-up flats in congested areas of New York are too serious as fire hazards.

"She did a fair share of 'entertaining,' too. I can remember 'company' coming in for tea, and how I was always sent to the corner bakery for lady fingers. Lady fingers were my passion. My mother often says that lady fingers were my only lapse. For I'd be sent on an errand to bring home a dozen, and when I got home, there were seldom more than three or four left! I often think, looking back, that those 'company afternoons' were held to give us kids a chance to show 'good manners.' We had to bow, speak politely, and exercise the gifts of hospitality."

YES. A mother twenty-four hours of the day was Carolyn Cagney. And as witness thereof her children speak for her—her two sons who are doctors; Jimmy, whose success is self-evident; Bill who is his brother's manager.

It was Bill, incidentally, who gave up a career of his own in the movies because of his strong resemblance to his brother. It wasn't fair to Jimmy, Bill decided for himself.

"If I had been rotten and some of the fans had mistaken me for Jim, it wouldn't have done him any good. Even if I had been successful the resemblance was still too strong to make it jake." And so, he gave it up.

Oddly, so Jimmy told me, his brothers and sister all resemble him, but not one of them resemble each other. The Cagneys have been, always, "all for one and one for all." "Our motto," Jimmy continued, "was 'united we stand, divided we fall.' I can't remember a time when, if any one of us had three bucks, he didn't throw it immediately into the kitty. We never thought of doing anything else. Boys who worked for their own 'pocket money' were beyond our understanding. I'm glad of it. It's good for a fellow to work. It's better for a fellow to work in order to live. It teaches him that there's more to life than just having fun.

"And doing things together, as Mother drummed into our heads, sharing everything, working for a common end, instead of each going off in separate directions, gave us the feeling we were strong. The trouble with most poor families is that they don't have that community feeling, and alone they're helpless in a tough world."

Yes, Mrs. Cagney's job is well done. Successful, every one of her children. (Young Jeanne is now at Hunter College.) They are not only successful in their professions, but successful as human beings, too. This is the real tribute they pay Carolyn Cagney, who had all of the harsh, inimical forces of the New York streets and their pitfalls to battle and conquer. Jimmy, by the way, neither smokes nor drinks. He saw enough of that when he was a lad.

It's all very amusing to Jimmy now, but his first appearance on any stage was as a Chinese pantomimest at a neighborhood Settlement House. He insists that there were no complaints from the cash customers.

Another scene from his first legitimate stage offering, which also boasted the late Ross Alexander and Paul Guilfoyle. Though it took a little time, all of them eventually found spots for themselves under the Klieg lights.

Jimmy's first "girl" was one named simply Annie. He never knew her last name. His chief recollection of her is that she wore pigtails and was shiningly clean. Their first encounter came about like this: Annie passed him on 79th Street one day and knelt down and tied up his shoe laces for him. "I untied them," said Jimmy, shamelessly, "just before she came along." Jimmy and Annie "kept company" until one or the other moved away. He carried her books to school, helped her with her homework, stood up for her when other boys teased her, made offerings of sticky, all-day suckers, wads of gum and, once, a scarlet ribbon for her pig-tails.

From Bill I learned that Jimmy was "a one" with the girls and that his method was, consistently, the same as his method with Annie. He first brought them, by subtle suggestion, never by force, to their knees before him. And then, once the domination of the male was established, he asked no more service, but gallantly and humbly served.

When Jimmy was ten the family moved to Ridgewood, Long Island. Jimmy will never lose that feeling of rapturous release. There are many city-bred lads, he told me, who are so used to the crowded sidewalks of New York that they are lonely in the country. Not Harry, Edward, Jimmy and Bill. They took to the fields like young field animals.

They climbed trees and loved the feeling of dirt roads and meadow grass under their bare feet. They acquired a mongrel dog and he was, undoubtedly, the forerunner of the Chow dogs Jimmy owns, loves, raises and personally cares for in Beverly Hills, today. The little frame house in Ridgewood is the forerunner, too, no doubt, of the seventy-acre farm Jimmy has just bought at Martha's Vineyard. The love of the country, the sea, the fields and the woods is a powerful, absorbing love with Jimmy today.

But that happy life in Ridgewood didn't last very long. It was too far for the elder Cagney to commute. He was already ailing.

So, with dismal shrieks and protests and more than a little silent suffering in the wrenched heart of young James, the Cagney family moved back to New York, to that 96th Street which was to become stigmata to him.

JIMMY began to grow up. He passed his grammar grades successfully. He went to Stuyvesant High School and continued there with the drawing he had never given up. While in high school he helped pay attendant expenses by working, part time, at the neighborhood Settlement House. He worked "on the door." He saw to it that the boys used the pool and the gym. At the Settlement House, he met Mr. and Mrs. Burton James, who were to take the first really constructive interest in his drawing, in the potentialities in that compact, soft-spoken, somehow sound, young personality. Mr. and Mrs. James too, echoed that first prophetic remark of Jimmy's mother, the prophecies of Eighth Street and 79th Street and 96th Street.

It was Mr. and Mrs. James who arranged for Jimmy to meet people who could look at his drawings with eyes of discernment. That he had ability seemed to be beyond doubt. An architect, perhaps? A designer of theatrical scenery? A cartoonist? Why not? Such suggestions pleased and interested Jimmy, little more. For Jimmy never thought beyond the present. Jimmy had neither time nor opportunity for dreams of future aspirations or possibilities. Life was too much a matter of expediency with the Cagneys. It was a matter of "How many dimes and quarters for the kitty today?", not "How many mythical millions ten years later?" Millions in the future wouldn't put bread and Irish stew on the Cagney table then. No, Jimmy couldn't reckon in futures, no matter how glittering.

Mr. and Mrs. James and Cagney became fast friends, however. They formed a Dramatic Club, there at the Settlement House. They put on plays for and with the neighborhood boys and girls. Jimmy designed and painted scenery for them. On one occasion Mr. and Mrs. James asked Harry Cagney to play the lead in the Chinese pantomime they were producing. But Harry, already deep in pre-medical work, couldn't take the time. And so Mr. James asked Jimmy to substitute for his brother. Jimmy did. That was his very first appearance on any stage—as a Chinese pantomimist. "And no bells rang out, wild or otherwise," grinned Jimmy reminiscently, "in my belfry or in anybody else's. I was all right, I guess. There were no complaints."

Between work in high school, his drawing and his work after school, Jimmy had little time for other interests. He played a couple of parts in other amateur theatricals, in "Lost Silk Hat," "The Rising of the Moon," and other plays. He read omnivorously, and he learned the joy and satisfaction of discussing the books he had read and what he got out of them; he learned the joy of discussing life and theories and abstract ideas with his friends, Mr. and Mrs. James. He remembers, especially, a long evening spent in arguing the special merits and demerits of Shaw's "Man and Superman."

But when, after a protracted illness, the elder Cagney died, with two brothers in medical school, with his mother also ailing and a baby sister (not to mention young Bill, who was already contributing his quota of dimes and quarters to the Cagney kitty), with all of these many and pressing responsibilities, Jimmy knew only one law—the law of getting a job, the law of being constantly on the alert for another job, for other jobs, with more pay to 'em. It didn't matter, in Jimmy's scheme of things, whether you liked a job or not. It only mattered how much dough it paid.

During summer vacations Jimmy held down two jobs, one by day, one by night. He wrapped bundles at Wanamaker's by day and jerked sodas by night. During school sessions he served as a bell-hop at the Friars Club by day, hours 5 p. m. to 3:30 a. m.; then school at 8:30 a. m. and bundle wrapping or soda jerking again in the scant interims. He also worked after school at the New York Public Library. Jimmy learned, there, to love the very smell and sight and feel of books. He felt kinship with them.

"It was all good for me," Jimmy said. "No, I don't feel sorry for myself. On the contrary, it made me realize that there was something beyond just having fun in life. There is."

After graduating from high school, Jimmy got a job as a junior architect. He did tracing and lettering which his long years of apprenticeship with a pencil had qualified him to do. While working in the architect's office, he still held his job at the Settlement House, nights.

Then came the War. Jimmy enlisted in the Officers

The grapefruit Cagney pushed into Mae Clarke's face in "Public Enemy" made history, and the picture made Jim. So you can't blame him if he likes to call this his favorite fil-lum.

Jimmy, the Missus and Joan Blondell took the same train for Hollywood the day they signed on the dotted line. "Smart Money" was the second film to co-star Jim and the pretty Joan.

'Way back in 1932, Loretta Young was Cagney's heart interest in "Taxi."

Training School. With his $30. a month from this source, he entered Columbia University and there took a general course, majoring in Art. He did not do pre-medical school work, as has been said. The Armistice signed, Jimmy obtained his discharge from the Army and took the first job that presented itself—bundle-wrapping again and again at Wanamaker's.

NOW, IT was becoming more and more imperative that the Cagney "kitty," as they always called it, be fed something heartier than dimes and quarters. There were the two brothers in medical school, working their way through. They had Carolyn Cagney's legacy, to be sure, to make it possible, but they needed an occasional lift, even so, what with expensive text books and laboratory fees. There was young Bill coming along and there was, unwavering, the mother's determination that "the kids" have their educations.

While bundle-wrapping, Jimmy confided in one of the clerks that he wanted a job "with more dough." Had to have it, in fact. The young clerk advised him that he could give him a steer "if you could only sing and dance." Jimmy said, "I couldn't do either, of course. But I said I could—also, of course. The 'steer' this chap gave me landed me on a trapeze where I hung by my neck for the sum of $25. a week, which was just $9. more per week than I had been getting. And, as a consequence, was a little bit all right with me. I would have hung by my nose from the moon for nine dollars more a week.

"Then, for about eight weeks, I was one of six boys doing female impersonations. It was a knockabout act, purely burlesque. We had a lot of fun, and it never occurred to any one of us to be ashamed of it. It might seem strange and unbelievable, taking into account my habitual desire to go unnoticed. But again, this illustrates what I mean when I say that I am not shy or self-conscious when I am on the stage or screen. For there I am not myself. I am not that fellow, Jim Cagney, at all. I certainly lost all consciousness of him when I put on skirts, wig, paint, powder, feathers and spangles! Besides, that was the time, right after the War, when service acts were still fresh in the mind, when female impersonators were the vogue."

Jimmy's family, however, thought that he was wasting his time. The young medical students, his brothers, and the mother who had wanted professions for her sons, could hardly be expected to look with favor upon a relative of theirs dangling about in pink tulle. So Jimmy, with a shrug, departed from the stage and became a runner in Wall Street. From runner he was promoted to "window man"—one of the invisible brethren who sit aloft, behind apertures, and make signs to the Bulls and Bears down in the dust of the arena.

It was when he was eighteen that Jimmy's first serious romance touched and colored his hard-working life. There isn't much time for romance to wedge its thin, tenuous, thrilly way into a life compounded of three and four jobs a day—school, study, burdens and responsibilities that put blinders on young eyes, a grappling iron on a young heart. Romance, to find a niche in such a life, must touch it with extraordinarily poignant finger tips, insinuate itself with an extraordinarily penetrating passion. In other words, it had to be pretty real to quicken the pulse of young Jim Cagney.

This young love of Jimmy's was a college student. She must be nameless, for she is, now, happily married and the mother of two children. At first, all their talk was of books, art, music, of the things they both loved. They took long bus rides under Autumnal moons. They went to the movies and held hands. They walked up and down Riverside Drive. While Jimmy was working at the Friars he got a pair of free passes, occasionally, and then he took his girl to the show. Their only spats arose because Jimmy wouldn't take her to dance halls. Dancing was "sissified,' he said, and 'only cake-eaters dance.'

"The Crowd Roars," with Eric Linden, was another smash-bang Cagney thriller.

They were sort of engaged, says Jimmy. They talked of what they would do with their lives together when Jimmy made good. They would have a little house in the country, kids, fields, flowers and books, painting their joined lives with gentle glory. Then Jimmy left Wall Street and, again, went on the stage. Jimmy's girl did not approve of young men who went on the stage. She saw no future in that kind of thing. No future, at any rate, that she wanted to share. So she said goodbye to Jimmy under the shadow of Grant's Tomb. And she took up, in time, with a tall, slim young man who went to dance parlors with her and didn't think dancing was sissified. Jimmy felt as if all the skyscrapers in New York had dislodged their brick and mortar upon his bruised spirit. "I thought my heart was broken," he says. "It wasn't, but I thought it was. And thinking is as painful as being. It wasn't broken at all. But I didn't know that then."

IT WAS shortly after Jimmy was promoted to "window man" on Wall Street that he quit, very suddenly, to answer a call for boys for a musical show. "How I was picked," laughs Jimmy softly, "I'll never know. Must have been a scarcity of boys, amounting to a famine. There were no mail-order dancing schools in those days, y'know."

The show, which was the first legitimate one to present James Cagney to the world (though more or less anonymously since his name was only one of the group of chorus boys) was "Pitter Patter," with Helen Bolton and Ernest Truex in leading roles.

And there, in that show, Jimmy Cagney met the girl

He was a chorus boy and she a chorus girl when Frances and Jimmy said their "I do's" to the preacher in little ole New York.

Hot clinches never appealed to Jimmy—a surefire punch was much more to his liking—but here he is in a romantic pose with Virginia Bruce from "Winner Take All."

However, a typical Cagney special like "Mayor of Hell," which was long on action and short on love, was right up his alley. Here he is with lovely Madge Evans.

who was to become his wife.

"In the chorus of 'Pitter Patter,'" said Jimmy, "I, a chorus boy, met Frances Willard Vernon, a chorus girl. Yep, 'twas love at first sight, practically. Frances was fresh from an Iowa farm. She had made a short stop-over at a girls' school in Chicago. And then, stage-struck, which I had never been, she came to New York and got a job in the chorus.

"She was so shy, so obviously frightened to death of New York, life in the Big City, the theatre and theatrical people, that I was attracted to her out of the desire to protect the kid. It was much the same feeling as that of taking a little child into the dark and proving that there is no bogieman concealed there.

"She was the country I loved, the fields and the streams. She gave me that sense of rapturous release I had had when, as a kid, we moved to Ridgewood. I was the City she feared. I didn't want her to know the things I knew. It was up to me to see that she didn't. It was a job I loved—and then I knew that she was the girl I loved.

"Our marriage was all very quiet and, to the world, uneventful. An obscure chorus boy and girl getting married in New York isn't news. We weren't news at all, except to one another. But we were very much in love, and that is always headline stuff to the parties concerned.

"After we were married, we did a vaudeville act together. We toured a lot of the tank towns, under the name of 'Cagneys' Circuit'. We also did a few musical shows. I taught Frances to tap, and she became one of the best women taps dancers in the business. The pupil was better than the teacher. I kept hoping that the day would come when she could retire, be billed only as 'Mrs. James Cagney.' I kept hoping, too, for the day when we would have kids of our own to struggle for, plan for, as my mother had for us."

Perhaps the only real tragedy in the life of Frances and Jim Cagney is that they have never been blessed with "kids to fight for." They have wanted them and hoped for them and still want them so very much.

They lived in Greenwich Village after they were married. But Jimmy did not pick up any of his so-called "radical ideas" in the Village. For that was 1926 and the Village, per se, was no more. The avid young intellectuals, the poets, the long-haired men and short-haired women, the eager young soap-box addicts who burned to redress the wrongs of the world were gone.

"Our friends," said Jimmy, "were, principally, newspaper men and their wives. Some of them were chaps I had known in the old days in New York. Robert Sill, then New York correspondent for the Boston Herald, was one of them. Sill and I had been kids together on 79th Street. He had, for a time, shared the job at the Settlement House with me. Arthur Klein and I had been friends since we were in our early teens. Charlie Leonard, now chief of advertising for United Artists, was a bell-hop at the Friars, when I was 'hopping' there. Then there was Morris Gilbert of the New York Times; Jim Fair of the Pittsburgh Gazette Times; Ik Shuman of the New York Times; Bryan Field, Jimmy Kiernan and Si Fishkind, also of the Times.

We worked very hard and talked a lot and had a lot in common. And we also had more than our share

Like the rest of the male contingent, Jimmy tried the spinach on the upper lip. Whatever the rest of us thought, Joan approved, for "He Was Her Man" for seven reels.

Because he excelled as a hoofer, Mr. C. could do a mean fox-trot when the occasion demanded, as was the case in "Devil Dogs of the Air," with Margaret Lindsay.

Bet you never knew what a "G-Man" was 'til that Cagney man put those government sleuths on the movie map. That's Mag Lindsay with him.

Talented as a thespian, our Jimmy can wield a pencil and turn out an artistic piece of work, too. Above, "The Irish in Us" with June Trotter.

of fun. Frances and I laid the groundwork then, I suppose, for the kind of life we have always led and still lead. We seldom go to parties, either in New York or in Hollywood. Our social activities, now as then, consist in having a few good friends at our home in Beverly Hills when we are there, or on our boat, sitting up all night and chewing the furious fat. Frank McHugh, Pat and Eloise O'Brien, the Chester Morrises, Albert Hackett, Frances Goodrich and a few others, are good friends of ours. And always Bill, of course. In the summer my mother and Jeanne are with us. We've tried to persuade my mother to live with us, but she's more content where she is, near New York and my brothers who, being doctors, can care for her when she needs it."

It was shortly after Jimmy's marriage that he left the gaslight circuit and came, so to speak, to Broadway. But before Broadway came an adventure, seldom told, little suspected, in Jimmy's career. For, some five years before Jimmy came to Hollywood to stay, he made a trip to Hollywood and did not stay. He didn't remain because he couldn't get work; because he would have starved if he had remained. He came, with his wife, to visit his wife's mother and sisters, and, perhaps vaguely at the back of his mind, with the idea of breaking into pictures. He tried vaudeville. He and Harry Gribbon, then one of the screen's funny men, got up a vaudeville act together. They tried it out at San Diego. It ran for one night, and it folded.

He put an ad in the local papers. The ad read "Dancing Instructor" or words to that effect. He sat for days behind his tiny shingle waiting for the pupils who did not come. Finally, one did. A tall, burly Scot, with a newspaper-wrapped package under his arm. The package revealed a pair of clogs. Then and there the Scotchman did such an elaborate routine that Jimmy, honest, though on the thin edge of hunger, said, "I can't teach you anything."

And said the single "pupil," "I know you can't. That's why I came. I make a practice of answering all ads for dancing lessons just to show the 'teachers' up!"

So, after some four or five months, after casting offices would have none of him, after he realized that he could not get a job, even as an extra, Jimmy and the Missus pooled their last dollars, eked out enough for a pair of tickets to New York—and hit, humbly at first, the vaudeville circuit again. Few people know that Jimmy ever made that first ill-fated pilgrimage to the movie Mecca.

There came a chance for an audition for the role of a roughneck in Maxwell Anderson's play, "Outside Looking In." Jimmy made the audition and played the roughneck. Which was, presumably, the forerunner of the "tough guys" he has played, so consistently, ever since—so contrary to his true nature. For Jimmy Cagney is the very antithesis of a tough guy. His soft, whispering voice, his mild and gentle manner proceed from a warm and tender heart, from instincts more silken than burly and rough.

The man who founded the Humanitarian Party speaks for himself. Jimmy says that his activities in the much publicized humane directions have been fulsomely exaggerated. But Jimmy, as your true "tough guy" never is, is modest. Exaggerated or not, the idea of the Humanitarian Party did originate with Jimmy. Whenever there are strikes, labor troubles, floods, or disasters of any sort—either Acts of God or acts of men—Jimmy always steps generously to the fore and gives, unstintingly, of time and thought and more tangible commodities.

He is, now, an officer in the Screen Actors Guild here in Hollywood. The Guild was designed, he said, "to improve the lot of the 'little fellows' in pictures." A project which would, naturally, press close to his remembering heart. Remembering the little gray shadows, scavenging from garbage pails. Remembering all the sordid sights of his poverty-stricken youth.

Next, Jimmy scored in the hit play, "Women Go on Forever" with Mary Boland. While he was working on Broadway, he gave lessons in tap "on the side," for the purpose of augmenting the family income, so that the Cagney "kitty" in his own home and in his mother's home would not be lean of dimes and quarters.

Maybe we're wrong, but remember all the fussing and feuding that went on over that picture contract? You wouldn't say that this get-up for "Frisco Kid" had anything to do with it, would ya?

The next season came, and he staged the "Grand Street Follies," playing a prominent role in them. They ran for two seasons.

The year, 1929, brought Jimmy his big chance, a role in George Kelly's memorable play, "Maggie, the Magnificent." And Jimmy played opposite a blond girl by the then unknown name of Joan Blondell. They both scored hits, and both were signed for "Penny Arcade" for the next season. In the meantime, Warner Brothers bought the play and Joan and Jimmy and Mrs. Cagney came to Hollywood. The picture version of the play went into production and emerged as "Sinners' Holiday," and was the beginning of screen fame for Joan Blondell and Jimmy Cagney.

EVEN THEN," Jimmy says now, "I had no fixed idea of what I wanted to do or to be. Vaudeville, plays on Broadway, picture work in Hollywood were all 'just jobs' to me. Never has there been a moment when I have paused and said, 'Now I am an actor. This is my profession. Here I am, all set.' I would, all along the "Ceiling Zero" was the last picture that Jimmy made for Warners. June Travis is the gal.

Every man, be he movie star or your very best beau, dreams of having a den all his own.

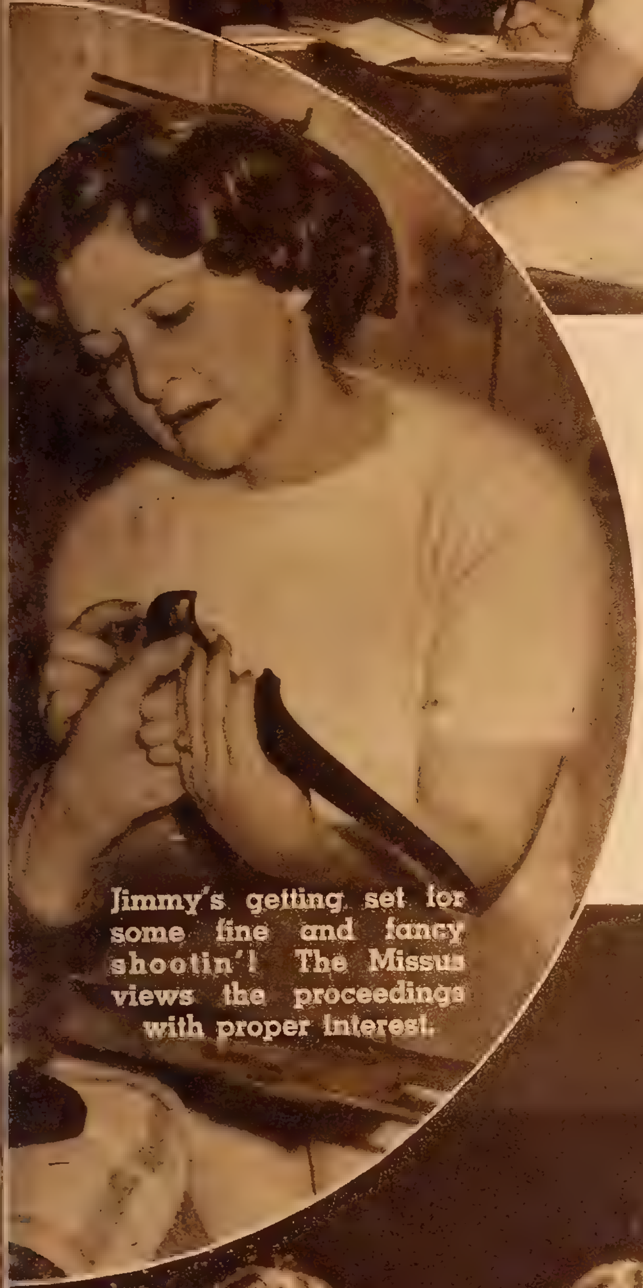
Happy days are here for the Cagneys. They're not stepper-outers, but life isn't dull, either.

Jim never knows what to expect when the phone rings. It might be the Humanitarian Society or a pal asking for advice—or the Warner Brothers!

Like many Hollywood stars, Jimmy turns to his wife when weighty decisions must be made on his screen stories, casts and directors.

Wifey plays secr'try, friend and companion to Jim, who often chooses the rocky road.

Frances Cagney can whip up a right tasty meal, too, when it's maid's night out.



Jimmy's getting set for some fine and fancy shootin'! The Missus views the proceedings with proper interest.

Vacationtime for the Cagneys means a trek to their farm at Martha's Vineyard, where Jimmy can relax.

Yep, a piano-tinkler, too. When you go a-visitin' with the Cagneys, there's no tellin' what Jim will be up to.

line, have taken any job that turned up, whenever it came, whatever it was; whether in the theatre, in a canned soup factory, in pictures, in the circus.

"I might easily have become a knockabout comedian. I may end up yet with the red nose and the baggy pants.

"Not that I don't take my work seriously. I do—very. But the point is, I'd take any work seriously, raised, as I was, to know darned well that work is serious. I took my bundle-wrapping seriously. I took my job at the Settlement House seriously. I bell-hopped with complete concentration. I was a female impersonator for all I was worth, with everything in me—and glad to get it to do.

"I can't say that I haven't gotten a certain satisfaction from some of the pictures I have made. Those which pleased me more than others have been 'Public Enemy,' 'Winner Take All,' 'Jimmy, the Gent' and 'Ceiling Zero.'

"I am not the characters I play. I believe that, in order to do anything well, you must have perspective, a certain amount of objectivity, of detachment. This is necessary in order to give a clear portrait of a character. If I were a 'tough guy,' I couldn't play one even as well as I hope I do. It has been more valuable to me to stand on the sidelines and, with a certain degree of impersonality, register the reactions I have noted. The idea of playing oneself is essentially fallacious. The fact that I am supposed to be a tough guy in real life doesn't bother me in the least. It's amusing. It doesn't matter."

Jim learned early the necessity of keeping the Cagney "kitty" filled and doesn't mind admitting that when he signs a new contract, money is an important factor.

What does matter to Jimmy is the right or the wrong of something that does matter. Soft-spoken, mild-mannered as he is, he will fight to his own victory or his own destruction, if need be, for that in which he honestly and truthfully believes.

The present situation bears testimony to the above. And the present situation, according to my understanding, is that Jimmy is free of his contract at Warner Brothers, having won his case when it first came to court several months ago. In the Fall, so it stands at this writing, Warner Brothers' appeal to the decision handed down by the Superior Court of Los Angeles County will come before the Supreme Court of California. If the high court upholds the original verdict, Jimmy will have no further question thrown upon his right to continue to work for whomever he pleases. If their appeal is sustained, the effect will be to reinstate the contract under which Jimmy was working for them. In that case, if he continues to work in motion pictures, he will have to do so as an employee of Warner Brothers for two more years, which is the length of time that the annulled contract had to run. He is not at all certain, however, at this writing, that he will care to continue on the screen, if he has to work again under the contract which he fought so strenuously to have abrogated.

Yes, a fighter is Jimmy, bearing the memory, never a healed scar, of broken minds and broken bodies spattering themselves to bloody bits against forces which trod them under the heels of so-called righteousness they could never hope to elude. Might is not right to Jimmy. And he will fight, but only for what he feels, deeply and with conviction, to be right. And then he will fight so long as there is breath in his body, heat in his heart and memory in his mind.

Jimmy made "Great Guy" for Grand National. He will soon complete a musical, in which he does considerable dancing, titled, "Something to Sing About." He has signed for two more Grand National pictures, the first of which probably will be a story called "Dynamite," a dramatic tale of illegal oil traffic in Texas.

Either before making "Dynamite" (if they work out the right story for the title), or immediately following it, Jimmy will go to his new farm at Martha's Vineyard for at least two or three months' vacation.

"I want to spend most of the year, every year, at the Vineyard," Jimmy said, "and come to Hollywood only to work—in pictures, I mean. For I shall work on the farm, too, of course. I'll hoe and sow and plant and reap and care for the animals and do the chores. I won't be idle. Couldn't be. No need to be. I'll still take my vocal lessons, as I do now, three days a week. I'll keep up my study of musical theory and harmony. I'll have my four guitars, violins, two pianos.

"I play them all—and all very badly. I still draw occasionally, though my drawing is, now, more instinctive than consciously planned and executed. I have sublimated the old yen for drawing into drawing characters for the screen, I guess. It amounts to much the same thing. Such drawing as I do nowadays, I usually do on a tablecloth while I am lunching or dining—little, intimate quick sketches of my table companions.

"We'll have friends to stay with us and the family, of course—my mother, my brothers, Bill, my little sister, Jeanne, on her vacations from Hunter.

"I have a lot of reading I want to do. I've just read 'Inside Europe,' 'Way of a Transgressor,' 'Away from It All,' Webb Miller's 'I Found No Peace' and W. E. Woodward's 'New American History.' I'll have time to do more reading up there.

"I want to keep on making pictures, of course, under the right conditions. Two a year, if possible. If you want to do your best, that's plenty.

"I'll work wherever I am, whatever the work may be," smiled Jimmy, that slight, almost silken smile of his which seems to brush lightly across the gravity of his face. 'That habit can't be broken at this late date. I'll never forget the Cagney 'kitty'—never."

A little of the Cagney technique goes a long, long way, as his poor victims can testify. He demonstrates it for a scene in "Great Guy."

This whirl of pep danced day and night to perfect those dance routines for "Something to Sing About" with Evelyn Daw.

When it comes to sports, Jimmy doesn't have to take off his new Fall millinery to anyone! He can run up a ping-pong game (above left), do a little hedge-hurdling, skip rope and tear off a tennis game that would interest even the expert Fred Perry!

SPECIAL CHILD CLINICS . . . SPECIAL DAILY CARE . . .
EVEN A SPECIAL LAXATIVE
NO WONDER TODAY'S CHILDREN GET A BETTER START!

WHAT a lucky start in life the youngster of 1937 gets!

No leave-it-to-chance care for him.

Special clinics guard him in every step of his growth and development. Special foods—special soaps—special toys—in fact, from his first day on, everything he gets is made especially for him.

Doesn't it stand to reason he should have a special laxative, too? A child's little system is not like yours. It is much too frail for the ruthless effects of an "adult" laxative.

For that reason, many doctors suggest Fletcher's Castoria. It is, as you know, purely a child's laxative—made especially and only for children.

It contains no harsh, "adult" drugs—nothing that could cause cramping pains. Nothing, in fact, that could possibly harm a child's delicate system.

Fletcher's Castoria works chiefly on the lower bowel, gently urging the muscular movement. It is safe—sure—yet thorough.

A famous baby specialist has said he couldn't write a better prescription than Fletcher's Castoria.

And Fletcher's Castoria has a pleasant taste. Children don't balk at taking it. That's important! For, as you know, you can easily upset a child's entire nervous system by forcing him to take a bad-tasting medicine.

More than 5,000,000 mothers have learned to rely on Fletcher's Castoria. Why not get the economical Family-Size bottle from your druggist today? The signature, Chas. H. Fletcher, appears on every bottle.

HOW WE TESTED
BEAUTY
CREAMS

LABORATORY TESTS on rats were conducted for over three years . . .

1 We fed rats a diet completely lacking in "skin-vitamin." Their skin grew harsh, dry, scaly—old looking. Under the microscope, the oil glands were dried up, the tissues of the skin were shrunken.

2 Then we applied Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Creams daily for three weeks. The rats were still on a diet completely lacking in "skin-vitamin"—yet, with just this application of the cream their skin improved. It became smooth again, clear, healthy.

Now—this new Cream brings to Women the active "Skin-Vitamin"

Copyright, 1937, Pond's Extract Company

3 Under the microscope, the oil glands were seen to be healthy again. The dried-up, flattened skin cells were rounded out. The shrunken tissues were normal again!

FINALLY we gave Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Creams to women to try. For four weeks they used the new creams faithfully—women who had been using other creams before. Three out of every four of them asked for more. And these are the things they said: "My skin is so much smoother." "My pores are finer!" "My skin has a livelier look now." "Lines are disappearing". . .

Exposure is constantly drying the necessary "skin-vitamin" out of the skin. Now, Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cream helps to bring it back! If your skin shows signs of deficiency in "skin-vitamin," try Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cream—today.

FOUR YEARS AGO, scientists first learned that a certain known vitamin heals wounds, burns, infections—quicker and better.

They found that certain harsh, dry conditions of the skin are due to insufficient supply of this vitamin in diet. This was not the "sunshine vitamin." Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not "irradiated." But the "skin-vitamin."

This vitamin helps your body to rebuild skin tissue. Aids in keeping skin beautiful.

Of great importance to women

Pond's requested biologists of high standing to study what would be the effects of this "skin-vitamin" when put in Pond's Creams.

For over three years they worked. Their story is told you above. Also the story of the women who used the new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams!

Today—we offer you the new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams!

In the same Pond's Creams

The new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams are the same creams you have always known—with the active "skin-vitamin" added. They are in the same jars, with the same labels—at the same price. You use them the same way you did the old. Now this new ingredient gives added value to the millions of jars of Pond's Creams used by women every year.

Try Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cream for yourself—today. On sale everywhere.

RUBY KEELER, popular dancing screen star

Names "Y" Her Favorite

Ruby Keeler tries both powders in plain white boxes. She likes both, but prefers "Y"—the new MAVIS, mildly scented. Other lovely stars choose "X"—the original MAVIS, fully scented.

MAVIS flatters your skin like a glamorous face powder. Spreads evenly—clings for hours—leaves a bewitching fragrance that lasts! MAVIS safeguards summer daintiness and makes clothes slip on much more easily.

NEW! MILDLY SCENTED MAVIS

Created for the woman who prefers a subtly perfumed talcum. 33-hole needle-spray top showers body with light film of powder more effectively than old-fashioned powder puffs.

PURITY TEST: In a test with ten well known face powders, MAVIS talcum was found to be finer in texture and smoother on the skin, than seven out of ten face powders. Get your MAVIS today at your favorite store.

Carole Lombard and Clark Gable as interested as the day they met!

Ronald Colman's behind those glasses and Benita Hume's beside 'em!

Twin sisters? No. Constance Bennett, Mrs. Doug Fairbanks and polka dots out together.

Hollywood Art Note: The theatre trek snapped off some of the town's best-ies for awhile, at least, recently. Among those who took run-out powders from movies and bright shekels to get in some stage experience on B'way were Henry Fonda, Sylvia Sidney, Elissa Landi, Doris Nolan, Constance Cummings and Mr. and Mrs. Fredric March. Freddie has been threatening to go Arty on us for some time and took the summer lull on the Gold Coast as the occasion to do so. Meanwhile, Frances Farmer played stock in Mt. Kisco, N. Y., and Westport, Conn., while Mary Astor got in her heavy training closer home. Traveled a mere hundred miles per day to Santa Barbara—all to appear on a little theatre stage.

More About Trouble and Freddie Bartholomew: The studio's cancelled Freddie's role in the picture "Thoroughbreds Don't Cry," and plans to cast him in Kipling's "Kim" were also suspended recently. Aunt Cissy holds out for $2,500. or did at this writing. Reason? Out of his present salary for forty weeks a year, which as we said before, amounts to about $1,300., $1,000. a month goes for income taxes; ten per cent for agents' fees; $400. a month for his parents, and $800. a month for his maintenance.

Freddie isn't the first starlet to be nicked when splitting-up-time came 'round. It's an old Hollywood custom. Former child players like Mary Astor still smart over the fact that when they were too young to understand finances, their salaries were divided up too generously between others, while they were left holding empty pocketbooks. Only last year Shirley Temple's father was sued by an agent who claimed that back in 1932 a contract was drawn up whereby Shirley was to be trained by him and receive all of fifty dollars a week—when working! Although the contract has since been bought back by Shirley's father, he demanded all of her earnings over fifty per from that time forth.

After retirement, what then? is the newest guessing game being played by Hollywood stars. What with going in for babies and ranches, the town's not the spendthrift happy-go-lucky community of yore. Players nowadays are doing some heavy thinking about their futures after they're through with movies or the movies are through with them. All of them, of course, are buying annuities for old age. Some, like Clark Gable, expect to go in for farming in a big way... Lew Ayres wants to branch out as a director, Irene Dunne to become an honest-to-goodness housewife. And Groucho Marx, believe it or not, yearns for a career as an author!

Most Embarrassing Moment Note: Barbara Stanwyck was emerging from the preview of her latest picture, "Stella Dallas," disguised in an old hat pulled way down over her eyes. Officer Glenn Abney, mistaking her for an autograph hound, eyed her suspiciously, gripped her arm and started to bounce her from the lobby. Bob Taylor rushed to tearful Barbara's rescue, gripped the arm of the law and started to bounce him from the lobby. Other arms of the law rushed over and started to bounce each other from the lobby. When the fun was over, Robert, in high fury, wanted to sue Policeman Abney.

"Nothing doing," said his girl, Stanwyck. "I don't blame the officer, but I certainly wish something could be done for the autograph fans who get in the same predicament that I did."

Sam Goldwyn, who'd hired Abney and nine others to protect Barbara, commented tersely, "Well, he did what he was paid to do, anyhow."

Cinderella Story: Gloria Dickson, age twenty, came out of a tent show in the West, where she'd been collecting about one dollar and a quarter per week. She graduated to a part in "The Devil Passes," a WPA Federal Theatre project in Los Angeles. A talent scout from a studio saw her, and shortly afterwards, she graduated to a big role in the flicker, "They Won't Forget." Now WPA players are full of high hopes, not without reason. For Gloria's the first of their number to be singled out for moom pitchers. And we all know how Hollywood producers love to play follow the leader!

Flash: Janet Gaynor returned from a vacation in the Canadian Rockies bearing a wildcat skin. But the real news of the item is this: Miss G. positively admits that she didn't shoot the thing herself. She bought it with hard-earned cash.

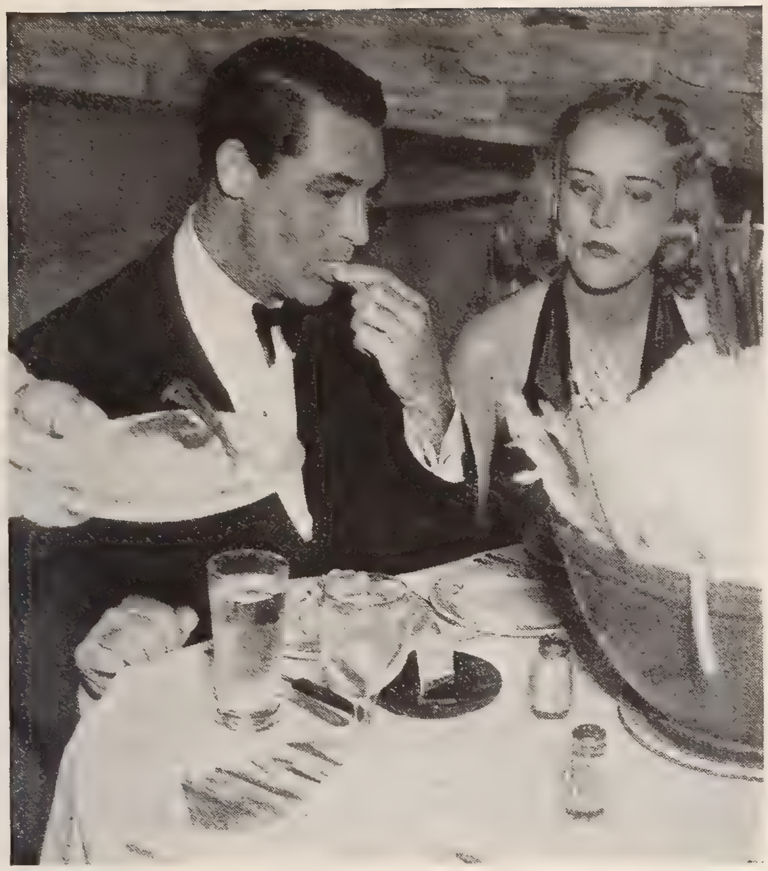
At the "Firefly" preview, Irene Hervey must have been reminded of the days when Bob Taylor was her escort, for the fans descended en masse on Allan Jones. It was really a swell tribute to a grand performance, for Mr. J. really killed the people in a role that will undoubtedly mean stardom for him. It was the sort of break an actor prays for.



If three dates a week means a romance, Cary Grant and Phyllis Brooks are certainly sentimental. Here they are at the Cafe La Maze.

The handsome lad with Anne Shirley is John Payne, hubby-to-be. They're previewing "It's Love I'm After." Why? They have it!

Good-bye Germs! —here comes Mennen Antiseptic Powder

"Boy, it tickles me when I see mummy comin' with my Mennen Antiseptic Powder. It chases germs away — because it's antiseptic. My doctor says it helps to keep my skin safe from infection—and he must be right, 'cause I've got the smoothest, healthiest skin you ever saw. Gee — I'm sorry for kids who just get ordinary baby powder. I wish I could tell every mother that the antiseptic kind of powder — the Mennen kind—keeps a baby's skin comfy, free from chafing, and that it fights off germs. Gosh, there ought to be a law!"

More doctors recommend Mennen Antiseptic Powder than all other baby powders combined—that's what a recent survey shows. Is any other powder good enough for your baby?

BILLIE BURKE APPLE PIE

- 6 greenings
- 2 teaspoons lemon juice
- 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind
- ¾ cup sugar
- ¾ teaspoon cinnamon
- 2 tablespoons butter
- 3 tablespoons boiling water
- ¼ cup chopped, blanched almonds
- ½ cup seedless raisins
- rich pastry for 1- or 2-crust pie

Peel and core apples. Slice thin into a bowl. Add lemon juice, grated rind and the sugar mixed with cinnamon. Melt butter in the boiling water and add to apple mixture. Add chopped almonds and raisins. Mix together thoroughly. Turn mixture into pie plate lined with uncooked pastry. Moisten edge of pastry with a little cold water, adjust top crust. Press firmly around edge with floured fingers to form a fluting, or press down with floured tines of fork. Cut slit in top crust to allow steam to escape. Bake in hot oven (450°F.) 10 minutes. Reduce heat to moderate (350°F.) and continue baking 25 to 30 minutes longer or until apples are tender.

FURTHER SUGGESTIONS: This may be made into a Deep Dish Pie by turning mixture into a deep baking dish, omitting the under crust, filling dish solidly with the apple mixture and adjusting top crust over the fruit. This will probably require an additional 10 minutes baking. By using a glass baking dish you can keep track of the baking more easily.

Brush top crust with unbeaten egg white before baking. After brushing crust with egg white, sprinkle with ¼ cup finely chopped blanched almonds, if desired. Or beat an egg yolk with 1 tablespoon cold water and brush entire top surface of pie with this mixture.

APPLE CORNFLAKES PUDDING

- 3 tart apples
- ½ cup granulated sugar
- ½ teaspoon cinnamon
- 1 tablespoon lemon juice
- ¼ cup flour
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- ½ cup brown sugar
- ¼ cup melted butter
- 1½ cups corn flakes

Pare and core apples. Cut in halves. Place in greased baking dish, cut side down. Combine granulated sugar and cinnamon, sprinkle over apples. Add lemon juice, cover tightly and bake in hot oven (425° F.) 15 minutes. Meanwhile combine flour, salt and brown sugar. Add melted butter. When thoroughly blended, work in cornflakes evenly. Sprinkle this mixture around and over cooked apples in baking dish. Return to oven and bake, uncovered, 20 minutes longer at moderate heat (375°F.). Serve hot or cold. The Lemon Sauce is also good with this, or it may be accompanied by slightly sweetened whipped cream.

MOLDED WALDORF SALAD

- 1 package lemon-flavored gelatin
- 1 pint hot water
- 1 tablespoon cider vinegar
- ½ teaspoon salt
- ¾ cup peeled and diced, tart apples
- ½ cup diced celery
- ¼ cup walnut halves
- 1 dozen pitted, pasteurized dates
- lettuce
- mayonnaise

Dissolve gelatin in hot water. Add vinegar and salt. Chill until slightly thickened. Fold in apples and celery. Turn into individual molds. Chill until firm. Unmold on crisp lettuce. Garnish with walnut halves and dates. (Stuffing the dates with softened cream cheese is a grand idea.) Garnish with mayonnaise or pass it separately.

APPLE TAPIOCA PUDDING

- 1 cup boiling water
- ½ cup sugar
- ⅛ teaspoon salt
- ¼ cup quick-cooking tapioca
- 2 egg yolks, slightly beaten
- 1 teaspoon butter
- 1 egg white, stiffly beaten
- 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind
- 1½ cups strained, unsweetened "pink" apple sauce
- 1 cup orange juice

Bring water to a brisk boil in the top part of a double boiler, over direct heat. Add sugar, salt and tapioca. Bring to a brisk boil again over direct heat, stirring constantly. Place immediately over rapidly boiling water and cook 5 minutes, stirring frequently. Add a small amount of tapioca mixture to egg yolk, combine slowly with mixture in double boiler, stirring vigorously. Cook 3 or 4 minutes longer, stirring constantly. Remove from heat, add butter. Fold a small amount of mixture into stiffly beaten egg white. Combine with remaining tapioca mixture. Cool slightly. Add grated rind, apple sauce and orange juice. Blend thoroughly. Chill. Serve with the following Lemon Sauce.

LEMON SAUCE

- 1 tablespoon cornstarch
- ½ cup sugar
- 1 cup boiling water
- 1 tablespoon butter
- 1½ tablespoons lemon juice
- 1 egg white, stiffly beaten

Combine cornstarch and sugar. Add boiling water very slowly, stirring constantly. Cook 15 minutes in top of double boiler, stirring constantly until smooth and thickened and then occasionally. Remove from heat. Add butter and lemon juice. Stir until blended. Add cornstarch mixture slowly to stiffly beaten egg white. Serve cold over Apple Tapioca. Serve hot with hot Apple Pie.

more about later. Just now I want to give you Miss Burke's suggestions for making "pink" Apple Sauce. According to her no other method of preparation can compare with it, for flavor as well as appearance

FIRST, you take large, firm apples, the kind with bright red skins. McIntoshes are splendid for this purpose, so ask for them by name. Scrub them well and remove both the stem and blossom ends, but do not bother coring or peeling. That's welcome news, isn't it? Now cut the apples into thin slices, skin and all. Place in saucepan and add just enough water to prevent burning. Not too much, mind you, probably a couple of tablespoons to begin with, because you can always add more water after you see how dry or juicy the apples really are. Add a slice of lemon or a little grated lemon rind for flavor and cook the apples gently until soft Now, after cooling them slightly, force through a sieve, which removes the cores, peels and seeds, but of course, not the pinkish color.

A regular purée sieve may be used or better still one of those easily operated "food mills" which do such a lot of work with so little effort. But let me urge you not to use a mesh strainer. It takes too long and there is always the danger of breaking some of the wires into the sauce.

Now add sugar and a dash of cinnamon or nutmeg. I can't tell you just how much sugar will be needed. Miss Burke refused to specify because apples vary so greatly in tartness, but I'll go so far as to suggest approximately one cup to one quart of raw apples. Stir until sugar has dissolved and, of course, chill until icy cold before serving, or before using for the Apple Tapioca recipe.

A crisp and crunchy Apple Cornflakes Pudding supplies a third dessert dish for you to try out. That, too, is both pictured and printed here in recipe form. Originally given to me by Edna May Oliver, this recipe should not be omitted from any collection of sweets, featuring Autumn's most popular fruit.

IN discussing apples, as we have been doing, it would be wrong to give the impression that they are strictly a dessert fruit. That, of course, is not the case. Slices of apples, for instance, with the core removed but the skin left on, can be sprinkled with sugar and fried in butter to make a marvelous meat dish accompaniment. Apples are also about the most inexpensive of all fruits for a fruit cup. Combined with canned grapefruit segments, sliced bananas, and white, seedless grapes, they make a splendid, quickly prepared first course that will look dressy without taxing the budget.

Let us not forget the salads which feature apples, notably the Waldorf Salad, which combines celery with the apples and is usually served with a garnish of pitted dates and walnut halves. I'm giving you a somewhat novel version of this perennial favorite, by the way, a Molded Waldorf Salad. This is quickly made and just the sort of thing to appeal to the girls of your bridge club or sewing circle.

I can't say that the foregoing covers the subject thoroughly, for, after all, apple ideas are too numerous to mention, and the story of apples goes far back into the very dim days of unrecorded history. Certainly, this fruit was one of the first known to man, appearing symbolically in the story of the Garden of Eden and pictorially on the walls of Egyptian and Assyrian tombs. But we'll have to content ourselves with enjoying the Hollywood-inspired apple dishes of today.

MOTHER MAKES GOOD WITH SEVEREST CRITIC

WELL, mother, you deserve his praise. You picked Franco-American because children and grown-ups too, love its delicious flavor. That zestful tomato purée sauce, smoothly blended with golden mellow cheddar cheese, makes a dish entirely different from ordinary ready-cooked spaghetti. Families that have once tasted Franco-American are never satisfied with anything else. And no wonder!

Franco-American Spaghetti is just packed with nourishment. It saves you hours of work, too—because it is all ready to heat and eat. And at its usual price of ten cents a can it costs less than 3¢ a portion. No wonder women buy more Franco-American every day.

Here's a delicious healthful luncheon your children will love. It's quick, easy, and economical:

POACHED EGGS IN SPAGHETTI NESTS

Dice and parboil one green pepper. Mix with 2 cans Franco-American Spaghetti and heat in saucepan. Poach four eggs. On each hot luncheon plate make a nest with a quarter of the spaghetti. Place egg in center, sprinkle with salt and pepper and garnish with parsley. Serves 4—costs 38¢. Good for Sunday night supper, too. Serve with mixed fresh vegetable salad; fresh berries or preserved fruit and cookies for dessert. But be sure it's

So You Won't Dance!

and, as he dies, gasps out his last orders to me. But me, I'm a heroine. I refuse to live without my husband. The Indians would have got me anyway, but I was too busy being noble to think of that. I creep 'round the table, fish for the knife in his back pocket, hold it over my chest for a minute like Juliet, then stick it through, and I'm dead. I was so terribly sorry for myself that when the curtain fell, I couldn't get up. They came in and picked me off the floor, sobbing. Someone who should have known better said, 'She's a real little actress.' That must have been when the poison took effect.

"But the funny part of it was that I took it all for granted. I never got excited over the idea of acting. I just knew that some day, when I was grown up, I'd probably be an actress. I didn't go 'round moaning about the theatre and wanting to emote, as a lot of youngsters do. I was more interested in playing. I still am," she announced serenely. "I haven't changed a bit. Then it was baseball and blindman's buff and hide-and-seek. Now," she pulled a solemn face, "it's tiddledewinks."

ANOTHER funny thing about Ginger's screen career is this. She was the toast of Broadway in the musical, "Girl Crazy." She was asked to make a test. While she was making it, Monte Bell, then a director, walked in and watched. They were using the same kind of material which had made her and her show the season's smash hit. Yet the test was not successful.

But Monte Bell saw something in her that hadn't registered on the screen. He asked her, "Have you read Katherine Brush's book, 'Young Man of Manhattan'?"

Ginger hadn't. "Well, there's a part in that I'd like to test you for. I still think you've got a screen personality."

Those who saw the picture will remember Ginger's finished performance of the flip little charmer, highlighted by her "Cigarette me, big boy," a phrase the current collegians picked up and made their own. The musical test was a flop, the dramatic test was a wow. Which proves nothing, except that you never can tell.

But when she came out to Hollywood on a three-picture contract, no one asked her to dance. Except for a step or two in one of the "Golddiggers" series, she played straight comedy roles. You've probably taken it for granted that she was cast in "Flying Down to Rio" because her reputation as a dancer had gone before her. But you're wrong.

"How would you feel about dancing in a picture with Astaire?" they inquired.

She'd known Astaire in New York well enough to have discussed with him the possibility of their doing a show together some day.

"I'd love it," she answered promptly. Then, as they still seemed dubious, she informed them gently, "I have danced on Broadway, you know."

Their faces brightened. "In what?"

"Well, pardon me," Ginger apologized, "but I was in a Gershwin show."

They were distinctly relieved. "And I was a little hurt, I must confess, that they didn't know about it. Now," she chuckled, "I get hurt because they know too much about it."

Only once did she take any active step toward realizing her dramatic ambitions. And that was done more in a spirit of banter than anything else. Pan Berman, casting "Mary of Scotland," was at his wits' end to find an Elizabeth. Ginger bumped into him on the lot one day.

"How about testing me?" she asked. "Because there's only me and Shirley Temple left. And you can't use Shirley."

Berman smiled, patted her shoulder like an uncle and went his way.

"I wasn't working," said Ginger, "I had nothing to do, and I thought I'd play. I'd gone to a costume party as Queen Elizabeth and had my picture taken, so as a joke I sent a copy over to his house, with a name I'd made up on the back."

A friend was having dinner with the Bermans and saw the picture.

"That's Ginger," he said.

"What are you talking about?" said Berman. "Ginger who?"

"Ginger Rogers. I took her to a party when she had that outfit on."

"Aha," said Berman, "I smell a mouse."

Mrs. Berman was in on the gag. They waited for the producer to make some sign, but Berman was having fun in his own way. "He knows it's you," his wife wailed to Ginger over the phone, "and he won't even tell me he knows it. He won't open his mouth."

Ginger went to John Ford, the director. "I want to play this joke on Pan. Do you think you could test me for Elizabeth?"

He considered her for a moment. "Seriously, do you think you could play the part?"

"Why not?" she said, and they put their heads together.

Next day, in a state of some excitement, Ford approached Berman. "Lady Ansley's here."

"Who's Lady Ansley?"

Ford looked pained. "Mean to tell me you don't know the great English actress, Lady Ansley?"

"Never heard of her."

"That's hard to believe, Pan. She's one of the best."

"Know her well?"

"I visit at her home whenever I'm in London."

"Well, I don't know how I missed hearing about her, but if you say it's so, it's so. What about her?"

"She's just passing through on her way to China to join her husband, stopping with Mary Pickford. You know, she played Elizabeth on the stage in London."

Berman bit. "Why didn't you get in touch with her, and ask her to make a test?"

"That's what I wanted you to say, Pan. I've always thought an Englishwoman should play the part."

"Let me know when you make the appointment, and I'll be there."

But Ford dissuaded him. The lady might be flustered by his presence. Besides, he'd be able to get the effect better if he waited to see the test run off.

TWO DAYS later a brown-haired woman walked onto Stage 8, where the tests were being made, and was introduced as Lady Ansley. There were present a number of people who knew Ginger Rogers well. Not one recognized her. Yet she had used no startling make-up—a brown wig, some shadowing of the eyes, a thin mouth line. One man stared and whispered to his neighbor, "She reminds me of someone. I can't think who." That was all.

Katharine Hepburn, who was in on the hoax and enjoying it to the hilt, helped matters along by her breezy chat with the stranger, pitched loud enough for all to hear. "Oh, Lady Ansley, I understand your husband's been shooting lions and tigers in Asia. I've heard such nice things about you from my friends in England, Lady Ansley."

She played a scene with Hepburn. A writer, who has spoken with Ginger a hundred times, was on the set. He's the cool and critical kind, repressing enthusiasm as a matter of principle. But when the scene was finished, he hurried over to the director in a glow of enthusiasm. "There's your Elizabeth—she has everything, poise, style, queenliness—and a fine actress." A girl who has been an intimate of Ginger's for years squealed in admiration. "I've never known it to fail. It takes a Britisher every time to play a Britisher."

"When she learned the awful truth," said Ginger with a guilty look, "she wouldn't speak to me for weeks."

Next day they ran the test off for Mr. Berman. Ginger, of course, was not in evidence. "I don't know yet how I kept away from the audience. I was in agony. It was like playing Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

Berman was impressed. He told Ford to follow through with a more extensive test. The first had been made without sound.

Ford shook his head. "I don't know. The lady's pretty cagey. I've had a talk with her. She wants $3000. a week if she does the part, a four-week guarantee and equal billing with Hepburn."

"How about a couple of studios thrown in? Can't you talk turkey to her?"

"I've done all I could. Maybe you could do something with her agent."

Berman phoned the agent—Ginger's agent who'd been primed in advance. He was very sorry. Those were the terms Lady Ansley insisted on. She wasn't too anxious to stay in Hollywood, you know. She wanted to join her husband in China.

The terms were left in abeyance, pending another test. In a stolen meeting with Ginger, Ford told her what had happened. The second test was set for Monday.

HOW the secret leaked out, nobody knows to this day. Hollywood seethes with snoopers, Ginger is news, and one of the few who were in on it must have whispered. On Friday some Hollywood Winchell broke the story. "Why is Ginger Rogers being so coy? She wants to play Queen Elizabeth, and is posing as a member of the British aristocracy to fool her producer."

Ginger could have wept. Not so much because the fat was in the fire, as because a good rib had been spoiled. "That story made the whole thing sound so sick, dull, unfunny and altogether stupid on my part. It was supposed to be comely, and they turned it into heavy drama. I went straight to Pan who had seen it, of course, and the way he took it made me feel better.

"He was grinning all over his nice face. When he saw mine, he started comforting me. 'What do you care?' he said. 'You set out to fool me, and you fooled me better than I've ever been fooled before.' Which was fun," admitted Ginger, "and that was all I ever intended it to be."

The question may arise in your mind, as it did in mine: fun or no fun, she did fool not only Berman but a score of others.

As Lady Ansley, an unknown, her performance of an exacting scene stirred the enthusiasm of a hardheaded group of people, whose business is the movies. Why then wasn't she seriously considered for the role? Granted she had the ability, what kept Ginger Rogers from playing Queen Elizabeth?

The answer lies with you, her movie audiences. What would you have said? Would you have said, "Go to it, Ginger, and more power to you." Or would you have frowned? "What's our Ginger got to do with Elizabeth? We want Rogers and Astaire." There was no way of finding out save by going through with it. And the change would have been too drastic, the gamble too great.

So they're experimenting more gradually. They've put her into "Stage Door" with Katharine Hepburn, where she plays what she calls "a bouncing, crazy girl—the kind of girl I played in '42nd Street,' but with a little more heart interest." Then comes "Vivacious Lady," the picture interrupted by Jimmy Stewart's illness, and here she will have a different type of role—a straight lead with some comedy and, for the first time, a chance at emotional acting.

That's what Ginger wants to do. Will you let her do it? You've taken her to your hearts as a lighthearted, lightfooted dancer. Will you have the vision to see in that blithe figure what others saw in Lady Ansley? Or will she have to do her acting in her own backyard with the chickens and ducks for audience? It's up to you. Ginger can only cross her fingers and hope.

Jean Arthur When—

really write it!'

"She acted as if it were the most extraordinary thing in the world for anyone to be able to write to order."

SHE WAS always surprised and pleased over things that most actresses would take as a matter of course—her first outfit from Hattie Carnegie, the view from her room in a hotel, the fact that someone actually recognized her. Until autograph fans taught her differently, Jean had an idea that when she appeared in person, she was in the deepest disguise.

She was always surprised when someone told her that he had liked some picture or play in which she had appeared. When a friend wrote that a picture she had made after her return to Hollywood was going to be shown in Radio City Music Hall, the largest theatre in New York, Jean made a gesture of disbelief. She couldn't get it into her head that after all these years, she was really a success.

One day Jean, and Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe attended a preview of a film in which she was appearing. Jean sat there looking as solemn as an owl, while Mr. and Mrs. Jaffe roared with laughter. Finally, she looked at them in surprise. "Why, the picture must be funny," she said, "from the way you two are laughing."

It seems almost incredible that this is the same Jean Arthur who has antagonized grips, electricians, office boys and studio executives alike; that this is the same person who is reported to be eternally complaining about her roles in pictures.

Why should New York remember such a different side of Jean Arthur? Is it because sudden fame turned her head? Or is it because she distrusts and dislikes Hollywood?

Before you pass judgment, it is only fair to look at the records. When she went to Hollywood in 1923, Jean was a gentle, trusting, hyper-sensitive young person. She was sent to the Coast, not because she could act, but because she was one of the prettiest models in New York.

In spite of her prettiness, she was a rather negative personality. Many people met her one day and forgot her the next. Few of the photographers for whom she posed remembered her at all, and when I finally found one who did, Alfred Cheney Johnston, he recalled her only vaguely as a sweet, good-looking girl. "That's all I know about her," he told me. "Now if you were to ask me about Norma Shearer, who also posed for me, that would be different. There was an outstanding personality. I could tell you a great deal about her."

Instead of training Jean Arthur gradually for pictures, her studio cast her at once in the lead of an important dramatic film, "The Temple of Venus." Because she was inexperienced, Jean was elated, and did not realize what a responsibility had been placed upon her until the company started making scenes on Santa Cruz Island.

Conscientiously, Jean had studied her lines, and it pleased her to think how delighted the director would be when he found her letter-perfect.

But he was anything but delighted. Though she knew every line, Jean didn't know how to put those lines across.

The director gave Jean her instructions again and again. Repeatedly, she tried to follow them. But because she had nothing of her own to give to the role, because she knew nothing of the art of acting and was only trying to follow instructions slavishly, the things she said sounded hollow.

Finally, the director lost patience. "It's no use," he told her. "You're not ready yet. We'll have to get somebody else. I'll send for Mary Philbin, and you can go back to the studio tomorrow."

BUT JEAN couldn't bear the thought of meeting the actress who was to have her part. All she knew was that she wanted to leave the island, to put her ugly failure far behind her. When she learned that the only boat on which she could leave that day was a fishing smack, piled high with fish, she didn't hesitate, but left on board.

Because they had lost faith in her potential abilities, the studio shoved her into ridiculous roles, as leading lady to slapstick comedians, to cowboys in Westerns, and once, for a whole year, she played opposite three monkeys who made pictures for Fox.

At the expiration of her contract, Jean started to free-lance, making pictures on Poverty Row. For a time it looked as if her career might end there, until Paramount, believing she had talent, signed her up. There the same story of frustration and failure was repeated. Again and again, she was cast in unimportant roles.

It was during this period of her career that she met Julian Ancker. Depressed, discouraged about the turn her career was taking, she was in no fit state of mind to distinguish between real and counterfeit love. She and Julian were married in 1927, and the marriage was dissolved two years later.

Newspapers said she had given him up because her contract forbade marriage. She branded the stories ridiculous. "The studio had nothing to do with the annulment," she told a reporter. "I'd marry a man I loved this second, and count my career well lost. But I made a mistake and realized it. I thought it best to correct it before it muddied my mind with bitterness."

In Hollywood the breaks continued to go against Jean Arthur. The magnificent roles she was promised never materialized. One day she said bitterly to an interviewer, "Oh, I'm hard-boiled now. I don't expect anything. It took me a long time to get over hoping and believing people's promises. Everyone is such a good promiser in this business."

Jean stuck it out for eight years. But it wasn't until she went back to New York and made a success on the stage that Hollywood accepted her as a star.

When Hollywood did an about-face and began to treat her with kid gloves, it was too late. The girl who returned and made a sensational success wasn't the same girl who had come there originally. Some of the bitterness and humiliation Hollywood had thrust upon her remains in her heart to this day.

Jean once said, during those early days when she was trying to get a break, "Anybody who sticks it out in Hollywood for four years or more is bound to change in self-defense."

However, there are many ways in which Jean hasn't changed at all. There is one trait that endears her to those who know her well. When Jean is with friends, it is always tacitly understood that the conversation will be about her friends.

When people try to ask questions, she gets red and changes the subject. She is more uncommunicative than Garbo, and this is not something new that has grown upon her with success, but something that has been true of her all her life.

An agent, who appeared in what he believes was Jean Arthur's first picture, an independent film made in Syracuse, New York, told me, "She was a very unassuming person. She never spoke much and weighed everything she said. She never confided in any of the other members of the company. I always had the idea she came from a small town, because there seemed to be a sort of small-town wholesomeness about her." Actually she was born in New York.

WHEN she and Frank Ross, Jr., decided to marry, she was appearing in "The Man Who Reclaimed His Head." They told no one of their plans, and the producer of the play, L. Lawrence Weber, knew nothing of it till the day he read about it in the newspapers.

Hollywood, today, marvels at the shrewdness with which Jean Arthur handles her affairs and is skeptical as to whether she is the real power behind the throne or whether it's really her husband who decides everything. Though she turns constantly to her husband for advice, she makes the final decisions. This has always been so.

In "The Curtain Rises" Jean Arthur played a dowdy spinster, who fell in love with an actor and hired him to teach her how to act. As in most Cinderella stories, before the play ended, the spinster was transformed into a beautiful woman.

One day everyone in the cast was going out to be photographed for publicity pictures. Jean said, "I'll be glad to take any photographs you want me to, except in the costume I wear in the first act. Whatever happens, I will not allow myself to be photographed in that make-up."

"Why?" Mr. Kaye asked.

Jean's eyes flashed. "I intend to go back to movies some day," she said. "How do you think I'd feel if someone were to publish that as a photograph of me? Some producer might say to himself, 'So that's what Jean Arthur really looks like. I had no idea she was such a frump.' I don't want any pictures of me floating around that would have to be explained."

Jean is always afraid of meeting people, and if there are three new people in a room, she will find someone she knows and dash into a corner with her. She dislikes parties, goes to them rarely, and leaves as early as possible. That is not new with Jean either. When she was appearing in "The Bride of Torozko," the play was tried out in Westport, Connecticut, and several parties were given for the cast. Almost invariably, Jean sent her regrets. On the occasions she did attend, she stayed just about ten minutes.

"The only time," Mr. Jaffe told me, "Jean ever stays up late is when someone is having a musical evening. She is crazy about good music. She has a whole collection of the 'Porgy and Bess' records and will play them over for hours."

Perhaps some day Jean Arthur will get over the childish resentment she cherishes against Hollywood. And when that day comes the conflict in the girl's character will be resolved, and she'll be the Jean Arthur New York knew and loved.

the shouting about? A star reborn, tish, tosh. Janet just used that shrewd little brain of hers again.

Nearly two years before Frank Borzage saw in her the perfect Diane for "Seventh Heaven," she had told a reporter, and it had been printed, that some day she wanted to play "a worried little slavey, tormented and harassed, dirty, disheveled and downright ugly." Maybe she didn't know then about "Seventh Heaven," or maybe she did, but anyway she was shooting at the mark. When she hit it, she was overnight turned into a star of first magnitude. Now that's figuring things out in advance.

It is interesting to remark in this connection that when signed for the role of Diane, Janet was an unknown actress. She was a little middlewestern girl, totally different in ancestry, looks, background from the French waif of the Austin Strong drama. Yet, she did a whale of a job as that waif. The highly touted French flash, Simone Simon, who recently did the 1937 version of "Seventh Heaven," is of Gallic origin and should have been a perfect choice. Yet, compare the two performances!

TO go on with Janet's career. Although Frank Borzage had chosen her personally and taken a chance that she could come through with a performance, although he had poured all the directorial genius he could muster into making her do a fine job, it wasn't long before she decided to change directors. She heard people saying that, without Borzage, Gaynor would be nothing. So she went to Sheehan and told him she wished to make no more Borzage pictures. The studio was shocked. Borzage was hurt. But Janet set her foot down and won her point.

Later, she disagreed with Fox about her stories. This was in the days before sit-down strikes, but Janet staged her own run-away-to-Honolulu strike. She stayed away too, until she won. When she came home, the studio was so pleased, they gave a party for her.

Always this little girl with the large brown eyes and appealing ways has known exactly what she wanted. Talk to her a few minutes, and you'll see what I mean. I did.

Interviews always vary in color and shading according to the personality. A Pola Negri may stamp her Russian boots and alternate between bursts of temper and extravagant politeness; Bette Davis will toss wisecracks about the Brothers Warner over the studio commissary table; Norma Shearer will receive you with gracious dignity in her Santa Monica drawing-room; Hepburn flatly bars you from the set; but Janet—ah, now . . .

I went to see her at her house, not far down the hill from the Trocadero. There wasn't a sign of life as I drove into the grounds. I rang the doorbell. No answer. Then suddenly from an upstairs window came a clear, high treble, "Hoo, hoo, is that you? I'll be down in a minute."

Came the sound of little feet pattering down the stairs, and the door was opened by a girlish, flushed, almost breathless Gaynor dressed in white flannel pajamas. Janet is definitely an organdy and blue girl; the effect was as strange as if I were seeing Mary Pickford in tailored pants.

Her mother was away, the servants were away, and she led me into a big, dark living-room where she curled up in a chair and looked shy and frightened and anxious to please.

She was scared. She said so. She never knew what to say about herself. What would I suggest? So we began with that taboo subject of age.

"How old am I? Well, officially, I am twenty-nine." (Mind you, she didn't have to put that word "official" in. But she did.)

Did she think she was too old to play any more ingenue roles? Had she changed deliberately into more mature characterizations? Had her sweet heroine cycle passed?

"Well," she said choosing her words carefully, "you can't go on acting the part of a little girl all your life. It is true that the studios can do a great deal about making you look utterly youthful with lights and make-up and costumes, and there really isn't any necessity for a woman to look old on the screen, but—

"As you gain in years, you change mentally. Or at least, you should if you have anything inside your head. You must learn from life as you go along, and some of this shows in your face, in the expression of your eyes. This is a mental change, but people who know you and watch you can't help but feel it. Yes, I must do things of more mature value.

I DON'T think anyone can change an established screen personality overnight. You can't rush into something new and expect, boom! to be a new person. It isn't done that way. To be successful, you have to plan carefully.

"People may not have realized this, but I have been working at a change for a number of years. Look back at some of my pictures. Remember 'State Fair'? Then there was 'Small Town Girl' and 'Ladies in Love,' and in pictures before that I tried to make subtle changes.

"I didn't want to re-do 'Seventh Heaven.' I don't think, and I didn't think, anyone can ever repeat successfully. That film belonged to another stage of my career."

Why, for all these years, has the legend of "unsophisticated little Janet" been built up about her personal life? Is it true that when she wanted to smoke a cigarette she locked herself in her dressing-room so that nobody—not even a studio employee—saw her smoking? Is it true that the studio deliberately built her publicity so that parents held her up as a model for their daughters?

Janet laughed. "That's not all quite true. I really didn't ever smoke. I didn't like it. I only learned when my friends said I was a sissy. But it is true that that fact was not supposed to be known to the fans, although I never sneaked around corners to get a puff of a cigarette. The idea was, in publicity, that I personified a good, unsophisticated girl. Fans had certain illusion about me, and it was thought best for the box office to maintain those illusions.

"You know how people love to talk about motion picture stars. Well, the general idea was that we didn't want them saying, 'Oh that Janet Gaynor! Always playing those goody roles! Why, I know somebody that knows her who says she smokes like a furnace. Think of it, my dear!'"

How about marriage? How about all those rumored romances? Has she somebody in mind?

"No, not now," she replied. "Oh, you know how it is. There will probably always be some man that I'll like and see and go out with and perhaps fancy, but I don't seem to like them terribly well or for terribly long at a time any more.

"I'll marry again, if I fall in love. I'd like to be in love. I'd like to be married, but—" and she grew thoughtful for a moment.

"Romance and happiness are not easy things for a girl in my position to find. That sounds ridiculous, doesn't it? Because I'm a movie star and have money, everything should be easy. But I've had more success and earned more money than the average man of intelligence and charm.

"The men I like are frightened away by my money and my career. I don't meet them. Certainly, there are fortune hunters—at least, I suppose there are. I haven't met many of those. And there are actors and studio executives, but they're Hollywood.

"I think the nicest romance of all is the Cinderella one. The little girl who wins riches and a handsome husband to love her. That's impossible for me. I can't be Cinderella any more."

Honestly, I felt sorry for her. Janet who has played Cinderella so many times, earnestly yearning to be Cinderella in real life and prevented from being it by the fruits of her own shrewd little brain.

It was, it is said, her career which played the major role in wrecking her marriage to Lydell Peck, tall, blond, young lawyer, who forsook a growing law business in Oakland to live in Hollywood near Janet's work. Lydell tried to establish himself as a writer in the studios, but it didn't work out. He became known as Mr. Gaynor, just as Fredric March was known as Mr. Lester in "A Star is Born."

When finally "unhappy ending" was written after her romance with this boy who had originally worshipped the ground she walked on, it was revealed in the divorce complaint that he had come to hate her work. She charged that he was suspicious of her, was jealous and gloated over her unfavorable fan mail. Janet has never married again.

We were still talking about Hollywood and its various ramifications when the doorbell pealed. It was nice, quiet, shy Phil Scheuer, of the Times, bent on an errand similar to mine. Janet has only known Phil as long as she has me, which is ten years, but—

"Please stay," she implored, helpless little girl again. "I'm frightened. I never know what to say. Help me talk to him."

No, I left 'em. I figured she'd do all right. She always has in matters of business.

They're Goin' Places

pressionable, this sudden success proved too much for him. Being a little frightened by it all, Bob assumed an arrogant pose for protection, probably. And so, the studio decided to pay this youngster off and send him back where he came from.

Back in New York, Allen again turned to modeling and working in stock groups for experience with a view to returning to California. As time wore on he began to give up the idea, and with his wife started to build a little house in Darien. Bob was making good money posing and the house came along fine. In fact, no sooner was it finished than a friend came out for dinner. Now this friend, if you haven't already guessed, was a producer from Hollywood. During the course of the evening Bob told about his dreams to act and about how he fell down when he had the opportunity.

However, much to Bob's surprise, the producer gave him another chance at celluloid and sound tracks. This trip he would profit by his earlier mistakes and, with this in mind, he went back to Hollywood. He was immediately put into top-notch pictures, playing opposite Grace Moore in a very short time. Now Bob is doing leading roles in Western and it won't be long before you'll be clamoring for him.

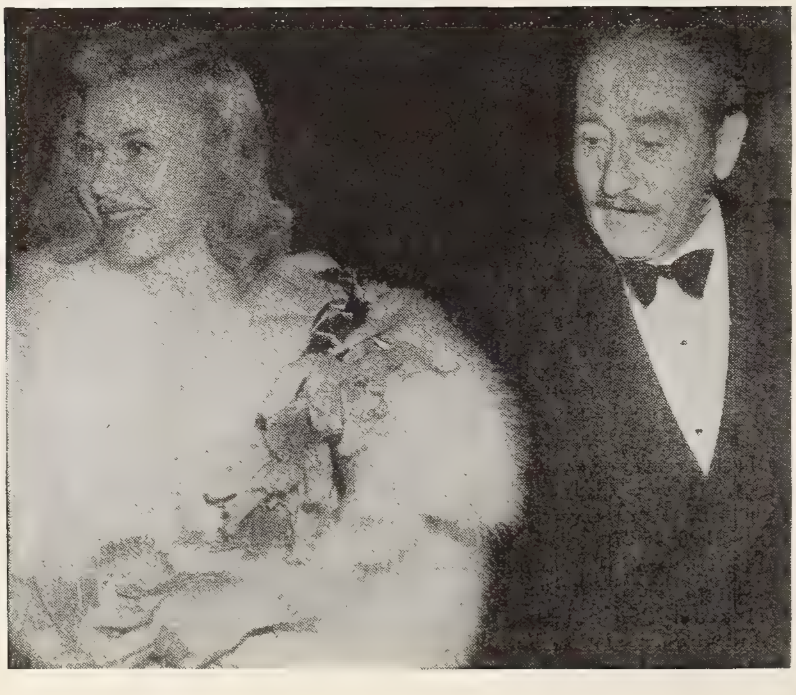
Robert Baldwin is another one of the newcomers who is destined to become tomorrow's favorite. Baldwin was what is known as an up-and-comer in the modeling profession, a hard worker. When he wasn't busy before the cameras, he was making the rounds of the agents on Broadway. As a result he did any number of small jobs in second companies.

Each time he was in a play he would call the movie companies and ask them to "cover" his performance, hoping for a chance to get a break. Luck finally came his way and while playing in a company of "Sailor Beware," he was picked up by those ever-present gents, the talent scouts.

Baldwin has been doing supporting parts in several pictures and has recently played the lead in Karen Morley's picture, "Scotland Yard." It seems great plans are being made for him and early stardom seems destined to be his lot.

Maybe you don't think it too admirable for these young men to use their good looks to get an acting chance, but as Robert Taylor said, when asked if he expected to get by on his looks forever, "Well I can only hope that my luck holds out until I learn to act."

Like Taylor these young men hope their looks—and luck—will hold out until they can learn to act and be of value to the industry. Anyway, they're going places.



Ginger Rogers and Adolphe Menjou snapped at the Screen Writers' Ball. It was a gala occasion and Miss R. was up to it—what with orchids 'n' all.

At twenty-three, Wayne Morris has made a big dent in Hollywood and all points north, east, south and west. His fight scene in "Kid Galahad" was the best ever staged in the movies, say they who know. His next flicker is "Submarine D-1."

Public Cowboy No. 1

the popular cowboy stars have been stars for fifteen years—some of them even longer than that."

He may never reach the Metropolitan, but it is apparent that Gene can't make pictures fast enough to suit his audiences throughout the country. He recently signed a new contract, which put his salary up in the high brackets. More money will be spent on his eight pictures a year; more money paid writers for his stories, for the songs he sings in them and on production.

THREE YEARS ago, before Hollywood became radio conscious, Gene was the star of two big programs broadcast from Chicago. One was a barn dance, sent out over the national network every week; the other program was called "The Roundup Club" and was broadcast for children every morning.

"My, I had fun with that," he will tell you. "I had different kids come up to the station and sing and talk on the program. I told stories and played my guitar and sang."

It was this program that taught him what sort of entertainment children like, but it was his barn dance that got him an offer to incorporate it in a Ken Maynard picture, "In Old Santa Fe." This one appearance was enough to tell a smart

A short, but frequent, story . . . "Lysol" disinfectant made the ending happy.

JUDY and Bill grew up together . . . were childhood sweethearts. Everybody said, "They'll be happy".

But . . . in less than a year of married life, Judy said Bill was cruel, indifferent. Bill said, "We both made a mistake". . . . But old Doc Davis, who'd brought them both into the world, discovered the real story. And "Lysol" disinfectant helped make the ending happy.

The tragic thing about it is, a woman seldom knows she's guilty of neglecting herself. Fortunately, any woman can (and millions of women do) know how not to offend. They know that "Lysol" disinfectant provides a wholesome cleansing method of feminine hygiene. They know these six qualities of "Lysol" which make it so valuable:

THE 6 SPECIAL FEATURES OF "LYSOL"

1. NON-CAUSTIC . . . "Lysol" in the proper dilution, is gentle and efficient. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.
2. EFFECTIVENESS . . . "Lysol" is a true germicide, active under practical conditions . . . in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.).
3. PENETRATION..."Lysol" solutions spread because of low surface tension, and thus virtually search out germs.
4. ECONOMY..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.
5. ODOR . . . The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears after use.
6. STABILITY . . . "Lysol" keeps its full strength no matter how long it is kept, no matter how often it is uncorked.

producer that here was something new for pictures—a singing cowboy—and he was given a contract to star in his own pictures for Republic. Between pictures he is in demand for personal appearances.

A story couldn't be written about Gene Autry without including Champion, his horse. Champion accompanies him on trips and appears in all Gene's pictures, as well as on the stage with him.

When Gene starts out on one of these jaunts, his train resembles a caravan. Gene, driving his own car and carrying two boys who work in his act, goes ahead. Behind him is the car with the boys who look after the scenery and other details.

Next comes Champion in his elegant travelling stable, which is the last word in trailers. Champion rides in solitary grandeur, along with his $1500. worth of saddle and bridle—hand-tooled and virtually covered with silver mountings—in his private car. It is electrically heated, has a built-in water trough and feed bin and a cork floor, because so much riding might make his feet sore.

Following the trailer is the truck, loaded with the necessary scenery and props.

Gene always arrives far in advance of his caravan because he drives like a demon and thinks it a waste of time for a cowboy to sleep more than three hours a night.

"In Milwaukee recently, the girls who were on the same bill with me were crazy about Champion," he told me proudly. "They were nicer to him than they were to me. Yes, sir, they sure were nice to that old horse. They would kiss him and leave lipstick all over that white strip down his face."

He told of one night when there was panic backstage for a few minutes when Champion was missing. He had been in his stall quietly munching a carrot and a moment later he had vanished.

"And we found that vain old horse in the wings watching himself act on the screen," Gene laughed.

"What's the matter with Champion's tail?" Gene asked the boy who takes care of him. "It's getting shorter every day."

"I should think it would," the boy replied. "Yours would, too. The kids pull the hairs out of his tail for souvenirs."

After each trip Champion's trailer must be turned in for a paint job. "It's so covered with the kids' autographs by the time we finish a trip that you can't tell what the original color was," Gene explained.

"Lord," he exclaimed. "I'm so busy on these trips that I don't get time to breathe. People are awfully nice. They invite me to dinner and to their homes when I could really use a little sleep. On this last trip I was invited to one dinner that I thought would never end, there was so much good food. I could hardly move after dinner, and when I got back to the theatre and climbed up on Champion—I always ride him onto the stage for the act—he gave me the dirtiest look. I must have gained twenty pounds."

IN SEVERAL middlewest communities there are organizations of young boys who own their own horses and call themselves the "Mounted Patrol." Recently they were granted permission to call themselves "The Gene Autry Mounted Patrol."

Gene is not unmindful of the fact that to the youngsters he is a hero, and there are never any scenes in his pictures that parents wouldn't want their children to see.

"There's one thing about making pictures for youngsters," he said. "If they like you, they will remember you and continue to see your pictures after they have grown up. We try to keep adults as well as children in mind when we make our pictures."

Gene doesn't drink or smoke on or off the screen, unless you call taking a glass of beer occasionally "drinking." He refused $3000. recently to endorse a certain cigarette.

"Anyway, how could I endorse a cigarette when I don't smoke them?" he asked, innocently.

Gene worries about his stories and about the songs he sings in them. He writes many of the songs himself. On his desk were several song manuscripts sent in by amateur composers.

"We buy originals sometimes," he told me. "We have two new ones that we bought from a couple of convicts that I think are going to be knockouts. You never can tell about a song, however, but if a cowboy song does make a hit, it lasts longer than the ordinary song."

This is true of "That Silver-haired Daddy of Mine," a song that Gene wrote years ago. He had sung it over the radio, on all his stage appearances and had made phonograph records of it, when a music publisher wanted to publish it because he had so many calls for it.

"But I haven't any music for it," Gene told him. "I just made it up. I've always intended to put it down on paper, but haven't had time."

"Well, take time," the publisher replied. Gene did, and is still receiving royalties from its sale.

Gene's startling appearance doesn't cause a ripple as he strides down a street here, but outside of Hollywood he is looked upon as something quite out of the ordinary. He says he doesn't feel right in anything but cowboy clothes.

"I don't own a suit, really," he declared. "I like to wear flashy clothes. There's a certain amount of advertising value in wearing them, and they are not only more comfortable but wear longer than ordinary clothes. I've worn this jacket for three years. My hats cost fifty dollars but they last forever, and although my boots cost fifty dollars a pair, I wear them about three years.

"I don't like shoes; they make my feet sore. These boots are made to fit me. See," and he pointed to a detail on one boot, "the arch is built right in the boot. They're comfortable.

"My wife thought I ought to have a pair of white shoes so I bought some, but they got lost in Chicago. She thinks I gave them away, but I don't remember," he said with a grin. "I had a tuxedo once, too, but I gave that to a fellow who really needed it. I have no use for such clothes. I don't like to go to social affairs."

Gene admits that his idea of a big night is to go to a picture show with Mrs. Autry, Smiley Burnette, the comedian in his pictures, and Mrs. Burnette. On the way home they sometimes stop at the corner drug-store for a few cans of beer; Mrs. Autry makes sandwiches and by eleven o'clock the lights are out.

THE AUTRYS live in a big house atop a Hollywood hill. The house must be large, for Gene has a family. Two younger sisters and a brother followed him to Hollywood, and Gene reckons they are his responsibility. Dudley, his 17-year-old brother, refuses to attend school as Gene, who had no opportunity to get a higher education, wants him to. He takes care of Champion. His sisters live with him when they are in town, but at present are seeking their own paths to glory by singing with a rival cowboy act on tour.

Like all cowboys, Gene has a fine collection of saddles. "My wife draws the line at having them in the house," he laughed. His only visible tribute to Texas is a pair of six-foot steer horns, which adorn the wall in his office. He laughed when it was suggested that he should wear them on his car.

"I couldn't keep anything like that on my car," he laughed. "I can't have any identifying mark on it, in order to keep the kids off it. It's bad enough for them to write all over the trailer."

Gene makes friends wherever he goes and never forgets a friend. He refuses to make a picture that doesn't have a part for his pal, Smiley Burnette. He has a memory like an elephant and never forgets a person who treats another unfairly. Recently his secretary was startled when he dictated a sharp letter.

"He never loses his temper," she said with a horrified look, "but a man who had mistreated him over a period of years wrote and asked a favor."

"Now I feel free to tell you just exactly what I think of you," Gene wrote, and then proceeded to tell him.

"You know, I'd like to travel in a trailer myself—a nice one like Champion's—but it doesn't seem right not to stay at the hotels in the towns where I appear."

He is accustomed to having the key to the city presented to him upon his arrival in a town, but when he reached Corsicana, Texas, recently and was given the key, as usual, he was also invited to ride his horse into the hotel. Into the lobby they went and then he was told that the room adjoining his had been stripped of furniture and was to be occupied by Champion.

"It's only in Texas that they'd do a thing like that," he said, singing the praises of his home state. "And that's what I call 'southern hospitality'."

view, when he was surrounded by admiring fans, and a youngster held out a piece of paper to be autographed, Wayne blushed, grinned, stuffed the paper hastily in his coat pocket and said, "Thank you!"

"But my mother was even more nervous than I was. The next day someone called her on the telephone, and when she picked up the receiver to answer she began to dial a number."

He thinks his family's swell. "Why not?" he asks. "They've backed me every step of the way. They gave me all the rope I wanted when I was floundering around trying to decide what I was cut out to do. And after I signed my contract, and it looked as though I would be here for awhile, they packed up and moved over here so I could live at home and be near my work."

So the Morrises now live on one of the highest hills between Hollywood and Burbank in a big, rambling stucco house with plenty of room for Wayne and his younger brother and their various high-jinks.

"One of the grandmothers lives with us, too," he added. "It's swell, having a grandmother in the house."

His full name is Bert deWayne Morris. At home he is called Bert, and there is no need of confusion when a feminine voice calls on the telephone and asks for Wayne. And with his younger brother ever ready to cut in if given an opportunity! But one can hardly imagine that even losing his best girl to his brother, would make Wayne lose his temper.

RECENTLY I was in the publicity offices of his studio when he breezed in, fairly bursting with plans, and called out, "Well, goodbye, boys and girls. I'm off to Ensenada."

"What do you mean, Ensenada?" growled one of the boys.

"I'm going fishing. I don't have to be on location at Coronado for three days, so a bunch of us are going on down to Mexico for some swimming and fishing."

"But you can't," the publicity man retorted. "You have to be here all day tomorrow for pictures.'

You could have heard a pin drop. The smile faded from Wayne's face. But no tantrums followed.

"All right," he said quietly. And that in spite of the fact he hadn't had a vacation since he signed his contract more than a year before. Within five minutes his smile was back again. No wonder the public's that way about him.

His career has been carefully built. He was well prepared for his role in "Kid Galahad," although you probably can't recall his one close-up in "China Clipper," his one line in "Polo Joe," a slightly more important bit in "Here Comes Carter." Perhaps you didn't notice that he played the second lead in "The Land Beyond the Law," with Dick Foran. Next he played the leading role in a picture entitled, "Don't Pull Your Punches." He had a year's experience around the studio before he was given the role of the Kid.

Before he signed his picture contract he read the story of "Kid Galahad" in a national magazine and thought at the time that he would like to play the young prize fighter if the story was ever filmed. After he had started to work at the studio he learned his bosses had bought the story. He asked questions about it, millions of 'em. He followed its every move from scenario department to production office.

"I found out that Seton I. Miller was writing the adaptation for the story, so I went to him and asked him if he thought I would be good in the part. He said he thought I would.

"A few months later I learned that Mr. Bishoff was going to produce it, so I went to him and asked him if he thought I would be good in it. He said he thought I would.

"Later I learned that Michael Curtiz was going to direct it. I went through the same routine with him. He said he'd like to have me play it, so I went to the casting director. Yep, I asked everybody. Gee, how I wanted to play that part.

"When Mike Curtiz began testing people for the other roles, he had them do scenes in which I appeared, and he always called me to make the tests with them. I almost made the picture before it was begun.

I THINK Bette Davis is a grand actress. It was simply swell working with her, and how grand she was to me, helping me and telling me how to do things, showing me short cuts to acting! And Mike Curtiz was just like a mother to me, honestly, just like a mother. No one could have been more patient and understanding."

On the set he is always behind the camera asking questions.

"I don't know how they put up with me," Wayne laughed. "I'm always bothering them in the cutting-room, or in the camera department, asking questions. I want to be a director some day, and I have to know what makes things click. I'm really getting my education now," he grinned, "and getting paid while I'm doing it."

Which brought up the subject of money. He is investing most of his salary in annuities and buying a new car. After those two obligations and income tax matters are taken care of, he chips in at home and keeps out exactly eighteen dollars a week for pocket money.

"That's enough," he declared. "I eat at home most of the time. I'm going to join the Y.M.C.A. I want some place to swim and work out, and the clubs are too expensive."

His idea of a big time is to go out dancing at the Biltmore Bowl or Cocoanut Grove about once a month. If there is one thing he dislikes more than a stiff shirt, it is a stuffed one. Although raised as any son of wealthy parents, he doesn't get a kick out of what he terms "the social life."

"I'd just as soon cut paper dolls as spend every night fooling around night clubs," he declared.

He doesn't drink, but smokes incessantly, at least during interviews. He likes tennis and golf, which he has recently taken up. He thinks the game would be improved by installing a hamburger stand at every hole. Recently he entered the studio golf tournament, and when he turned in his card with a score of one hundred sixty four on it, the referee said, "Oh, Mr. Morris, you were supposed to go around just once."

"That's right," Wayne replied. "I did."

He suspected a trick when he received a huge ham for low score, but his mother thought it a fine idea and asked him not to improve his game.

HE also likes prize fights. But, "You know," he said seriously, "there are some places that women belong and some places where they don't seem to fit. I don't like to see a woman at the fights, or in a poker game. Poker is a game where the men can unbutton their collars and take off their coats, and if they don't get good cards, they can let loose and swear. But not if there are women in the game."

And, speaking of women, Wayne declares that at the moment he is heart whole, but not quite fancy free. He would like to carry a torch for Olivia de Havilland, but thinks he doesn't know her well enough. He goes out occasionally with pretty little Lana Turner, a player at his studio, and the publicity heads, with an eye to business, are furthering this romance.

"But I couldn't get married now. I'm not old enough. I'm not established yet. I haven't enough money. Why," he spluttered, as he floundered around for emphatic words, "it's ridiculous!"

He gets upset when he reads too much romantic gossip about himself in the newspapers, but he roared with laughter when he read that he was a descendant of both Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis. "My mother was a distant cousin of one and my father of the other," he admitted.

Another laugh came when he read that he had knocked out five sparring partners while making the fight scenes for "Kid Galahad."

I DID knock out one fellow, and it's in the picture," he admitted a bit ruefully. "I didn't mean to. We had rehearsed it a dozen times and it was the fifth take. I don't know how it happened. Something slipped, I guess," and he looked a little shamefacedly at his stout fist.

The trainer, who put him in shape to make the fight scenes look like fight scenes, thinks Wayne is wasting his time as an actor.

"But I wouldn't want to be a fighter," he told me firmly. "I'm not even crazy about boxing."

The thing he has read about himself that he likes best is the opinion of a woman writer on a Pittsburgh newspaper, who said:

"He is the kind of boy whose first fan letters will be from mothers of sons."

"It isn't true, though," he admitted honestly. "My mail is from boys who compliment me on my work and from girls who ask for my picture."

"Do I read my publicity?"

His answer was interrupted by a loud whoop from a publicity man near us.

"Does he read it?" the old meanie yelled. "He buys two copies of everything that is written about him, so that when one copy is worn out, he'll have one left to show his grandchildren."

Wayne blushed. He is a cinch for baiters.

"Well, of course I read my publicity," he said, "but I don't believe it." And somehow, this rings true. For if there's one thing that stands out about Wayne Morris, it's this: Hollywood hasn't gone to his head, even though the film fans are now at his feet.

Maybe It's Luck

song at the top of her tiny voice. By dinnertime she had sold $100. worth of Thrift Stamps.

"Oh, well," she explained modestly, "everyone was feeling patriotic. It was 1919 you know, and they had dressed me in a tiny Red Cross uniform. Surely it wasn't because I could sing, for I couldn't. I never did sing when I was a youngster."

Perhaps, she couldn't sing, but the next outstanding event that she remembers was a few years later when she attended a moving picture theatre on amateur night.

"I'll sing," she volunteered to the manager, when she saw her little playmates marching up to the stage to do their acts. She was feeling remorseful for having done something naughty at home. If she won a prize she might reinstate herself in her mother's favor.

The manager took a look at the little black-haired girl with enormous blue-grey eyes and lifted her onto the stage. She put all of that will to win into her performance and carried off second prize, which was a huge basket of groceries. She didn't carry it far, however, for before she reached home a big boy stole it from her.

"I arrived home in tears. It seems funny now, but at the moment it was a tragedy. How we could have used that basket of groceries!" she laughed.

"Mother and I were alone from the time I was a little girl. My father was killed in an airplane accident, and although my mother was never trained to do any kind of work, she had to do whatever she could to support us. She was determined to keep me with her no matter what happened, and I've seen her take a job that paid only five dollars a week because it was all she could get to do at the time.

"She was determined that I should have an education and at night, after a hard day's work, she washed and ironed my little school dresses so that I could appear neat and clean. She worked so hard."

The memory of those hard days still hurts, and I knew she was sincere when she added, "My chief ambition was to grow up so I could help my mother.

"But now that Mother doesn't have to work, she can't stand the inactivity," Dorothy laughed. "She's going to school, taking a business course, so she can attend to my fan mail. It gives her something to do when I'm at the studio.

"We've just furnished an apartment, and it was more fun. Let's see," she said, counting on her fingers, "there are two bedrooms upstairs and a living-room, dining-room, bedroom and kitchen downstairs. I had one of the bedrooms made into a den and decorated it as an Hawaiian room. Some of the furniture is rattan and I covered the other pieces with strips of bamboo. The ceiling is covered with palm leaves."

ONE OF her outstanding characteristics is gratitude. An example of it concerns the little bronze statue of Venus, which was one of the prizes she won along with the title of "Miss New Orleans," and from which she wouldn't part for any amount of money. As a piece of bronze, there was no place for it in her new home, but it had to be there, so she had it painted gold to harmonize with the gold and white of her dainty living-room.

Dorothy still calls New Orleans home. It was there she went to school, and from the time she was ten years old, her chum was the late Dorothy Dell.

"The two Dorothys," everyone called them, for they were inseparable. Together they put on backyard plays and dreamed of some day being great stars of the stage. They swore eternal friendship, as children do, and they remained staunch friends until the untimely death of Miss Dell.

In 1930 Dorothy Dell won the New Orleans beauty contest and went on to Galveston and won the title of "Miss Universe," which brought several stage offers. She had consented to go to Galveston only if Dorothy Lamour would accompany her and refused to accept any stage offer that didn't include a job for her pal. Finally, they joined the Fanchon and Marco show and toured together for six months.

At the end of that time nothing offered itself, and Dorothy Lamour returned home to New Orleans where she arrived just in time to enter the 1931 beauty contest. This time she won the title of "Miss New Orleans," as her chum had the year before. However, as there seemed to be no further opportunity for her there, she took the little bronze statue and the money she had won and went to Chicago.

The friends she visited lived just outside Chicago, and they drove her into the city to help her find some sort of employment. Her first glimpse of the city aroused mingled emotions. As she stepped from the car and took one excited look about her, she felt something around her ankles. There, in a little mound around her feet, was her underslip.

"It was simply awful," she moaned at the memory of that embarrassing moment. "It was summer time and you could see right through my thin dress."

With outward poise she picked up the offending garment and raced to the ladies' room in the Civic Auditorium and from there proceeded about the business of finding work.

She tried to get a job as a model and went to the largest department store there. She asked to see the man in charge of personnel, applied for a job and got it.

"But after a short time they cut down on help, all the models were fired, and I was out of a job. I explained that I just had to have work, so they gave me a job as saleslady. I worked in almost every department in the store, and at Christmas time I ran an elevator.

"About this time Dorothy Dell came through Chicago with the 'Follies.' She decided that I should be a singer, as everyone said I was too short to be a show girl. She coached me in singing every spare minute we had. Through a publicity woman at the Morrison Hotel, I got a chance to sing in the supper-room.

"And when I was singing my first song, I was so frightened I forgot the words. I had to hum my way through the song."

APPARENTLY, Dorothy's humming was just what Herb Kay, an orchestra leader well known throughout the East, thought he needed. He heard her that night and offered her a job singing with his organization. She was his soloist for two years.

"He taught me everything I know about singing," she repeated gratefully. "And he always told me I should be in pictures. Now that I am in pictures, he laughs and says he would never be the one to say, 'I told you so'."

The little Southern girl promptly fell in love with Herb Kay, "but he didn't fall in love with me," she confessed. "I stayed with the orchestra two years, and still he didn't fall. I didn't think it was doing me any good to remain and see him all the time, so I went to New York and got a job singing for the National Broadcasting System. I had been singing over the air with the orchestra all the time, so I had no trouble getting a job

WHY AREN'T BABIES BORN WITH BLACKHEADS?

7 out of 10 women blame their skin for blackheads, when they should blame their cleansing method

By Lady Esther

Everywhere I go I hear women say "Oh! well, there's nothing I can do about it, I guess I was born with this kind of skin."

They're referring, of course, to hateful, mocking, stubborn blackheads. But stop a minute and think! Did you ever see a baby with blackheads? Of course not. Then where do those blackheads come from?

These blemishes are tiny specks of dirt which become wedged in your pores.

How do they start?

It's sad but true, blackheads take root because your cleansing methods fail. You know you can't wash blackheads away. And they only laugh at your surface cleanser. The longer these blackheads stay in your skin, the blacker and more noticeable they grow.

Switch to a Penetrating Cream

See with your own eyes, the amazing improvement in your skin when a cream really penetrates the dirt in your pores.

Let me send you, free and postpaid, a generous tube of Lady Esther Four Purpose Face Cream, so that you can prove every statement I make. It is an active cream. It's penetrating, because it penetrates pore-dirt. You can see the results. You can feel the difference.

When your free supply of cream arrives, smooth on enough to cover your face and neck. At the very first touch your skin will perk up. Why? Because my cream is a cooling, soothing, refreshing cleanser.

When you wipe it off, you may be shocked to see how grimy the cloth looks. But it's a sign this penetrating cream goes after deep-down dirt that causes those blackheads.

Write now for your free supply

Just send me the coupon today, and by return mail I will send you my generous gift tube of Lady Esther Face Cream. I'll also send you all ten shades of my Face Powder free, so you can see which is your most flattering color—see how Lady Esther Face Cream and Face Powder work together to give you perfect skin smoothness. Mail me the coupon today.

on the radio."

Always before when Dorothy wanted anything, she went after it with grim determination. This time, when the prize was something that meant her future happiness, she ran away from it just as grimly.

"It was the woman in me, I guess," she said shyly. And her woman's intuition was right, for two weeks after she left Chicago, Herb flew to New York after her. They were married immediately and after two years are more enthusiastic about each other than ever.

Dorothy stayed on in New York about a year, singing over the radio and taking a plane for Chicago and Herb almost every week. When she wasn't visiting him, he was visiting her in New York. It didn't seem like such a long-distance marriage, they were both so busy.

Then NBC offered her a job on the Coast, and there was a family conference. It meant she couldn't fly to Chicago every little while. Possibly, it meant pictures and a big career. It meant she could do more and more for her mother. But those long separations from her husband! In the end, he was the deciding force.

"You know, I've always said you should be in pictures," he teased. But, seriously, he knew it was her big opportunity, and he refused to stand in her way.

"I want you to go out, too," he told her. "You've got to be seen around. I don't want you to stay in nights just because I'm not there to take you out. You have lots of friends, and I want you to have a good time."

So Dorothy came to Hollywood, chin up, hopes high, her radio contract in her pocket and that bronze statue under her arm. She was able to fly back to Chicago frequently, her radio work was fine, but her motion picture career didn't materialize.

SHE ALMOST got the Helen Morgan role in "Show Boat" with Irene Dunne. She had offers from almost every company, but there was always some difficulty to prevent the completion of a deal. Six months passed, and Dorothy had a hard time keeping her chin up. Then Paramount began a search for a girl to play the title role in "Jungle Princess." Dorothy got the job.

She didn't get the role because she could sing or act, because when plans for the picture were being made those attributes weren't considered important. It was later, when they discovered her ability, that the part was built up into a starring role. She got it because her black hair is almost thirty inches long. A wig wouldn't do because she had to be in and out of the water a great deal. "And you never know when a wig may bounce off," she laughed. She shivers when she thinks how many times she had been tempted to bob her hair.

She was rushed into the picture so fast that before she knew it she found herself at work. The lot of a motion picture actress, she had always supposed, meant wearing fine clothes, silver fox furs, and expensive perfume. What a shock it was to discover she was the only girl on a location forty miles from Hollywood, living in a tiny cabin that had been built for her and working all day long for six solid weeks at the bottom of a deep ravine—most of the time in the creek, which ran along the floor of the canyon. Her fine clothes consisted of a sarong.

She was so much more than satisfactory in the role that she was immediately cast in "College Holiday," "Swing High, Swing Low," "High, Wide and Handsome" and then given the leading role in "The Last Train for Madrid." She will have appeared in five pictures when she finishes "Hurricane"—all in one year. It appears that she can't be spared long enough for a vacation, now that she's been discovered.

"I've been so busy I haven't had a chance to go out any place," she said gaily. "Now Herb is spending his two-months' vacation here with me."

Her voice, which, of course, you've heard, is a low, sweet contralto. It is not trained, but seems to thrill audiences just the same. "I'd like to study and be a 'good' singer," she says, "but I've been fooling around with popular music so long I don't think I can. I don't know one note of music from another and have to learn all my songs by hearing them," she admitted.

She simply adores fan magazines and reads everything that is written about the other stars. Lamour is her real name.

She must be lucky, all right, for she was in the right place at the right time, and she has everything it takes.

Beauty Gets the Job

If you are a more or less striking type, play down on make-up, costume and hair-do less'n you're after a model's job, mebbe. The potential employer, contrary to what we're led to believe in the more sizzling type of fiction, doesn't want a glamor girl or a hotsy-totsy in his office. It makes his wife ask too many questions. This advice goes double if it's a woman who has the power to hire you or send you about your business. This doesn't mean that you shouldn't look as nice and pretty as you can, but do it in a quiet way, with a dark costume, a close-to-the-head hair-do, a tailored type of hat, and make-up sparingly applied on a face as fresh and clean as you can possibly arrange to keep it.

A WORD about your attitude as you go in to apply for your job. It's not a bit of good telling you not to be nervous, for you probably won't be able to help it. Furthermore, a little becoming diffidence won't count against you. But try not to let your nervousness get the better of your common sense. State your case as directly and in as few words as possible. Don't lie in an effort to aggrandize yourself, but don't underestimate yourself either. If you are given a test of any sort, don't be afraid to ask a question or two if you don't clearly understand what the gent dictated or whatever is asked of you. You'll be rated as much on a generally intelligent and alert attitude as upon the sample work you do.

Give a thought to your posture. Walk well and sit straight. Don't fiddle with purse, handkerchief or gloves. Here's a little trick that will keep your tummy flat and your fanny in, the shoulders up and the chest forward: stand up and tighten the muscles of your thighs. That's all there is to it. Just tighten those large muscles and feel the middle flatten, the rear pull in. You simply can't slump if you'll do this.

I don't know what type of job you may be applying for. As I said, jobs aren't easy to find, and you may have to take what you can get. Okay—if it's in a factory or a mill or if it's a microscopically paid position in a local shop or whatever—take it, and do your level best to give satisfaction. But in the back of your mind (where your employer can't see it), keep this thought, "I'm not going to stay here. This is only a stop-gap." What money you can squeeze from necessities, put aside for better clothes, for cosmetic and grooming requisites and for self-advancement. If you're not equipped with shorthand and typing, make a beeline for a night business school as fast as you can. Shorthand and typing pave the way to untold interesting jobs and lucrative careers.

KAY FRANCIS began her career as a social secretary. Her good taste in dress and grooming, her poised, lovely manner and voice helped get her this job, and the job, in turn, helped win splendid contacts for her and gradually paved the way for her present glamorous career. I don't mean that good secretarial jobs are necessarily first stop on the way to Hollywood, but they frequently are first stop on the way to junior executive jobs in advertising, department store buying, and a dozen other fascinating and well-paid careers for women.

When you get your jobs, darlings, is when the test of your intelligence really begins. Unless it's a sales job you have,

"Oh...THAT girl!"

A DEVASTATING WAY TO DESCRIBE A GIRL

A GIRL might just as well wear a tag when people refer to her as "Oh, that girl!"

For she is marked as a person unpleasant to be with—a person to be avoided because she carries the ugly odor of underarm perspiration on her person and clothing.

You can't expect people, men especially, to tolerate this in a girl, no matter how attractive she may be in other ways.

The smart modern girl knows that her underarms need special daily care. Soap and water alone are not enough.

And she knows the quick easy way to give this care. Mum!

Quick to use. Harmless to clothing. Half a minute, when you're dressing, is all you need to use Mum. Or use it after dressing, any time. For Mum is harmless to clothing.

Soothing to skin. It's soothing to the skin, too. You can use it right after shaving the underarms.

Doesn't prevent natural perspiration. And you should know this—that Mum prevents every trace of perspiration odor without affecting natural perspiration itself.

Don't label yourself as "the girl who needs Mum." Use it regularly every day and you'll be safe! Bristol-Myers Co., 630 Fifth Ave., New York.

MUM

USE MUM ON SANITARY NAPKINS, TOO and you'll never have a moment's worry about this source of unpleasantness.

takes the odor out of perspiration

where you must make your personality felt, my advice to you is to be unobtrusive for a short spell. Do your work well and find out what sort of environment you're in. A book could be written on the subject of getting along with one's business associates, about tact and diplomacy, about means of gradually making your presence felt in an organization without pushing. But I've side-tracked from the beauty theme far enough already. I'll just say these few things:

You're going to spend at least six hours a day, at least five days a week, at your work. You might as well get enjoyment and interest out of it as well as that weekly pay envelope. Use your noodle and adapt yourself to your environment. Don't always be satisfied if you fulfill just the exact amount asked of you. Do a little more. Gradually, find out a little more about the business you're in. It may lead to a better job. You'll have set-backs and bad breaks, sure. Don't let them get you down.

THIS reminds me of Ann Sothern, who was let out of "The Follies" because she was too pretty and sang too sweetly. Well, mebbe not exactly that, but she resembled just enough the late Marilyn Miller, and her voice was similar to the star's, so it was soon a case of Annie doesn't work here any more. A friend advised her to change her type, to become hotcha instead of sweet, since the market seemed to be glutted with sweet types. But Ann sensibly decided that she just wasn't cut out to be hotcha, so she continued traipsing around to theatrical agents and went on with her singing and dancing lessons. And that reminds us of the famous old saying, "Be yourself. Don't try to be what you ain't."

When the good break comes, be ready to live up to it. Every day, think, "This may be the day!" Through a great tragedy, Alice Faye now has the chance of stepping into a very golden pair of shoes indeed. Hollywood mourns the loss of gay and gorgeous Jean Harlow, but nevertheless there must be someone to make us laugh and make our pulses quicken as the much-mourned platinum star was able to do. The logical person to wear Jean's mantle of gaiety and allure seems to be Alice Faye. Will she be able to do it? She must work, and work hard if she will succeed. In face and figure, not quite as lovely as Jean, she, on the other hand, has a better voice. Will the good breaks go to her head, as Jean's common sense never let them go to hers? These considerations and problems aren't so very different in essence from the problems and considerations which confront any girl when she is given something to live up to, something to work for.

Well, get back to your knitting and beauty advice, M. M. Give the girls some tips on looking their best while on the job.

TIME yourself on making up and hair fixing. Taking pains, but without dawdling, see how long it takes you. Then allow this much time every morning. Wear only essential make-up to business. Powder and lipstick. No rouge unless you're very washed-out looking without it. No mascara unless your lashes and brows are so light you look plain without it. Every morning, give your nails a moment's attention. They take hard punishment in the daily grind. If you're doing stenographic work, keep your nails just fingertip length. Remember that carbon paper has a horrid habit of combining with nail polish to give a very grubby effect, so change the polish every night if need be. The important thing is that the polish never be chipped and cracked.

Remember that you'll not have time to get a wave or a manicure in the daytime. You must take care of things after office hours, and you'll be better off if you learn to do as many beauty tasks as possible for yourself. One night a week should be set aside for a swell shampoo, a bang-up manicure, and any other beauty and grooming tasks you need to do.

If you stand all day, you must wear good—not cheap—shoes. If you sit all day, you must wear a good, firm girdle. Once during the morning and once during the afternoon, take a few minutes for one of these refreshing and relaxing stunts. Take ten full, deep breaths, exhaling very slowly. (Excellent for that nervous, tense feeling.) Or let your head drop forward, limp, on your chest, and then slowly roll it in a circle, letting it go as far back as you can. Cup your eyes for a minute or two with your hands and try to "see black."

Keep that bottle of skin freshener in your desk or in your purse and take time to give the face a "once over lightly" before or after lunch. A small bottle of a good mouth wash is not amiss, either, so that you will never be guilty of what the ads warn you against.

Many is the working gal who must dress at seven in the morning for all day, and probably for an after-office date besides. Choose materials which won't wrinkle easily. Have as many washable blouses and neck gadgets as you can afford—they'll make your few basic costumes look different. After holding a job for awhile, it's so easy to slump and let down on keeping that there neat, well-groomed appearance. The other girls in the office don't seem to be so terribly fussy. The boss is an old codger of fifty—no point in fixing up for him. But that's the wrong attitood, Toots, the wrong attitood. You be the girl whose face is always fresh and sparkling, whose hair is always shining and becomingly waved, and whose costume, footgear and fingernails are always as spandy as you can keep them.

If you're overweight, the office lunch hour is a good time for that liquid meal and a nice brisk walk. If you're underweight, you must find some tearoom or something, darlings, where you can get a hot, nourishing meal, even though it strains the budget to pay for it. A swell idea, too, if you can send out in the middle of the afternoon for a glass of milk or a malted drink. But, of course, if the office frowns upon such deviations from starchy efficiency, you must go without.

Older women in business are so often shadowed with the feeling that their hold on the job is precarious and that a dozen young things are all ready to step in and take their livelihoods away from them. I have never quite understood why this should be so. It needn't be so if the older woman doesn't permit herself to slump and get in a rut. The experience and wisdom which the years bring us are even more valuable than the energy of youth. Most of the women who hold highly paid and responsible jobs aren't young, after all. If you feel that graying hair counts against you, have it dyed—well, and not cheaply. If you are on the plump side, you should, of course, endeavor to do something about it, but in the meantime, be prepared to pay more for your clothes than the thin folks have to pay.

See you all next month—and P. S., I hope you all get the job!

He's Learned from the Ladies

knothole in the fence. So I took my sax and joined a band. It was the first time in her life my mother had to depend on me. Think she worried about herself? No. She worried about being a burden on me. There was I, a big, strapping galoot, and she didn't want to be a burden on me. Never a word about her own pain and so forth, only about poor Fred and all the hospital bills he had to pay. Poor Fred, my foot." He was examining that extremity with great interest.

"I'm not saying she taught me a sense of responsibility. I never put it into so many words. Neither did she. But if she hadn't been the way she was, maybe I'd have been different too. How can you tell? I never read any books about it. All I know is that the best part of that job in New York was being able to send her some dough. At that, she was doing me a favor. Probably kept me out of a lot of trouble. Didn't have enough left to get into trouble with."

A publicity man came in with a MacMurray story. It described a scene that took place recently on a Hollywood street, and the lead ran, "MacMurray can't go out without being mobbed."

He took one look and flung it down in disgust. "Sounds like I'm a big movie star and very popular."

"Well, aren't you?"

"Not that popular." His annoyance was obviously genuine. "Can't you kill it?"

"Too late," and the publicity man made for the door.

"Hey, wait a minute." Fred started after him. "Put in another story," he bawled down the hall, "and tell 'em I can go out without being mobbed."

Once he'd been calmed, I asked him about the women he'd played with. "Does that mean I've cleared one hurdle?" he wanted to know, and shook hands with himself.

"Well, this part's easier. I've heard lots of times that women are bum sports, especially actresses. Not the ones I've worked with. Maybe you think I'm just shooting my mouth off this way, to pay fancy compliments. Well, I can show you different.

"I played my first picture with May Robson. I was trying to figure out how to be an actor. She must have seen I was hot and bothered, and she said, 'Just be yourself, and you'll get along fine.' Might have been her nice way of saying, 'Don't waste time trying to act,' but I put that thought behind me and took her advice. I've been taking it ever since. Sometimes when I'm being myself, the director seems to think someone else might be an improvement. But at least it gives me something to start off on, so I don't go flopping around like a lopwinged turkey.

"Of course, when I was really scared was the first picture with Claudette. Look who she was, and I wasn't. No use trying to describe my feelings. Put yourself in my place, and that tells the story. My first scene with her, I was taking her to the subway, and she felt my arm kind of going this way." He waggled it. "She looked up at me and smiled. 'What's all the shaking for?' 'Scared.' 'Of what?' 'The whole business.' 'You'll lick it,' she said, and she said it as if she meant it. Anyway that was the first time I thought to myself, 'Maybe I will. Why not?'

"She could have kept very quiet, and no one would have held it against her. Instead, she went out of her way to give me pointers. And more than that. The first week some good friend told me I was going to be kicked out—which helped. I found out later that Claudette Colbert went to bat for me. 'I think he's okay,' she said. 'I want him in.' I was nobody, and she put up a fight for me. Pretty bum sport, yeah!

SAME way with Carole Lombard. My pictures with her were mostly comedy. You had to be light and easy. She'd kid between scenes. She likes to kid, but there was more behind it than that. I saw she was doing it on purpose, to keep me in the mood. Then before the scene she'd grab my hand. 'Come on, let's be funny,' she'd say and pull me on.

"She'd worry about my make-up, too; sit and look at me and say, 'I wonder how we can make you handsome?' One day she decided I should have a few eyebrows taken out. She pulled a couple and I yelled blue murder. 'You have to suffer to be good looking,' she said. That's another thing I learned from Carole," he grinned. "But I'd rather not suffer and not be good looking, I guess.

"Anyway, you can't tell me that actresses are this and that. Maybe some of them are. I told you before, I'm talking about the ones I know. And the ones I know I take off my hat to."

MacMurray's wife was once on the stage herself. They met while playing in the same Broadway show.

"Do I have to talk about Lillian?" he inquired plaintively. Seeing no sign of clemency, he drew a breath and plunged.

"Well, here's the principal thing I learned from her: that all this talk about no happy marriages in Hollywood is so much bologna.

"Not having been married very long, maybe you think I have no right to judge. But we got to know each other pretty well before we were married. One thing—it really happened before I had any idea I'd be in pictures." The slight flush, the way he hurried over the words, gave me to understand that "it" meant "falling in love."

"That gives you a little feeling of security, you know. With someone else, you might think being in the movies had something to do with it." He began to look very uncomfortable indeed. "Say, does that sound conceited? Do me a favor and don't let it sound that way. It's only that when I first came out here, different people would call and ask me out to dinners and parties. I'd say, 'Do you mind if I bring my fiancée?' Nine times out of ten they'd pull back. 'Awfully sorry, but we'd planned on just so many.' Well, you couldn't help feeling that being in the movies had something to do with it. See what I mean?" He seemed grateful when I said I did.

"One reason we get along is because we enjoy the same things, except one. She likes to dance, and I don't. So we don't dance. Well, that's not quite true either. Before she was ill, we did go out once in awhile. Only I don't like to dance more than she does like to dance. So she was satisfied with once in awhile. Suppose I'd married someone who wanted to go out all the time." He looked frightened at the thought of what he'd escaped.

SHORTLY after their marriage, Mrs. MacMurray was taken seriously ill. In bed for five months, she is only now beginning to regain her strength. Her husband's concern is all the more distressing to see, because he keeps his lips closed over it. Like all his emotions, his worries belong to himself.

"She's like my mother," he managed to say gruffly. "She always feels swell, even when she doesn't. On bad days she puts make-up on, so I can't tell. I have to ask the nurse all the time how she's getting along. Listen to her, and she'd make you believe she ought to be up and jigging."

The home in Brentwood they'd planned together was going up when she was taken ill. But her interest never waned. "Of course she couldn't watch it the way she wanted to, but I'd talk things over with her, then go ahead. Then I'd have to go out and take pictures and bring them back to show her.

"And that was another place where we found we agreed. For instance, we both thought we wanted a breakfast room. Somebody said to me, 'What do you want a breakfast room for?' So I said to Lillian, 'Say, what do we want a breakfast room for?' And she said, 'Yes, what do we want a breakfast room for?' So we have no breakfast room. The few times we didn't agree, I left it to her. She knows a lot more about decorating than I do. Like the dining-room paper. I saw it in a small piece and thought it was awful. She looked kind of downhearted. Well, nuts, if she'd wanted monkeys and giraffes climbing over the walls, that'd be all right with me, too. 'Put it in, anyhow, and see how it looks,' I told her. So it looks swell.

"I got to be quite a shopper," he went on, with a householder's pride. "I'd go down to this hardware place and bring up a bunch of doorknobs and lighting fixtures, and then I'd have them send samples of drapes and rugs, and she'd take her pick. Then a day or so before we went in, I brought her these pieces of cardboard, and she drew a plan of each room and where she wanted everything to go. That's decorating the hard way. When it was all fixed we took her there in an ambulance and left her downstairs, while we carried the bed up and got it made. Then we carried her up, and there she was, sitting pretty in her own house. Next thing I knew, she was laughing her head off. I turned 'round just in time to see the carpenter whisking the door away. It wasn't really finished, you know. I just wanted her to see it the way it was going to look.

"Anyway, she's improved much more rapidly since. We were in an apartment before, where she couldn't get out. Now she lies on the sundeck. Birds singing, flowers growing." He caught himself again. "Pretty fancy talk for an ex-saxophone player."

"Watch out, Fred. Someone might think you have a heart," scoffed a friend who had come in for part of this. "You make me laugh."

"I make myself laugh." He was at the door, poised for flight. "Listen, wasn't there a book once called 'Are Women People?' Well, you can say for me the answer's yes. Nice people. I learned about it from them."

College Course in Clothes

Phyllis Brooks' ensemble is of navy blue and luggage-tan wool crepe. Her dress has the new, casual, low neckline and the simple lines that are so magic in slimming a full figure. The very full coat makes the thighs appear narrow, and all trimming is concentrated in the accessories, as it should be in the case of all but willowy-slim girls. Her gloves are hand-stitched chamois, and her tiny hat shows the new jutting-forward line that is the outstanding angle of the new hats.

Mary Carlisle is so thin that even the most tailored wool crepe dress needs more elaboration, more fullness. It is introduced subtly, however, in the dress she is wearing under the box coat, flaring slightly from the hips so as to retain an air of utmost simplicity. It is the coat she is wearing that is most important for college girls. This one is made of stiff costume velvet of deepest blue. It is the sort of coat that college girls find indispensable, because they can wear it over tailored dresses in the daytime, softer dresses for informal evenings. In velveteen, or corduroy, it is equally good. If you or your mother are clever with a sewing machine, you can make a coat like this easily. And a tip from a star who makes her own clothes, and who always has a coat like this in her wardrobe, is to go to the upholstery department for your material. She buys upholstery velvet or velour for coats like this at much less than the cost per yard in the regular coat fabric department.

One ensemble like either of these, an extra wool dress that can be worn with the jacket, and a collection of skirts and sweaters take good care of a girl's daytime campus needs. After all, it is in her evening clothes that she will have a real chance to shine. And shine she must this year on all gala occasions by means of spangles, lamé, or shiny beads.

The evening dress that Mary Carlisle is wearing is of blue-gray chiffon, embroidered in crystal beads. The slip underneath is very tight to emphasize her slimness, the dress itself full enough to look comfortable and graceful. It is a very young and romantic dress, but it borrows a sophisticated touch from the sculptured, Grecian robes grown-ups are wearing—a tightly-draped bodice. The jacket is removable, of course, but who would want to take off such a chic and jaunty bit of frippery? Especially as it is transparent and not weighty at all. Note particularly the length of the skirt. It is just below ankle-length, comfortable for dancing, but with all the sweeping grace of the very long dresses of last year.

Middle-aged women can take up the new short-skirted evening dresses if they want to, and fashion writers can scream about the ballerina skirts, but college girls just won't have them. When they are dressed for gala occasions, they want to look just as different as possible from their everyday style, and long skirts give them that added dramatic sweep as they enter a ballroom.

Notice, please, that Mary is not breaking the neckline of the dress by wearing beads or a necklace, and that no earrings, clips, or flowers distract attention from the sumptuousness of the dress. If your dress glitters, forswear all jewelry except bracelets, lest you look like a Xmas tree or its understudy. Be sure, too, if you are wearing a dress of rather sophisticated lines, that you emulate Mary's freshly-tubbed, little-girl demureness by having your hair arranged very plain and fairly reeking with the healthy radiance that Beauty Expert Mary Marshall has told you comes with constant brushing.

NOW we come to what is fondly known as the dress. Every girl at college simply has to have a dark chiffon dress that can be worn with or without a hat to dress up dinner dates and informal dances. This one is black, but many girls prefer midnight blue or the very dark brownish red that is being called sherry this season. Colors are younger and, besides, some girls haven't the healthy skin and hair that black requires.

Selecting a dress of this type requires the utmost care, because if it is too plain, it will make you look like a poor relation. The very full skirt does a lot toward making it look frivolous, but the really giddy touch is the frou-frou of pink chiffon around the neckline. The puffed sleeves help, too.

Topping it all is the absurd little hat that proclaims a ranking mode of Autumn 1937. Trimming is massed in the front and high. A lot of girls are going to make a tiny skull-cap like this do multiple-duty by having flowers and feathers in many colors, changing the trimming to match various dresses.

While we are on the subject of hats, we might just as well sum up the major points of the new millinery fashions. First, the trimming juts forward as it does on this one and on Phyllis Brooks' daytime hat. Most of the new hats look as if they were just poised on the head temporarily, ready to be catapulted off into space like an airplane from the S.S. Lexington.

Hats are not moored on with elastics any more. The crowns fit very snugly around the back, and isn't that going to be a relief on the days when your hair is a little unruly?

Berets are in fashion—and when were they not?—but the new berets are larger, softly draped, and tilted up on one side.

Black hats are being worn with suits and dresses of almost all colors this year, but they flaunt little feathers or ribbon ornaments of sharp colors. Rarely does the trimming match the dress you are wearing. It is more apt to be the same color but a much brighter shade. One of the most striking new color combinations is worn in private life by Marlene Dietrich. It's a smoky gray ensemble with a scarf and hat of piercing sage green.

Now let's go back to dresses. The outstanding new line in frocks is called the corselet line, which simply means that dresses are closely fitted from bust to hip line. Many of the day dresses are of princess style, unbelted. When there is a belt or sash, it is part of the bodice draping and high, as in Mary Carlisle's beaded evening dress, or rather low as in the dark chiffon frock. Skirts on day dresses range from the boxy, straight type to gores of moderate fullness, to umbrella-like circles with pleats stitched down over the hips. Evening dresses must be decidedly one extreme or the other—very slim and sleek or extravagantly full. No halfway measures when you are dressing for a big occasion.

New coat and woolen dress fabrics go to extremes heretofore unknown. Either the surface is so nubby and rough that it is almost as uneven as a piece of curly Persian lamb, or it is so smooth that it looks and feels like suede. The latter is more popular with college girls. Even when they are buying sports coats, they prefer lustrous velveteens, or silky-haired coatings that have a beaver-like finish to the rough ones. When it comes to dresses, the more the wool feels like suede or satin, the better they like it. It's more feminine, they will tell you. A girl who is competing with men all day in the classroom just has to look especially impractical and enchanting to make him forget that she knew the answers that he didn't.

FOR the last, I have saved what is perhaps the shrewdest, most calculating and most becoming of all the outfits Mary Carlisle is modelling for you. That black outfit with the little-girl, ruffled organdy blouse is a velvet lounging pajama, just the costume to wear at a cat party in the sorority house or dormitory. It isn't a bad idea at all for a college girl to have tucked away in her wardrobe a knockout outfit to be worn when just the girls get together. It makes them feel that she isn't a siren who just dresses up to please men, but who holds the good opinion of her girl friends in high regard.

The blouse is flesh colored. Clothes fashions are much more colorful this year, and instead of using lingerie touches of white, the new clothes introduce collars, blouses, or neck ruffles of delicate, light colors. Flesh color is ideal for Mary Carlisle because of her pale blond hair and creamy skin. Brunettes with olive skin find pale, clear amber more becoming. Ash blondes who get so tanned in Summer that they retain a burnished glow all Winter, wisely select a rosy apricot color. The paler shades look innocuous on them.

Maybe you have noticed that I haven't said a word about tweeds or about those three-piece suits that have been the college girls' stand-by the last few years. Well, the college girls just aren't wearing them any more, not if they are style conscious. Along with their older sisters, they have gone in for clothes that are more smooth, more luxurious, more opulent.

The Beauty Bath

THAT SOOTHES LIKE A LULLABY

When the God of Sleep is playing hide-and-seek and you just can't seem to get your much-needed rest, there is one pleasant way to entice him.

Merely swish a handful or two of LINIT in your tub of warm water—step in—and relax for fifteen minutes. As you lie in the enveloping luxury of its velvety smoothness, close your eyes and think of a rose bathed in the moonlight of a June evening. Now step out, dry off and slip into bed!

How delightful it is to let the results of a LINIT BEAUTY BATH caress your skin and relax your body into slumberland. You, too, will agree that the world's most pleasant remedy for fatigue is a restful, soothing LINIT BEAUTY BATH.

going on in the Astaire-Rogers pictures, whether it be Mrs. Astaire, the producer, or Fred himself. It really is nice for a change to witness a film in which falling all over the leading lady's neck is forbidden. Of course, it takes good acting to portray a love scene without actually kissing the girl, but it can be done as this famous dancing couple prove. So, here's to more and better pictures of this type.—Betty Barbara Long, El Paso, Tex.

Ten-Year-Old Prefers Gentlemen

I am ten years of age. I like Clark Gable and William Powell. Clark is a very good actor. He is the kind who should take gambling parts. He has a good speaking voice and a nice smile.

William Powell is a very good actor, too, and he also has a nice smile. What's more, he's a gentleman. I hope he is a gentleman whether he is playing on the screen or not.

P.S. I guess Clark Gable is a gentleman. —Beverly Campbell, Montclair, N. J.

Stars Aren't Plain People

It's unjust, that's what it is, this talk you so often hear about "picture stars being just plain ordinary people, and why all the fuss over them!" True, they're people, but not plain, and certainly not ordinary, or they couldn't be where they are today. It's an achievement indeed to be so pleasing in personality, looks and manner that people all over the world will sit for hours to watch your movements and listen to your voice.

And they haven't all arrived by simply having pull, either. They've worked hard; they've struggled valiantly for their places in the sun. True, some stars have had pull to be brought to the attention of producers, but they've had to come across with the goods once they were before the public, or else do a pretty swift exit from pictures.

I take off my hat to the stars. They're great people.—Alice Johnson, Hollywood, Calif.

Janet Gaynor Is Tops Again

Since seeing "A Star Is Born," I realized why time is so greatly needed to make the best pictures for movie-goers. Miss Gaynor is far more appealing in this picture; everything about her was just right. She is more beautiful than when she played in "Seventh Heaven," and her face is so much more expressive.

Fredric March played his part in the picture so perfectly that as I sat in the crowded movie house, living their joys and sorrows, I felt that I wasn't looking at a picture of life, but at life itself.

The return of lovely Janet Gaynor proves to me that we are right in demanding better pictures, thus allowing the stars more time to make them. Give us the stars we know and love, and place them in stories worth while, and we'll never grow tired of them.—Mrs. Grace Gardner, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Menjou Is Better Than Ever

This is in lieu of a few pats on the back for an old favorite who is showing signs of being more up and coming than many a newcomer, namely, Adolphe Menjou.

He may have been a big star once, but he's so much better now than in those days when he was "the best dressed man" and twirled a moustache. I used to regard him as a fascinating villain, even when he wasn't inclined to be Cassanova-ish. But now—well, today there's a warmth, a real feeling for his roles that seemed lacking in the earlier pictures. It makes one wonder if it isn't a mistake to hurry the old-timers off into the limbo of forgotten people.—F. K. Beckwith, Seattle, Washington.

Another Autry Rooter

Gene Autry's renditions of those haunting cowboy songs on the screen have always proven most enjoyable, and without a doubt his voice is exceedingly charming.

Just recently I had the pleasure of seeing him in person, with Champion, and was so impressed by his pleasant personality and entire naturalness, not to mention two especially delightful songs, "Mexicale Rose" and "Tumbling Tumbleweeds," that he now rates high on my list of favorite stars.

Here's hoping for even greater recognition for Gene, more publicity and many more of the better type of Westerns to suit his combined acting, riding, and singing ability.—Grace Agnes Horning, Kenosha, Wis.

They Can't Be Natural

for La Hepburn than she began to do her stuff. She represented what the press termed a problem child, for it took more than calculation to get pictures or a few words with the star.

However, every dog has his day and theirs wasn't long in coming around. It was in the winter season that signs screamed, "Katharine Hepburn in 'The Lake'." Such reviews as, "Wet as the water in the lake," weren't too encouraging, but on she went. Even though surrounded by an excellent cast, Katie fell down on the job, and during one scene, the curtain was slowly lowered on her emoting, the management probably believing that kindness should be acted upon and not talked about.

Undaunted, Katie returned to Hollywood and continued her feud with certain fellow players.

Then there were little tricks she employed to get publicity. Seems she isn't considered the good copy now that she was in her palmy days. On a recent trip, she resolved to be nice to the press and informed them she was taking skating lessons at Madison Square Garden. This didn't avail her of many reporters, so before long she started from Hollywood to New York by plane and announced a little wager of one thousand dollars that not a soul would get her picture from West to East. Needless to say it worked and one smart cameraman got her picture, but I haven't heard whether the bet was settled or not.

ANOTHER popular star who can't seem to be natural is Carole Lombard. Not, however, in the same way as our aforementioned thespians. Carole is witty and has many friends. If she is with strangers, however, she just can't be herself and is the first to tell you why.

She's a great ribber and one of the few that can take kidding as well as she can give it. In fact, due to a little joke of hers, she is now romancing with Clark Gable. Most courtships can be summed up with: they met, he gave her a bracelet and she gave him a tie; he gave her a ring and everything is set.

Not for Carole Lombard, because in her case it was different. They met; she gave him a broken-down car; he gave her a corsage of vegetables, and all Hollywood laughed. Carole had run into a gent with a sense of humor equal to hers.

An amusing incident, that Carole isn't sure even now wasn't a joke on her, happened recently when "Idiot's Delight" played Hollywood. Carole was so thrilled with the acting of Lunt and Fontanne that, after the play, she went backstage to congratulate Lynne Fontanne. Everything was very nice. Miss Fontanne said, "You're English, aren't you?"

Carole said that she wasn't and a bit later, Lynne wrinkled her brow and asked, "Just what is it you do?"

"Oh, nothing. I just hang around out here," Carole answered, not knowing whether she was being kidded. But if she and Miss Fontanne meet again, the situation may be entirely different, you can bet!

As a matter of fact, there is an actress in Hollywood who pays for her pranks—the hard way. Margaret Sullavan is the gal. A broken arm and several months in New York with a specialist attending the fracture was the result of one laugh-inducer.

Seems there was another comedian in one of her pictures. He also had a sense of humor, for when Margaret started to spray Jack Oakie with a siphon of fizz water, he returned the gag. Maggie ran for her life and in flight tripped over a cable. Before you could bat an eye, she was out for the count and came to with her arm in a sling.

Then there was the time when Margaret was playing in "So Red The Rose." The company was on location for shots of a battle scene and, while she wasn't facing the camera, Miss Sullavan sneaked away and went to work on her own. Each and every car, she locked, pocketing the key. Carefully closing the windows she placed under each auto a little item commonly called a stench bomb. While the fumes went all through the cars, she took the one remaining motor, drove some few

"When you're skinny, pale and sickly-looking, the fellows hardly look at you and you never have a date. I tried everything, but no good until I got Ironized Yeast. Soon I felt a lot peppier. In 4 weeks I gained 11 pounds. Everybody says how pretty I've gotten and I have all the dates I want."

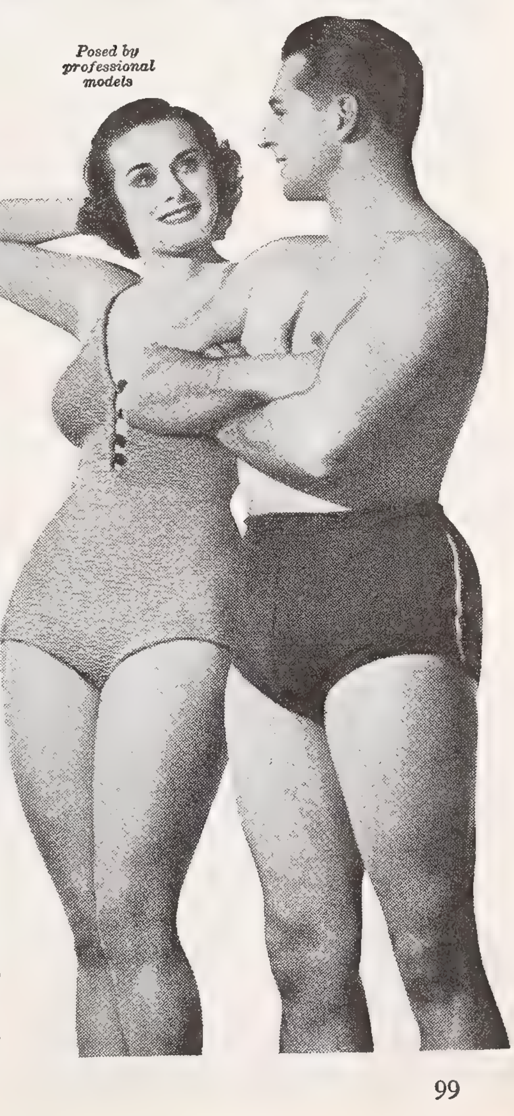
Posed by professional models



– then she gained 11 LBS. QUICK, new popularity

New IRONIZED YEAST tablets give thousands 10 TO 25 lbs. –in a few weeks!

THOUSANDS of skinny, rundown people who never could put on an ounce before have recently gained 10 to 25 pounds of solid, naturally attractive flesh, glorious new pep and popularity—in just a few weeks!

They've taken this new, scientific formula, Ironized Yeast, which although developed and perfected at the cost of many thousands of dollars, comes to you in pleasant tablets which cost you only a few cents a day!

Why it builds up so quick

Scientists have discovered that hosts of people are thin and rundown simply because they do not get enough yeast vitamins (Vitamin B) and iron in their daily food. One of the richest sources of marvelous health-building Vitamin B is the special yeast used in making English ale, world-renowned for its medicinal properties.

Now by a new and costly process, perfected after long research, the vitamins from this imported English ale yeast are concentrated to 7 times their strength in ordinary yeast! This 7-power vitamin concentrate is then combined with three kinds of strength-building iron (organic, inorganic and hemoglobin iron). Pasteurized English ale yeast and other valuable tonic ingredients are then added. Finally, for your protection and benefit, every batch of Ironized Yeast is tested and retested biologically, to insure its full vitamin strength.

The result is these new easy-to-take but marvelously effective little Ironized Yeast tablets which have helped thousands of the skinniest, scrawniest people quickly to gain just the normally attractive curves, natural development and peppy health they longed for.

Make this money-back test

If, with the very first package of Ironized Yeast, you don't begin to eat better and get more enjoyment and benefit from your food—if you don't feel better, with more strength, pep and energy—if you are not convinced that Ironized Yeast will give you the pounds of normally attractive flesh you need—your money promptly refunded. So get Ironized Yeast today.

Special FREE offer!

To start thousands building up their health right away, we make this FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out seal on box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Ironized Yeast Co., Inc., Dept. 310, Atlanta, Ga.

WARNING: Beware of the many cheap substitutes for this successful formula. Be sure you get the genuine Ironized Yeast.

miles down the road to a farm and hid it under a hay-stack, with each of the other automobile keys hidden throughout the stack. Some fun, eh?

Maggie then returned to the scene of her crime as though nothing had, or could, happen. When dusk arrived, bringing quitting time around, butter would have melted in her mouth. The entire company formed a posse and the hunt was on, but to no avail. Locksmiths from a nearby town had to be called in to make keys, once the cars had been aired out. This all comes under the head of fun because Margaret in the end showed them the car she had hidden. And a lotta people think Maggie hasn't a sensayuma, can y'imagine?

Speaking of "So Red The Rose," Maggie wasn't the only member of the cast who seemed big for her age. In fact, Randolph Scott proved larger by several inches.

SEEMS there was a scene on the battlefield where Randy had gone to find Maggie's stricken brother. With the boy's body in his arms, he made for the little old wagon and the camera, for a close-up. Just as they walked into range for the shot, the corpse suddenly jumped. Even an actor like Harry Ellerbe can't remain dead when pinched while in a precarious position. Next time around, it was Harry's turn and the panic was on! However, the director's patience only lasted some six or seven pinches. Then the shot was made.

Another amusing situation occurs frequently around Santa Monica. Seems that out at one of the smarter clubs there appear a couple of male fashion plates, namely, Cary Grant and Randolph Scott, who give the customers a treat.

No sooner had Jean Parker finished "Life Begins With Love" than she darted eastward to break the good news to Hubby George MacDonald.

The crowd gapes while Charles Boyer and the Missus, Pat Paterson, step up to the box office and get their tickets for the preview of "The Life of Emile Zola." These happy-weds don't do much tooting about being an ideal Hollywood couple, but their actions seem to prove it.

Each Sunday noon they arrive, sartorially resplendent, and make their entrance. Just at the head of the stairs to the beach they pause, then proceed slowly to their destination. The outfits they wear, not of conservative ilk, recently just about got two youngsters down. The result was that everyone turned one bright sunny afternoon to see Messrs. Grant and Scott, but to their amazement, saw two young men making the entrance to end all entrances.

One was clad in soft slippers, loud-checked shorts, topped by a ridiculous polo sweater of the noisiest variety and a long plaid scarf tied around his neck. Perched at a cocky angle on his head was a rough knit skull cap with a pom-pom to finish it off. His running mate was attired in an equally racy outfit. Heavy brogues, fawn colored slacks, black shirt and a checked windbreaker that put the proverbial Solomon's coat to shame. The finishing touch to this little ensemble was a beret and an oversized handkerchief to brandish in the wind. Needless to say, everyone was in stitches, bursting with laughter, so that when our two actors arrived they found their show stolen.

In all fairness to these personalities we must admit that it would be a hard job to be natural, for in the picture business there is a belief among the head men that if an actor has no temperament he can't have much ability. This follows with the press agents who continually coin stuff that their players are supposed to do, for they must have color. Consequently once these people arrive, they have to make certain they will remain there. If it means putting on a show, they are all up and ready at any time of the day.

Now I'm sure you'll agree that, even if the stars wanted to act their age and be themselves, they couldn't and run the risk of being colorless and forgotten. So, they're taking no chances this season because "they won't be natural."

Manuel, the Lovable

executive, who clinched it. He told Tracy, "Unless you take the part, I won't make the picture."

So Tracy took it. And throughout the shooting of the picture, though he gave his best to it, remained unconvinced that his best was good enough. Time and again he said, "I wish they'd call it off."

Now he concedes, "Well, I got away with it. Want to know why? Because of Freddie, because of that kid's performance, because he sold it 98%. The kid had to believe in Manuel, or Manuel wasn't worth a quarter. The way he'd look at me, believe every word I said, made me believe in it myself. I've never said this before in my life and I'll never say it again. Freddie Bartholomew's acting is so fine and so simple and so true that it's way over people's heads. It'll only be by thinking back two years from now that they'll realize how great it was."

ON THE night of the Hollywood premiere, Tracy spoke to the radio audience. He said, "This is Freddie's night, and that's as it should be." Any of you who heard his voice, quiet with suppressed feeling, will know that he meant what he said.

He didn't think he could play Manuel. Those responsible thought that nobody else could. They must have had some basis for their belief that Tracy bore within himself certain qualities that would make him understand the character and portray it credibly. Manuel's essential traits were simplicity, honesty, and a core of sweetness under his rugged strength. Let me tell you a little about Tracy, and decide for yourselves why Sam Katz said: "If you don't play it, nobody will."

To know Tracy, you must know his background. He was born to parents in comfortable circumstances, the second of two sons. You have only to see his white-haired mother, with her soft voice and gentle ways, to know that he came not out of a house but from a home. She lives near him now. On the days when he can't drop in to see her, he telephones. At least once a week he takes her out to the Cocoanut Grove or the Trocadero, as much for the kick he gets out of it himself as for the pleasure it gives her.

He was a child of warm affections and a hasty temper, shy about displaying the former, quick to regret the latter.

In early times his allowance was five cents every other day. Sometimes he'd ask for a nickel on the off day.

"No, Son, you can't have one this morning. You had one yesterday."

Spencer would storm out, slamming the door. Five minutes later his mother would hear the door closing stealthily and small feet mounting the stairs to his room. Then her son would appear, mutter something about the book he'd forgotten, and kiss her good-by. A big seven-year-old, he couldn't of course let her know that it wasn't a book but her kiss he'd come back for.

He was always bringing young ruffians home with him. Occasionally his mother would protest. "Son, where did you ever get hold of that boy?"

Spencer would flare up. "Well, just because he's poor—"

"No, I don't mean that. But he doesn't look clean—"

"Well, maybe they don't have water where he lives. Say, Mother, can I give him one of my suits?"

MARY'S HAD A BABY

We speak so blithely about the beauty of Motherhood!

And so little about its pain—dismissing it almost casually as the good news is passed around among relatives and friends:

"Mary's had a baby!"

Of course, through the ages, women learned to endure silently, so we take their courage for granted. But, actually, there is no need for silence.

For, 61 years ago, a woman shattered this myth that her sex must suffer silently. She devoted her life to aiding the relief of their pain.*

Today, the name of Lydia Pinkham is blessed throughout the world. Mother tells daughter, friend tells friend, how, when the ordeal of motherhood approaches, it can usually be made easier with the use of Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Think what that signifies. If the burden of child-bearing can be eased, that often means a stronger, healthier mother. That, in turn, often means a sturdier, healthier baby.

Through the years we have received more than a million letters telling us of the aid that women have received through the use of the Compound. Young girls passing into womanhood, wives, mothers—they tell us of bitter suffering that has been relieved, of nervousness that has been soothed, and, as a result of this, of unhappy times that have been made normal once again.

Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound may help you also to go "smiling through." Try a bottle today.

*For three generations one woman has told another how to go "smiling through" with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It helps Nature tone up the system, thus lessening the discomforts† which must be endured, especially during

One woman tells another how to go "Smiling Through" with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

The Gary Coopers expect an addition to the hearthside this month. Meanwhile, we see them taking in "The Firefly" showing.

He got into the scrapes of all normal boys, blackened eyes and had his own blackened in return, ran away to come back with blistered feet and fling his arms penitently round his mother's neck, played hooky with Pat O'Brien, his friend then and now, and got the maid who adored him to write notes of excuse over his mother's name Still, cheating made him uneasy.

One morning his mother left Spencer at home with a playmate while she went to church. Returning, she found the fire engines at the door, quenching a merry blaze. "How did it happen, Spence?" Spence had no idea. Several months later he appeared before his mother, blue eyes clouded. "We had the story of George Washington in school today," he informed her, foot scuffing at the carpet. "He couldn't tell a lie, so I better tell you that we lit some papers in the cellar that morning just to watch them burn; then we got scared and ran away." Hearing that story, there flashed through my mind the memory of Manuel's shining eyes fixed on Harvey, as he told Long Jack who it was that had snarled his line.

It was a household ruled by love and peace. Mr. and Mrs. Tracy belonged to different churches, but respected each other's faith. Spencer served as an altar boy, and though he never talked about religion, even to his mother—still doesn't—on those days when he was due in church at nine, he was up and ready by seven.

They bought a car before they could well afford it, because "it will keep the boys with us," Mr. Tracy said. And if they passed five flat tires on the road and, having stopped to help four, drove past the fifth, an indignant Spencer would fume for the rest of the day about "that poor fellow we left in the lurch."

HE WAS studying medicine when the acting bug hit him. His father raised strenuous objections. His mother thought, "If that's what he wants to do, he ought to try it." So she made it possible for him. Thinking back, she smiles a little ruefully. "It's the only time I can ever remember Mr. Tracy being provoked with me." But it wasn't long before Mr. Tracy was convinced that Spencer had chosen wisely.

Later the family moved to New York. Mrs. Tracy was lonely at first for her friends in Milwaukee. "Aren't you?" she asked her husband.

"Well, no, Mother, I can't say that I am. I just walk down Fifth Avenue and look at those wonderful buildings and stop in at that beautiful cathedral, and—well, what is there to be lonesome about?" And again as I listened I was reminded of something—Manuel's face bent over his rielle, and his voice saying, "My fader, he feel beaudiful inside."

When Spencer was playing on Broadway, his father would meet him at the theatre every night. They'd have supper together and talk things over. Till Mr. Tracy fell ill. Then Spencer would stop in on his way home. "Well, Son, how did it go?" And Spencer would tell him. They knew how ill he was, but tried to keep it from him. He knew, and pretended not to, for his family's sake. He had his faith to sustain him. If he didn't believe in a fisherman's heaven, he did believe.

Then came the time when Spencer had to leave for the theatre, not knowing whether his father would be there on his return. And one night he was gone.

His father's memory is as dear to him as ever the old fisherman's was to Manuel, though being the child of a more complex race, he is less articulate about what he feels. Under any circumstances, Tracy is a pushover for an outstretched palm. To such a degree that Carroll, his brother and manager, must keep check on him.

Recently, a petitioner appeared who said he'd worked for Mr. Tracy in Milwaukee. "The man's a phoney," Carroll protested. "I've investigated. He never worked for Father in his life."

Spencer turned stubborn. "Well, maybe there's just a chance he did. And if there's any chance, I want to give him something for Father's sake."

The Tracy home in San Fernando Valley has that same livable quality which you know his childhood home must have had. A low, rambling house, set back from the road, with gardens in front and orchards behind, it's the kind of place you pass and wish you belonged to. Half a dozen red setters try to clamber 'round your shoulders in welcome as you walk up the drive. The front door opens on a huge living-room—not the interior-decorated home of a star—but a living-room in the real sense of the word. Simple rugs that won't be bothered by dirt, cretonne-covered sofas and a squashy yellow chair made for lounging, an immense fireplace, at one end a piano and bookshelves, at the other a refectory table with chairs to match, for this is the dining-room, too—brass and copper and Delft chinaware gleaming from a Welsh dresser and mantel; photographs of the children—John, redheaded and a mass of freckles like his father at the same age, a blonde little girl with mischievous eyes, named Louise for her mother, but called Susy; and a photograph of Freddie Bartholomew, too, in the oilskins of "Captains Courageous."

THE MASTER of the house, hair rumpled and overalls dirt-streaked, has just left for the stables. He thinks it's a treat when he has time to wash the dogs and groom the horses he loves. Not long ago one of his mares bore a colt. Tracy took it hard. A dozen times he ran from the stables to the house, streaming with perspiration, to phone a friend experienced in such matters. "She's just so far," he'd pant, describing in detail the mother's symptoms. "What'll I do now?"

First Joan was laid up with a wrenched shoulder, then Dick was in the hospital. But now all's well on the Blondell-Powell domestic front.

"Calm down," his friend finally advised him. "Who's having this baby anyhow, you or the horse?"

Chestnut-haired Mrs. Tracy has the charm of simplicity and intelligence and the same dislike of pretentiousness which marks her husband. Anything that smacks of showing off makes them both wince. At the breakfast table one morning, five-year-old Susy took a notion to go smart-aleck. "I know what Daddy has," she chanted, pointing. "Daddy has a cantaloupe, Daddy has a cantaloupe."

Daddy eyed her gravely. "I suppose you want to be an actress when you grow up?"

"Yes," she agreed, enchanted.

"Well, then, suppose we leave that kind of talk till we're on the stage."

Only for a moment was Susy nonplussed. Then she proved she could take it. "O.K., Daddy," she said. "I think I get you." And a moment later, a very demure, good girl: "Do you like your cantaloupe, Daddy?"

The children are the heart of the house. What both parents have suffered because twelve-year-old John is deaf and because his leg has been affected by infantile paralysis, can be left to the imagination. They have been deeply distressed by a story which has got about to the effect that John has regained his hearing—distressed not for their own sakes, but for the false hopes it has stirred in others. Letters have come pouring in by the hundreds, begging for advice and information. Mrs. Tracy has tried to answer them all herself, but the task is beginning to overpower her.

What actually happened was this. They had believed John to be stone deaf, but an audiometer test some time ago revealed that, with the use of the machine, he had a very slight degree of hearing—fifteen per cent in each ear. The discovery so excited the child himself that at a birthday party a few days later he cried to the other children, "I can hear." So the story went abroad. Fifteen per cent of hearing is better than none, yet has little practical value, and both Tracy and his wife would like to have it known that no miracle has been worked upon their son.

THEY have schooled themselves to face the fact and, through every channel open to them, to make the boy compensate in other ways, training him toward useful manhood. One thing they are brave and wise enough not to do—foster in him any sense of self-pity. Luckily, he has a naturally happy temperament. Sometimes, however, he loses patience with himself, crying as if it were his own fault, "I can't hear, I can't run, I'm very terrible."

However their own hearts may be wrung, they betray no sign of it to John. They point out to him instead that everyone can't do everything. "You're a better swimmer than any of your friends," they remind him. "You ride beautifully and play polo with Father, and have your own horse. Nobody else you know has a horse." John's face brightens. He knows these things are true—they're not saying it just to make him feel better, and presently he's his own sunny self again.

He has his dreams, however, which include another world. And though he's a sensitive child like his father before him, the thought of death holds no terrors for him.

"You just go like this," he says, closing his eyes, "and then you wake up and you're in another world, and everything you don't have here you'll have there. I'll hear, and my leg will be fine, and I'll be very happy, and everyone will be very happy."

As comforting as a fisherman's heaven. What Tracy believes about that other world he keeps to himself, though he remains staunch in his father's faith. On Manuel's creed he allowed himself just one comment. "It's the thing everybody'd like to believe. To think you had the courage to kick off like Manuel with a smile on your face and the thought that you were going fishing with your dad—not bad, that," he smiled.

Manuel's essential traits were simplicity, honesty and a core of sweetness under his rugged strength. What Tracy's are, you'll have to gather for yourselves.

wears a gold chain about his neck, etc. But, he says, he has no superstitions! He dislikes spiders, alarm clocks, but craves thunder storms and the sound of wind and rain. Old nature making whoopee is like tom-toms beating on his heart. He likes red meat and cooks it himself. Doesn't diet, and keeps fit by breathing through his nose. Swims, rides, plays tennis and is a champion boxer.

He's six feet tall, weighs 180 pounds and was born in the north of Ireland June 20, 1909. Went to Lycee Louise le Grand in Paris and St. Paul's School in London. His father was professor of biology at Queen's University and Cambridge. He's a direct descendant of Fletcher Christian, leader of the famous mutiny on the Bounty.

By the way, his first part in an English film was in "Mutiny on the Bounty." Later he played on the English stage in "A Man's House," "Othello," "Another Language," and "The Constant Nymph." Also in stock companies in what the British call the provinces (one-night stands in American jargon).

Then the movie bug bit him again. Hollywood beckoned and this boy dashed there without any quibbling. On the boat over, he met perhaps his biggest and most baffling adventure to date, Lili Damita. This couple have been reported about to split up more often than any other pair in movie circles, but both deny the rumors and continue their long-distance marriage arrangement.

You'll see him soon, if he can stay put long enough to finish his latest movie, in "The Perfect Specimen."

ROBERT TAYLOR (Last printed June, 1937. Total number of requests since then 613.) Well, fans, that Taylor man's here again! His Barometer rating indicates he's simply got to have his past reviewed once more in these columns. By this time you should certainly know the bare facts of his young life, but to please our many readers, we'll go over them briefly. Filley, Nebraska, was his birthplace, and the grand event took place Aug. 5, 1911, at five o'clock in the morning. 'Tis said infants born in the wee hours aren't inclined to be as husky as those born, say, around noon, but Bob makes this theory sound a bit cockeyed. His real name is S. Arlington Brugh, or did you know that? He changed it to a snappier one for good and sufficient reasons, all spelling those magic words, Box Office.

As a youngster he enjoyed his own company, as most kids with imagination seem to. But he wasn't the bookish sort. Baseball and horseback riding were tops with him. He also went in for tennis, and later won some fancy champ cups. Now he plays some pretty swell sets at the Beverly Hills Tennis Club, with lots of women admiring his game—and complexion (the finest in all of Cinematown). Back in his childhood, somewhere, he also picked up piano and 'cello playing, and these accomplishments have stuck with him, too.

In school, he showed a flair for oratory, but even when he got as far as Doane College, didn't have the yen to act. In this, he was a very unique young man. His interest in dramatics was confined to arranging trips for the dramatic troupes of his school.

DAVOL

Maybe it was because Pomona College, his next move toward the higher education, was only an hour's ride from Hollywood, that he decided finally to be a movie actor. Maybe the girls, who've always had their eyes peeled on this handsome guy, even when he was trying to concentrate on trigonometry, whispered sweet nothings into his ear, and more than hinted that he'd give quite a lift to that sleepy little Hollywood town, if he took it into his head to raid it.

Anyway, he appeared in a school rendition of the play, "Journey's End," and with miraculous luck, was at once spotted by a casting agent from, you've guessed where, Hollywood. But once under a puny weekly salary he became that lowest form of acting life, a "testing horse." Whenever an actress was wanted for a part, Bob took a test with her. She got the part; Bob got another test. He wasn't so sure about his movie future in those not-so-long-ago days, for he kept right on with his studies at Pomona all the while, and graduated, specializing in philosophy. He needed plenty of that.

After weary months, there came the dawn, however, and Taylor landed in the "Crime Doesn't Pay" series and proved to his bosses that he, at least, did. His brawny charm has since been in constant demand, and with his success in "Camille" and "Broadway Melody of '38," he's tucked his philosophy books into the farthest corner of his library and doesn't even bother to take them out when company comes.

His mother says he's not as much of a hand with the ladies as you'd think; that he's very shy in their company. She expects him to marry a girl who's musical 'cause Bob's got rhythm. And a girl who's home loving and well educated. And a girl who's a small brunette. Ho, hum. At the present writing, Taylor's still the constant flame of the flaming Barbara Stanwyck. And she's not a small brunette!

FERNAND GRAVET (First printing. Total number of requests 464.) Here's one actor who had to be pleaded with to go to Hollywood. This slim, black-haired young man with a profile like the Duke of Windsor's, was already a top-notcher in European studios, where he'd made twenty-four pictures in French, German and English, when highly lucrative offers from the American gold coast began pouring in on him. He ignored 'em all at first. The reason? Was afraid of being typed in nondescript roles. But Mervyn Leroy, who had seen some of Gravet's interesting portrayals in Europe, must have been even stronger minded than Fernand. He conferred with him for four hours in Paris and continued to sales talk him by telephone as he sped from Paris to Cannes. Finally a contract was drawn up with the result that you saw him in his first American picture, "The King and the Chorus Girl," under the personal supervision of Leroy.

Money has never counted much with the temperamental Continental. He has always shown an idealistic strain in his makeup. Once when he was under contract to UFA, the leading lady took seriously ill. This meant that the picture on which they were both working would be held up for at least two months. Gravet's contract gave him every right to demand a steady salary during this period, but instead, he bowled over his employers by offering to waive his salary and accept only his living expenses, so that he could be an assistant cameraman for one month and a film cutter for the second month. He explained that he wanted to learn about pictures from every angle.

Born on Christmas morning, 1908, in Belgium, he toured all over Europe with his parents, both of whom were of the theatrical world. In 1914, the German armies swept through Brussels, his birthplace, marooning him, his parents and his sister. An elder brother, Maurice, then in France, became a soldier in the French army. Gravet's father managed to obtain a passport so that they could reach Holland and then England. There Fernand entered St. Paul's School, later becoming a British Marine cadet and spending ten months

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

learning the ways of the sea.

But the theatre was in his blood, and it was natural that during the post-war years, he turned to the stage. Natural, too, that he made an instant hit with the public, as his father had done before him.

His father died while making his final appearance in "Romance" with Doris Keane. It was in this same production that the youthful Fernand was introduced to Paris. During the next three years, he married the golden-haired Parisian star, Jane Renouardt. And after all this time, they're still that way about each other. You'll see this charming gent in "Food for Scandal" next.

★★★ The Singing Marine

Pleasant, but not startlingly original, is this new Warner musical, featuring Dick Powell and the U. S. Marines. Mr. Powell, whose screen career has taken him profitably through West Point and Annapolis, now extends his activities into another branch of government service. If ever a war breaks out, it would seem logical from a standpoint of experience alone that he be given command of all our country's armed forces—and let who will write its songs, as the saying goes.

Story concerns a bashful marine who goes on parties with his pals because his singing voice helps get their girls into a romantic mood. Our hero is placed on an amateur radio program, and his adventures begin.

Several singable tunes are featured in the proceedings, notably "The Girl Who Couldn't Be Kissed" and "Night Over Shanghai." Dick Powell's performance is smooth and effective, even though the picture around him doesn't offer the type of support to which he has become accustomed. Best in the supporting cast is Hugh Herbert, as a radio impresario. Other good performances are furnished by Lee Dixon, Allen Jenkins and Powell's new leading lady, Doris Weston. Directed by Ray Enright.—Warner Bros.

★★★ Saratoga

Jean Harlow's last picture can be classed among her best. Her performance, full of the vital and particular charm that was hers, will stand as a monument to her career. "Saratoga" is fast-moving, hard-boiled comedy, and the excellence of Miss Harlow's work in it, in spite of its hilarity, serves to accentuate the tragedy of her passing. She leaves a niche in screen entertainment which can never be filled.

"Saratoga" is a story of a racing family somewhat down on its luck, a tough bookmaker, and a wealthy sportsman. The daughter of the house (Jean Harlow) is engaged to marry the wealthy chap (Walter Pidgeon) until her meeting with the bookie (Clark Gable) changes her plans. On this framework is built a rip-snorting comedy which will please all audiences, with the possible exception of morbid curiosity seekers.

Paralleling Jean Harlow's splendid performance is Clark Gable's portrayal of the bookmaker. It is the "hard guy" type of role at which Gable excels. Walter Pidgeon is capable as Miss Harlow's fiance, and the supporting cast, headed by Lionel Barrymore, Una Merkel and Frank Morgan, is swell. Also recommended is a song, "The Horse With the Dreamy Eyes." Directed by Jack Conway.—M-G-M.

★★ Easy Living

Here is a good picture which should have been a swell one. Its main assets are Jean Arthur and a sparkling script. This is probably Miss Arthur's finest performance, and she's given ample opportunity to demonstrate her delightful flair for light comedy.

Story is patterned on the current vogue for goofy farce. Everything gets under way when a banker (Edward Arnold), angered by his wife's purchase of an expensive sable coat, tosses the garment out the window. It lands smack in the lap of Miss Arthur, and when she tries to return it, Mr. A. takes her out and buys her a hat to match. This information gets to a scheming hotel owner, who immediately sets Miss Arthur up in a de luxe suite, hoping by this process to blackmail her new-found friend. The hotel suite, incidentally, is the last word in ultra-swank, and features a bath tub even beyond the wildest dreams of Cecil B. DeMille.

A swell comedy idea is dampened by the ardor of Director Mitchell Leisen, who allows a number of the scenes to go slapstick. Had Mr. Leisen relaxed, "Easy Living" might well have been up at the head of its class. Edward Arnold is satisfactory, but not outstanding, as the blustering banker, and Ray Milland is effective as his son. Luis Alberni is guilty of too much overacting. The picture, of course, belongs entirely to Jean Arthur, with credit for able assistance to Preston Sturges for his well-written script.—Paramount.

★ One Mile From Heaven

One of its studio's minor excursions into the field of melodrama, this proves to be about the same distance from first-rate entertainment. The picture stars Claire Trevor as a girl reporter, and divides its time between her victories over rival men reporters and the finding of the parents of a white child "mothered" by a colored seamstress in Harlem. The Harlem interludes in the film are its high points, for they afford Bill Robinson, playing a dusky policeman, several chances to exhibit his famed tap dancing. It might be said that Mr. Robinson dances away with the picture, although acting honors go to Fredi Washington, in the role of the seamstress. Miss Washington, who looks amazingly like Sylvia Sidney, is a beautiful and accomplished actress.

Claire Trevor does well with her reporter role, especially in the comedy sequences. Rival reporters are played by Chick Chandler, Ray Walker and Russell Hopton. Sally Blane and John Eldredge are seen briefly as the child's parents, and Ralf Harolde is effective as the villain. "One Mile From Heaven" was obviously made for the double-feature trade. Directed by Allan Dwan.—20th Century Fox.

★★ Wild and Woolly

The adjectives in the title role belong, of course, to Jane Withers, the only gal on the lot who could rightfully claim them as her own. And Jane lives right up to that old reputation, even outdoing it in a few instances in this picture. In short, this is her best job to date, because an astute director has seen to it that Jane's repertoire of tricks is not too obviously cute, so she emerges a likable, if roisterous, youngster. Her antics are staged against a small-town background with believable Western flavor.

The supporting cast leaves little to be desired. Chief among them are Walter Brennan as Jane's grandfather, Berton

Churchill as the inexpressibly stuffy leading citizen of the town, Jackie Searle, his son and a chip off the old block, and "Alfalfa" Switzer, late of "Our Gang" and Jane's chief side-kick. There's a thread of romance carried out with just the right touch of sentimentality by Pauline Moore, the school marm, and Robert Bailey, a shining example of upright, ambitious American manhood. There are some meanies, of course, to pep things up, and these characters are ably and menacingly realized by Douglas Fowley, Lon Chaney, Jr. and Syd Saylor. If you like a good homespun tale for a change, you'll not go wrong on this picture. Directed by Alfred Werker.—20th Century-Fox.

★ On Again—Off Again

Those hardy perennials, Wheeler and Woolsey, are back again, and their new venture should provide many merry moments for their loyal followers. This time the pair has been handed a script which is slightly superior to the sort of thing they've been getting lately, and the boys proceed to make the most of it. While many of their gags are as ancient as expected, some of them have been dressed up in newer garb and the final result is more satisfying than the average run of Wheeler-Woolsey comedies. Their slapstick is less broad and their sets look more expensive than usual, all of which makes their antics less painful to those in the audience who aren't wildly enthusiastic about them.

Story concerns a couple of battling business partners who decide to settle their grudge with a wrestling match, the loser to turn over the business to the other for a year, in addition to acting as his butler. Wheeler loses, and the rest of the picture is devoted to the paying off of the bet.

Besides the two principals, there are agreeable performances by Marjorie Lord, Esther Muir, Patricia Wilder and Russell Hicks. Directed by Eddie Cline.—RKO-Radio.

★ She's No Lady

Cops-and-robbers comedy melodrama, "She's No Lady" suffers from trite handling by director, players and scenarists. What emerges is decidedly minor entertainment, something you can see and forget almost at the same time.

Ann Dvorak lines herself up with a gang of thieves who plan a jewel robbery at the swank home of Aileen Pringle. She goes to the party with a man whom she has just met (John Trent), and after she grabs the jools, her companion whips out a revolver and takes them from her. From there on it turns out that everyone concerned with the party is after them there diamonds, and at the end of the general mêlée everyone but Miss Dvorak and Mr. Trent are tossed into jail. You see, they weren't really crooks at all, just insurance investigators out after the real thieves. Since they're the only members of the cast not behind bars, they get married.

The performances of the two leads are disappointing, neither of them doing well with their supposedly sophisticated roles. Aileen Pringle is acceptable as the owner of the jewels, and there are good comedy performances by Guinn Williams and Harry Beresford. Directed by Charles Vidor.—Paramount.

★★ Confession

"Confession" is listed as Kay Francis' latest vehicle, but it is not the star who contributes the picture's better moments. Such moments are in the capable hands of Basil Rathbone and young Jane Bryan. As the heavy of the piece, Rathbone is at his suave best, and Jane Bryan, as a young musician infatuated by his charm, plays one of the season's finest ingenue roles. The early part of the film, which follows the romance between the worldly composer (Rathbone) and the young girl, is excellent drama, beautifully directed by the European, Joe May. It is when Miss Francis arrives on the screen, in a blond wig and singing at a honky-tonk cafe, that the drama's pace slackens and eventually loses the advantage of its fine beginning.

Climax of the picture is a court-room scene, with Kay Francis on trial for the murder of Rathbone. In a series of flashbacks she is allowed to tell her life story, as well as parade a series of Orry-Kelly's gowns.

Ian Hunter ably fills a small and thankless role as Miss Francis' husband, and there are other good performances by Dorothy Peterson, Mary Maguire, Donald Crisp and Robert Barrat. But the picture belongs to Mr. Rathbone and Miss Bryan. —Warner Bros.

★ London by Night

All London, according to this film, is up in arms searching for a mysterious murderer who is given to carrying an umbrella. Since carrying an umbrella is an exceedingly practical hobby in fog-bound London, you can readily see what Scotland Yard, as well as George Murphy and sundry other characters, are up against.

"London by Night" is a routine, and, for the most part, dull mystery drama due to the fact that its story contains nothing new. The script is so painstakingly unoriginal, for instance, that most audiences will have the finger on the real villain long before Reporter George Murphy reveals

Yes, Constipation Is Serious, But It Can't Poison You!

SAY DOCTORS

Modern doctors now say that the old idea of poisons getting into your blood from constipation is BUNK. They claim that constipation swells up the bowels causing pressure on nerves in the digestive tract. This nerve pressure is what causes frequent bilious spells, dizziness, headaches, upset stomach, dull, tired-out feeling, sleepless nights, coated tongue, bad taste and loss of appetite.

Don't suffer hours or even days longer than necessary. You must GET THAT PRESSURE OFF THE NERVES TO GET RELIEF. Flush the intestinal system. When offending wastes are gone the bowels return to normal size and nerve pressure STOPS. Almost at once you feel marvelously refreshed, blues vanish, and life looks bright again.

That is why so many doctors are now insisting on gentle but QUICK ACTION. That is why YOU should insist on Adlerika. This efficient intestinal evacuant contains SEVEN carminative and cathartic ingredients. It acts on the stomach, as well as the entire intestinal tract. It relieves stomach GAS at once and often removes bowel congestion in half an hour. No violent action, no after effects, just QUICK results. Recommended by many doctors and druggists for 35 years.

the culprit's identity to Scotland Yard. And that sort of thing, it must be admitted, makes a murder mystery pretty weak.

George Murphy is acceptable as the romantic lead, and a newcomer, Rita Johnson, shows real possibilities. Leo G. Carroll is fine as the villain, and there are good minor parts by Virginia Field, Montagu Love, George Zucco, Eddie Quillan and Corky. The last-named is a dog. Directed by William Thiele.—M-G-M.

★ The Big Shot

A mildly diverting gangster comedy. "The Big Shot" will find its most receptive audiences among the family trade. The basic idea is amusing, and had the screen play lived up to it the result would have been a highly pleasing and considerably more humorous picture. Plot concerns a small-town veterinarian (Guy Kibbee) who inherits a fortune from an uncle in the big city. The country doctor moves to the big town to take over the uncle's business, but he doesn't learn until later that his lamented relative had been a big-shot racketeer. Members of the gang make the innocent vet the nominal head of their mob, and their victim spends a goodly portion of the uncle's estate in a campaign to stamp out vice. The amusing twist is that his crusade is aimed against himself.

Highlight of the picture is a coming-out party for the doctor's daughter attended by an exclusive set of gangsters and their molls. Guy Kibbee is his customary self, and Dorothy Moore, as the daughter, is a newcomer with promise. Cora Witherspoon, as the newly-rich wife, is guilty of over acting. Directed by Edward Killy.—RKO-Radio.

★ Super Sleuth

The movies kid the movies in this one, but they're so self-conscious about it that what was intended to be an hilarious farce emerges as something considerably less than that. Comedy centers around Jack Oakie, a screen detective so impressed by his cinema sleuthing that he is given to hurling insults at the police in his off-

Many Never Suspect Cause Of Backaches

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking the excess acids and waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

Frequent or scanty passages with smarting and burning shows there may be something wrong with your kidneys or bladder.

An excess of acids or poisons in your blood, when due to functional kidney disorders, may be the cause of nagging backache, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from your blood. Get Doan's Pills.

screen moments. This practice is deeply resented by the uniformed minions of the law, so when Mr. Oakie is confronted by a series of threatening letters, there is great competition between him and the police to be first to apprehend their sender, especially after the mysterious gent has murdered a man with a bullet intended for Oakie. Vastly concerned in the proceedings is Ann Sothern, studio publicity gal, who tries valiantly to keep her eccentric charge out of the public prints.

The villain, played by Eduardo Ciannelli, is much too sinister for purposes of comedy, all of which serves to spoil the denouement. Edgar Kennedy is amusing as a detective, and Joan Woodbury and Paul Guilfoyle help out in supporting roles. Ann Sothern is attractive and capable in the feminine lead, and Jack Oakie, who used to be funnier before his income went to his waistline, is mildly amusing as the dumb hero. Directed by Ben Stoloff.—RKO-Radio.

★ Hot Water

If you like your movies served up family style, this is your dish. All the Jones family are back again—Papa Jed Prouty, Mama Spring Byington, Grammaw Florence Roberts, the children and all their tricks. In fact, we could say that if you've seen one of these family flickers, you've seen them all. But in all justification we should have to add that box receipts on past Jones Families have proved that many people have the Jones Family habit—due, no doubt, to the fact that they are such true picturizations of the average American home life. Of course, the family is always getting into "hot water," and this particular time it's because of Papa Prouty's political aspirations. Most ardent worker in his campaign is George Ernest, who thoroughly annoys everyone as usual, but proves again that he has a monopoly on all the Jones brain power.

Then there's June Carlson again furnishing some good laughs with her love of the "drahma," Billy Mahan still out for ice-cream cone bribes and Shirley Deane and Kenneth Howell to add some romatic interest. Plot and production are of relative unimportance in these pictures, compared to the true-to-life characterizations of the cast, which could hardly be improved upon in any case. Directed by Frank Strayer.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ King Solomon's Mines

With the rumble of tom-toms and the overpowering voice of Paul Robeson and, it must be confessed, little else, this British offering comes to America. The action takes place in a kingkongish atmosphere which suggests that the title be changed to "It Can't Happen Anywhere" and gives you a fair idea of what the fourth dimension might be like.

A screwy Irishman (Arthur Sinclair) and his pretty daughter (Anna Lee), equipped with nothing beyond a shamrock each, decide to trek across the desert in search of the fabled mines of King Solomon, reputed to be somewhere near dead center of darkest Africa. Anna's good looks help enlist the aid of a British hunter (Sir Cedric Hardwicke), a retired naval captain (Roland Young) and a titled young heart-breaker (John Loder). The vicinity of the mines is inhabited by a tough crowd of savages who decide to do a job on our valiant group and its native guide, Paul Robeson. Just as the Britons are about to have their eyes gouged out and splinters stuck up their finger nails, there's an eclipse (stop us if you've heard this one), and the blacks, thinking the whites have turned off the sun, forget about their little killing party and let them into the mines. No sooner do they make their triumphal entry than a volcanic eruption traps them in a cave. Of course, you don't worry very much, because you know that faithful Robeson is hard at work on the outside. Sho' nuff, he pushes aside several tons of rock (he was captain of the Rutgers football team, you know), and Anna and the boys escape with enough diamonds to balance the budget.

The singing of Paul Robeson and the savage antics of the natives carry the picture. The rest of the cast is not at its best—for which the poor scenario is entirely to blame. Directed by Robert Stevenson.—GB.

making rapid strides in her histrionics as well as in her vocal work. In the male lead is Don Ameche, who does a first-rate job in spite of the fact that the make-up department did strange things with his eyebrows. Also present are the Ritz Brothers, and what can you say about that dizzy trio except that they're very funny? Well, they're very funny. Gypsy Rose Lee, whom the studio prefers to call Louise Hovick, makes her screen debut as the villainess. Miss Hovick didn't seem a bit embarrassed at having to wear clothes, and carried off her role with high humor. Then there is Rubinoff and his ever-present violin, Louis Prima with his trumpet and his band, and Tip, Tap and Toe, all of whom furnished swell musical moments. Directed by Norman Taurog.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ High, Wide and Handsome

This can be set down as the year's most puzzling picture. Listed as a musical, it contains bits of everything, from industrial drama to downright melodrama. It starts out as a comedy, with Irene Dunne, of all people, dancing in a medicine show. From there it goes to straight drama of the Pennsylvania oil fields, and reaches its climax in a mob fight scene that is as exciting as it is fantastic.

When Irene Dunne marries Randolph Scott she discovers herself playing second fiddle to his work. He's busy organizing his farmer friends in a fight against the railroads, who are charging excessive rates for hauling the farmers' oil to the refinery. The farmers decide to build a pipe line, and the rest of the picture is concerned with their fight, against numerous odds, to run the pipe to the refinery within the contracted time.

Irene Dunne is not at her best when she's called upon to sing, but she handles her acting assignment ably. Randolph Scott turns in one of his best performances as the young farmer, and Dorothy Lamour is good as a purveyor of torch ballads. Other good performances are supplied by Akim Tamiroff, Charles Bickford, Elizabeth Patterson, Ben Blue and Raymond Walburn. Jerome Kern's score contains no outstanding numbers. Directed by Rouben Mamoulian.—Paramount.

★★ Exclusive

An exciting and, at times, superior newspaper film, "Exclusive" will please some audiences and prove highly aggravating to others.

Story concerns the battle of a respectable newspaper with a yellow journal, owned by the king of the city's racketeers. Charlie Ruggles and Fred MacMurray, reporter and city editor of the decent sheet, find themselves in a heated rivalry with Frances Farmer, star reporter for the gangster's paper. The fact that Miss Farmer is Ruggles' daughter and MacMurray's fiancee complicates the situation and serves to weaken the picture, for the character she plays will be difficult for most audiences to comprehend. Miss Farmer furnishes most of the picture's most glaring inconsistencies, for instance, when, for $200 she double-crosses her father and her fiance to sell some information to the gangster chief.

Despite her role, Frances Farmer does a first-rate job which should entitle her to better things from the powers-that-be in the future. Fred MacMurray gives an honest portrayal of the city editor, and Charlie Ruggles, in his first serious role, almost steals the picture. Best in the supporting cast are Lloyd Nolan, Ralph Morgan and Fay Holden. Directed by Al Hall.—Paramount.

THE WISE vs. THE FOOLISH WEEK-ENDERS

. . . proving that it's smart and economical to "GO NEW HAVEN" to New England

1. "How foolish of Marge and Bill to insist on driving, instead of having a leisurely breakfast with us . . . and going by train later. They probably started at dawn."

2. "Just look at that traffic tie-up! Thank goodness we had sense enough to come this way. We'll be there long before our 'speed demon' friends."

3. "Hello, there! No, Marge and Bill are driving . . . They'll be along later. But what a grand trip we had! And so inexpensive! These new streamlined day coaches are marvelous."

4. "So here you are at last! Why, we've already had luncheon and played a couple of sets. Take a tip from us . . . 'go New Haven' next time!"

- A week-end gives you just so many hours. Make the most of every one! Don't waste time and energy—travel the quick, easy, safe and inexpensive way. Travel in big, cool, comfortable New Haven coaches—at 2¢ a mile!

says: "Luckies are gentle on my throat"

"The rôle of LIEUT. PINKERTON in 'Madame Butterfly' is the only part in opera where the tenor smokes a cigarette on the stage. As I sing the aria, 'Amore O Grillo', I smoke—and it's always a Lucky. You see, I discovered long ago that Luckies are a light smoke—gentle on my throat—and my throat is naturally my first concern. I have smoked about a pack of Luckies a day ever since 1920."

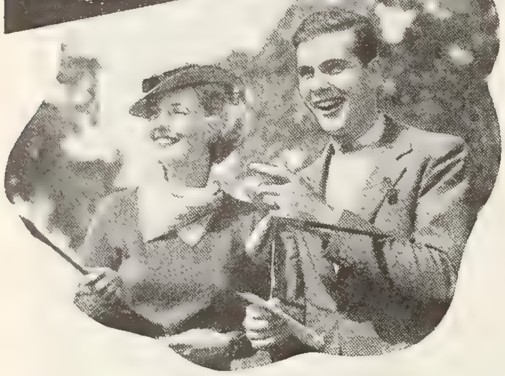
TWO SIDES OF A GIRL'S LIFE!

ANOTHER DAY SPOILED by that dull, worn-out, headachy feeling that so often means constipation. A familiar experience to most all of us, but read...

HOW A NEW IDEA MADE LIFE SO DIFFERENT



It was a new idea to her—tasteless medicine in delicious chewing gum—but an idea that 16 million people had already tried and found ideal. Perhaps you, too, feel mean, miserable, out-of-kilter right now because of constipation. Then try FEEN-A-MINT, the delicious, scientific chewing gum laxative. Try it and learn for yourself that no other type of laxative can do exactly what FEEN-A-MINT does. FEEN-A-MINT rates 3 stars for 3 special benefits:

1. NO STOMACH UPSET—With FEEN-A-MINT you don't swallow a heavy, bulky dose; there is nothing to further burden an already over-burdened digestion.
2. CHEWING AIDS DIGESTION—The chewing stimulates the flow of the same natural alkaline fluids that help food digest.
3. ACTS WHERE YOU NEED IT—FEEN-A-MINT's tasteless laxative ingredient does nothing in the stomach. It passes to the intestine and does its work just where you want it to—easily, pleasantly, comfortably.

FEEN-A-MINT won't gripe, nauseate, or disturb sleep. Find the joy of this amazing 3-star relief yourself. Get economical FEEN-A-MINT today. It's right for all the family and tastes like your favorite chewing gum. At your druggists, or write for generous FREE sample package. Dept. 61, FEEN-A-MINT, Newark, N. J.

Hello Helen Darling,

Naturally we have seen all the big shows, but believe it or not, th best show of all was the moving picture — "High, Wide and Handsome" Jack had to pay two dollars apiece for the tickets, but they were worth it It has the most wonderful music by Kern and Hammerstein who wrote the music for "Show-Boat" You've probably heard the tunes on the radio - "Can I forget you" and the "Folks who live on the Hill" The romance is absolutely thrilling

Today, I'm going shopping and Jack is going up to see a ball game

Best to everybody

Turn to our Scoreboard when you're in doubt about what movie to see. It's a valuable guide in choosing entertainment. Instead of giving the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that only Modern Screen ratings are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

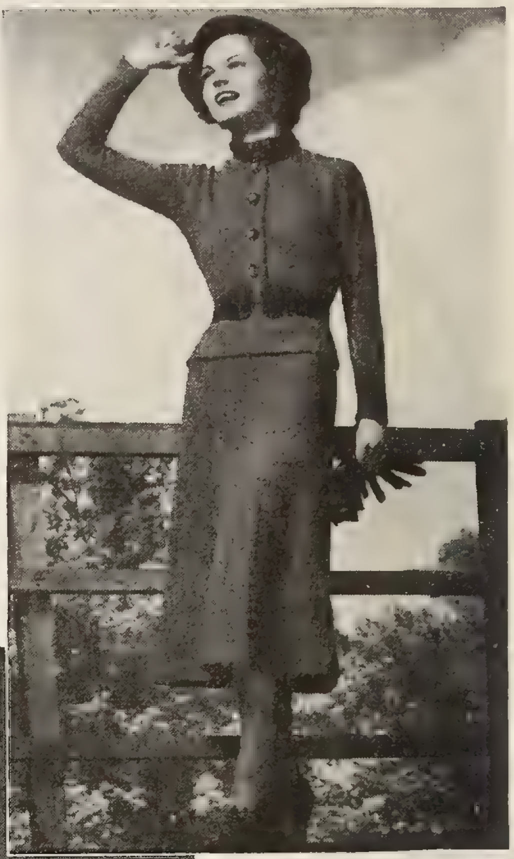
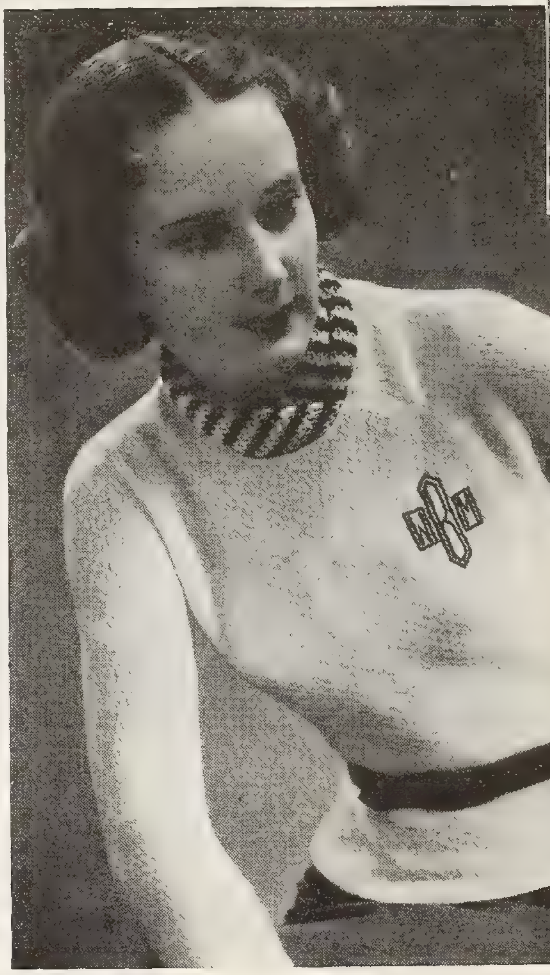
KNITTED NIFTIES

Tend to your knitting if you'd be smart this season

BM-5006—This two-piece tailored frock may look hard to make, but you'll be surprised how simple the directions are, and how quickly the outfit will work up.





BM-5001—Knit yourself a white slip-on sweater and be ready for anything on that week-end in the country. The contrasting scarf is knitted too and the monogram is worked in wool.

THERE IS nothing to compare with the confidence that being smartly dressed inspires and you can rest assured that you'll be in the height of fashion, wearing either one of these new knit fashions. The two-piece dress displays the slim silhouette demanded this season, and is fashioned of majolica rose bolera crepe, with buttons, scarf and wide leather belt of navy blue. You'll love it these first crisp days.

For sports wear or a day in the country, nothing could be smarter than the hand-knit white sweater of saxony yarn, worn with a blue and white crocheted scarf and a matching suede belt. The monogram, embroidered in matching navy blue yarn, adds an individual touch. Send for full knitting instructions today. They're absolutely free.

Golden Cleansing Cream
(CONTAINING COLLOIDAL GOLD)

See how your skin responds to the invigorating action of this new cream [it contains colloidal gold!]

Beauty authorities agree that the most important step in the care of your complexion is thorough cleansing. It's a simple step, too, since Daggett & Ramsdell created Golden Cleansing Cream.

For this new cream contains colloidal gold . . . a substance with a remarkable power for toning and invigorating the skin. You can't see or feel this colloidal gold, any more than you can see or feel the iron in spinach. Yet its penetrating action not only makes Golden Cleansing Cream a more efficient cleanser . . . but aids in keeping the complexion clear and youthful.

Try Golden Cleansing Cream tonight. See how fresh and vitally alive it leaves your skin. At leading drug and department stores—$1.00.

INFORMATION DESK

REQUESTS

Starting with the December issue of MODERN SCREEN, we will answer the fans' questions about players and movies directly in these columns—selecting from our monthly mail-bag a cross section of the most interesting and topical questions received from you. By interesting, we mean, letters of general interest to a majority of our readers. By topical, questions uppermost in the minds of a majority of our readers at the moment. Ask as many questions as you like, but try to keep them brief. Then watch Our Mail Box section of the Information Desk, and see if your letter bats a home run.

ALICE FAYE (last printed Dec. 1936. Total number of requests since then 426.) This little girl's gone to town by going natural in several pictures of late. Now it looks as if she's set to stay there for quite some time. Something was very wrong with the Faye movie career not long ago, and nobody knew this better than Alice. She consulted numerous fortune tellers about leaving the screen an' marrying an' raising a family, but they told her it just wasn't in her cards yet. So what to do, what to do? Alice changed her haircomb and the shape of her eyebrows, growing more and more exotic and more and more restless. Even her elusive romance with Tony Martin wasn't stimulating enough to keep her from having a bad case of the doldrums.

She was very definitely tired of it all when she got her part in "On the Avenue." Tired of being hey-hey, tired of tweezing her eyebrows. Then something happened. Alice decided to be—completely herself. She let her eyebrows grow in (within bounds) and gave up the glamor act. With the result that fans raved over her in this picture. She continued to go native in "Wake Up And Live" and found herself not only enjoying life more than ever before, but developing into a grand little actress. Now she's been cast in a choice part in "In Old Chicago" and is she happy!

She was born in Hell's Kitchen, New York City, on May 5th, as plain Alice Leppert, and went to Chester Hale's dancing classes. Then she toured the Eastern circuit of the Loew theatres with the Hale units. Then worked in a floor show, a night club, and did some dancing in vaudeville. And then the "Scandals" beckoned her, and she landed in the line there.

Rudy Vallee met Alice along about then, heard her sing and put her on his radio program. Her name's been linked with his from time to time, but both deny they've ever been that way about each other.

While Alice was singing on the Vallee program, she got her first movie work with her sponsor in the screen version of the "Scandals." After finishing that, she stepped into "Now I'll Tell," and from there went to "She Learned About Sailors" and "365 Nights in Hollywood."

Alice lives with her mother and brother in Hollywood, drives a small coupe and is pretty much of a home girl. She's five feet four and a half inches, weighs one hundred and eleven pounds, and has a very blue pair of eyes. She's a combination of Irish, German and French, and says the traits of so many races in her get her kind of mixed up occasionally.

FRED MacMURRAY. (Last printed Dec., 1936. Total number of requests since 501.) Can you 'magine Fred MacMurray's pa and ma were all set to call this guy who turned into a strapping six-foot-three-incher — Rose? They'd wanted a girl, and it was St. Rose day in Kankakee, Ill., that Aug. 30, 1908, when he put in an arrival. When the doc broke the sad news, "It's a boy," they had to think up something masculine on the spot. They dubbed him Fred, but compromised by nicknaming him Bud, and the nickname stuck.

Moving around was something Fred learned to do early and well. His father was a concert pianist, but he didn't do his touring alone. Everywhere that dad went, mother went. And after Bud's arrival, he too, got the traveling habit. But he managed to get in some education in Beaver Dam and Madison, Wis., and later in military school and at Carroll College.

He played a sax and was a member of his college orchestra, and in between drew pictures. From childhood, he wanted to be an artist and showed a flair in that general direction. (As it turned out later, he wanted to act even more than to draw.) Fred worked his way through college by band-ing in a nite club, and did odd jobs

Our Mail Box will be an added feature of this selling golf clubs and sports goods in a prominent Chicago department store.

In 1929, after driving his mother and aunt to Hollywood, he worked at several jobs, including one which called for him to sandblast paint off cars so they could be repainted. He got a great yen to act about then, and registered with Central Casting. And about then, too, he was the world's greatest movie fan. He tells now how he'd show up at the haunts of stars, collecting autographs, and when a premiere was scheduled, there'd be Fred among the first arrivals, parked on a camp stool beyond the roped-in-section outside the theatre, craning his neck to get a glimpse of star-dust flitting in and out—even as you and I.

He managed to get an extra job in "Girls Gone Wild," and then was a trapper in "Tiger Rose," with Lupe Velez and Grant Withers. But his face at that time wasn't even among those on the cutting room floor, for he looked so much like Grant that he wasn't allowed a single close-up. Partly because he was shy, and partly because of bad breaks, Fred just couldn't seem to get a real start in Hollywood. Discouraged, he took a job in an orchestra at Warner's Theatre on Hollywood Boulevard. Somebody noticed he was good looking, and he stepped up from the pit to the stage.

Some say he was discovered at last by a talent scout; others (and this sounds more likely) that he discovered the talent scout. That is, he camped on his trail and begged him to give him a screen test. And he got one with Paramount. Claudette Colbert was looking for a leading man to appear with her in "The Gilded Lily," and she liked Fred's homespun looks so well that she gave him the lead. After that, Hollywood's heart opened wide to Fred—and so did the hearts of fans the country over. His shyness, now, is one of his biggest box-office attractions, and there isn't much chance of his losing it, for it isn't a pose.

COSMOPOLITAN COOKERY

Nothing like a snack to stave off that hungry feeling. Viennese Luise forgets her calories when molasses-and-nut cookies are on the menu.

THE WORD "cosmopolitan" is one that just seems to fit charming and petite Luise Rainer and it certainly describes her tastes in foods better than any other I can think of. For "cosmopolitan," according to Mr. Webster, not only means "belonging to all or most of the world; at home in any country," but it also implies being "without local prejudices." And that certainly fits the bill in this case perfectly.

However, though a true cosmopolite and therefore quite as at home in the mountains at Santa Monica as she is besides the Blue Danube, Luise still reveals her foreign background in her attitude on the food subject.

"We Europeans not only enjoy eating," she assured me with a friendly smile, "we not only admit it, but actually boast of it!"

Having once tasted some culinary masterpiece, she then went on to explain, your appreciative foreigner will not hesitate to describe that particular dish in the most poetic terms. Nor would he consider it strange to speak of anything as plebeian as an omelette or a sauce in words that would do justice to the Mona Lisa!

"The purpose of food should not be merely to fill, but to delight as well," declared Miss Rainer with conviction. "In many lands, you know, it is considered quite all right to smack one's lips over some especially succulent morsel. In China I learned, one goes even further and expresses appreciation for an outstanding feast in a manner we would consider terribly rude!

"But in this country, alas, meals are so often thought of in terms of calories and vitamins, which makes food merely a fuel and dining only a duty! Why, one must not even exclaim to one's hostess about the prowess of the cook!" she declared in mock distress.

"Nor pay her the supreme compliment of using a piece of bread to wipe up the last vestige of some delectable gravy," I replied and laughingly went on to describe my admiration for the average Frenchman's skill at this particular form of "bread-dunking."

"But dunking is not a pretty word," Miss Rainer demurred. "Don't you think enjoying would be a far better one?"

Which was my cue, of course, to find out just what sort of dishes Miss Rainer herself enjoys most.

"I like almost everything—everywhere," she replied. Then pin her down to facts as I insisted upon doing and you will have a variety of foods from many foreign lands and from all parts of this country of ours as well. From this comprehensive collection I have chosen those that I think will have most appeal for the majority of us folks whose food tastes may not be as cosmopolitan as are those of our Viennese star.

Read on for a short description of these dishes. Then be sure also to turn to page 76 where you'll see tested recipes and explicit directions for their successful preparation. But before doing so let me add a word or two to Miss Rainer's on the subject of food enjoyment and the importance of

Courtesy Campfire Marshmallows

Sweet potato croquettes, garnished with marshmallow-topped pineapple rings will remove the monotony from any meal and assure your success as a hostess as well.

BY MARJORIE DEEN

Be original about your meals, advises lovely Luise Rainer, who declares food should delight variety as well as excellence in preparing and serving it.

Miss Rainer suggested my asking the Vendome for the special Vendome dish which I'm giving you here this month. It is for Chicken Maryland, a French chef's bow to Southern cooking and a great favorite with our much-traveled star. In this particular version of this famous dish, the chicken is baked, not fried. Now there's an idea you'll like with winter coming on, for you can cook most of the meal in the oven. Then you can have a vegetable casserole and those marshmallow-topped pineapple rings pictured here. If you decide to have the Sweet Potato Croquettes—also pictured—you'll see from the recipe that they are of the fried food family. I'll leave it to you to find out how good they are!

From the South we travel northward to New England from whence came the recipe for the cookies which our Viennese Luise is so apparently enjoying. Molasses, nuts and rolled oats are delightfully combined to give these "drop" cookies a four-star rating. If you like black walnuts (some do, some don't!), be sure and try one batch with them.

From Vienna itself comes the Chocolate Torte with which we end our collection and which Miss Rainer suggests as the perfect dessert course for any delightful dinner party. You can serve it either plain or filled; but serve it by all means, if you're looking for something as different as it is delicious. And let's be "different" frequently, just for the fun of it!

Luise Rainer's Favorite Recipes appear on Page 76.

SUSAN: Hear that, Matilda? She's been crying ever since the bridge club left.

MATILDA: She heard the girls whispering. It would break my heart, too, if anybody said my clothes had tattle-tale gray.

SUSAN: But the poor thing works so hard. It's not her fault.

SUSAN: It's that lazy soap she uses. It leaves dirt behind. We ought to tell her how we got rid of tattle-tale gray.

MATILDA: Sh-h-h! That's why I've been saving this ad about Fels-Naptha Soap. Let's slip it under her door.

SUSAN: Wait, Matilda—does that ad say Fels-Naptha's richer golden soap and lots of naptha chase out every speck of dirt?

MATILDA: Yes indeed, Susan. But keep still—or she'll hear us.

FEW WEEKS LATER

GUEST: But, Doris, these linens look brand-new! How do you ever get them so white?

DORIS: Sh-h-h! Two sly little birdies showed me how to banish tattle-tale gray with Fels-Naptha Soap. I haven't thanked them yet, but, as a bit of a reward, I'm treating them to the movies!

Nino Martini squires Elissa Landi to the Troc.

Virginia Bruce and Cesar Romero are Hollywood's latest duo.

BY LEO TOWNSEND

After the "High, Wide and Handsome" premiere, everyone drifted to the Trocadero to finish off the festivities. Most beautiful gal present was Virginia Bruce, with no make-up and Cesar Romero. When the two of them got up to dance, everyone at the tables stopped drinking to watch. They're better than most professional teams. Later in the evening, Margaret Sullavan, at a ringside table, entertained the customers with her dodging act, which she uses whenever a cameraman approaches. That's why the Trocadero never needs a floor show.

There was a large block of vacant seats at the "H., W. & H." opening, marking the spot where the Myrna Loy-Arthur Hornblow theatre party should have been. Hornblow produced the picture, so he and Myrna invited 25 people to the theatre and a late supper. Mr. H. evidently got the jitters, for on the day of the premiere he became seriously ill and Myrna had to phone all her guests and call the whole thing off.

Newest note in fashions is a dog to match your hair. At least, that's the newest note as far as Connie Bennett is concerned. Miss B. owns a cocker spaniel with golden hair exactly the shade of her own. She bought it at the Vendome—they don't serve them there, they sell them—and the two of them look very fetching in the back seat of the Bennett Rolls-Royce. The idea hasn't really caught on yet, but if it does several leading men will have to clamp on their toupees and go out shopping for a Mexican Hairless.

The Sphinx has moved again. Because too many people learned her address, and because of recent changes in her private life, Garbo has dismissed all her servants, hired a brand-new staff, and moved to a new home. The new address is 350 North Cliffwood Drive in Brentwood Heights. Why don't you drop in and surprise her?

Strange feud between Olivia de Havilland and that well-known stage and screen actor. Olivia once admired him considerably, and she was overjoyed when she finally got a chance to play in a picture with him. Something stupendous and colossal must have happened, because ever since then Miss de H. has been avoiding him. When she was working in "The Great Garrick" she even had the set barred to her former friend.

Joan Blondell and Dick Powell go previewing.

Randy Scott lights a ciggy for Dorothy Lamour at the Trocadero.

Rumors keep drifting around Hollywood that Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Taylor are secretly married. Most logical reason is that Bob's Metro contract has a clause which forbids his marriage for seven years, which means that any wedding bells would have to ring very quietly. But can you imagine Taylor and Stanwyck being able to marry secretly anywhere? Of course, there's always the chance that Arlington Brugh and Ruby Stevens might have slipped off to some remote spot.

Best gag of the month is credited to a Hollywood correspondent for a New York newspaper. After a year of trudging the Hollywood beat, the weary scribe and his wife were about to leave on a vacation. When someone asked him where they were going, he said, "We're going to paste a big picture of Robert Taylor on the outside of our car, and drive until someone says, 'Who's that?' That's where we're stopping."

Battle of the Month rages over the fair, golden lock of guess who? Shirley Temple! It seems her mother wants to let Shirley's hair grow, because Shirley herself is growing, but the studio wants to keep it in curls, recalling, no doubt, that those curls brought plenty of gold into the vaults. At this writing, the momentous decision has not yet been reached, but you can rest assured that no one in Hollywood has slept a wink for days.

Seven or eight years ago exhibitors used to advertise their pictures by announcing "This is not a musical." Reason was that Hollywood had filled the theatres of the land with musical pictures, some good and a number of them bad, and the public had tired of them. Right now there's danger of the same situation repeating itself. In one week, for instance, we saw four musicals, and three of them were based on the old "show must go on" theme. Something ought to be done. How about a musical where the heroine's horse loses the big race? Or where the little country girl doesn't make good in the city? Or one in which the young producer simply can't scare up the dough to put on the big show? He marries the girl anyway, and everybody goes home an hour earlier.

When Gene Raymond and Jeanette MacDonald arrived by plane from San Francisco on the last leg of their trip from Hawaii they were met at the airport by a bevy of photographers and Jeanette's mother. Gene's mother, who didn't approve of the marriage, is still not speaking. Too bad, because everyone else thinks it's a swell match. Jeanette and Gene posed for all the cameramen, but Gene refused to take off his hat. He had just washed his hair, he explained, and couldn't do a thing with it.

Lombard. Now that's an item every men's shop should carry, we thought, but before we could say, "We'll take that," she had gone. What Carole was buying was shirts, and since she doesn't have a size 16½ neck, we took it for granted they were for a Mr. Gable. Mr. G. is still a man's man—he continues to select his own ties.

People haven't been seeing much of Alice Faye around the night spots lately. Night club sandwiches were getting tired and lonely, so we decided to investigate. What we found out is that the little Faye gal has really gone to work. She's spending her evenings seriously studying voice and acting, and if you've seen any of her recent pictures you saw the results.

Here's a blow for all you men who've regarded Myrna Loy as the perfect wife. She thinks the word "obey" should never be allowed in the marriage ceremony. And out on the set of her next picture Myrna even refused flatly to use "obey" in her screen marriage. The picture is "Double Wedding" and Florence Rice is the other feminine member of the ceremony. Florence was all for saying that she would obey, so in order to keep peace between the two girls, the director decided to leave in both versions and let preview audiences decide which they prefer.

There are two new stars on the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer horizon. One just signed up is Mary Christine Dunn, two years of age and really a super-colossal genius. For Mary Christine is that child wonder who was just found to have an I.Q. of 185, which news ought to make Shirley Temple hang her yellow curls in shame. And the other new star is Leatrice Joy Gilbert. The daughter of Leatrice Joy and John Gilbert took her first screen test the other day and has had the studio raving ever since.

There really is a girl in Hollywood who wouldn't go in the movies for love or money. And it's Eloise O'Brien—Pat's wife—who has just turned down her third bona fide movie offer. Mr. O'B. claims she's too content with her present rôle.

Just when we were all set to believe tales that love had chilled between George Raft and Virginia Pine, we hear that Virginia's daughter is still charging things to George. In the ten-cent store the other day, four-year-old Jean was buying with a lavish hand. "Just charge that to George Raft, will you?" she asked the clerks. And the clerks agreed solemnly, at a wink from George's chauffeur, who put up the cash.

A few nights before Bob Taylor departed for England to make "A Yank at Oxford," Barbara Stanwyck attended the preview of "Broadway Melody" alone. Bob was catching up on last-minute work at the studio, so Barbara went along to check on her gentleman friend's performance. Incidentally, Bob's going-away gift to Miss S. was a bracelet of diamonds and rubies, shaped into hearts and inscribed with the date of his departure.

Divorce, reconciliations, weddings, love affairs and rumored love affairs—all these keep Hollywood in a dither trying to untangle the threads of what is fact and what fiction. Joan Bennett, for instance, had her last date before leaving for Massachusetts to play in a stock company—with dashing Errol Flynn. But that romance was nipped in the bud in short order. For Errol took another girl on a yachting trip the very next day. And it was none other than Lili Damita—his supposedly estranged wife.

Did you know that there are really four Ritz brothers? The fourth one runs a men's furnishing store in New York City. He's the white sheep of the family. The Hollywood Ritzes tried the other day to get him to join forces here with them, for their next picture, but George wired back that he's crazy now—he doesn't have to act that way.

Clark Gable drove to a Montana ranch for a vacation, but things didn't work out so well for him. When he stopped for lunch at a small town the crowds jammed the sidewalks to get a peek at him. Telephone operators passed the word along from town to town so Clark met a welcoming committee everywhere he stopped. He finally found solitude on a hunting trip. The animals simply regarded him as another guy with a gun.

There's plenty of excitement out on the "Marco Polo" set and no wonder. In the picture they show the discovery of gun powder—and so far they've had four minor explosions on the set. One of them barely missed Gary Cooper, who didn't care for the idea at all. Although the Chinese discovered gun powder several centuries ago, it apparently still has Sam Goldwyn baffled.

Irene Dunne and her husband, Dr. Francis Griffin, don't like to pose for pictures together. Reason, we learn, is that some time ago someone referred to the doctor as "Mr. Dunne." Well-known in his own profession in New York, he had good reason to resent it, hence he discourages any kind of publicity.

Edward Everett Horton arrived at the studio looking weak and wan the other morning. When asked what was ailing him, Eddie said, "I'm worn out. I sat up all night with a sick tree." That's right—a sick tree. Eddie is an ardent horticulturist and when a new linden looked like it was wilting, he sat up all night to administer to it. Only God can make a tree, says Mr. H., but it takes a lot of outside help to keep it going.

Embarrassing Moments Dept.: For her role in "The Great Garrick,' Olivia de Havilland wears a nightgown which has 72 yards of pleated chiffon (whatever that is) in it. Well, when the little lady got too close to an electric fan on the set it took four prop men to untangle the 72 yards and locate Olivia.

Back in Iowa, when she was one of the Mulligan girls, Lola Lane played the piano at the local movie palace. It was during the silent days, when the piano intensified the chase and played "Hearts and Flowers" for the love scenes. The first picture Lola played for was a Ramon Novarro feature. So now, a certain number of years later, she plays opposite her onetime hero in "The Sheik Steps Out." Girls, get at your piano lessons!

Ever get seasick without going near the ocean? That's what happened to Joan Bennett recently at the Wanger Studios, which are a good half-hour's hard ride from the Pacific. It seems they were photographing a close-up shot of a boat scene in "I Met My Love Again." It was a prop boat and there was no water around, except in the cooler, but the rocking of the ship got to Miss B. and did her in.

■ ■ ■

That recent marriage which ended almost neck and neck with "The Wedding March" set a new record for quick separations in Hollywood. Real reason for the break-up, they say, is that on honeymoon boat trip the groom cast too many glances in the direction of a young lady who was definitely not the bride. So when

POPULAR MODEL GIVES TIP ON SAVING STOCKINGS!

I cut my stocking bills IN HALF by using Ivory Flakes one minute each night!

Here's the girl you see in lots of fashion photographs — lovely Evelyn Kelly. "I furnish my own stockings," she says, "and Ivory Flakes save me money. Stockings washed with pure suds wear twice as long."

ACTION! DEMANDS PHOTOGRAPHER. Look at the strain on Evelyn's sheer stockings! They can take it, because they're kept fresh and strong by Ivory care!

ONE MINUTE PLEASE! Evelyn Kelly, popular photographers' model, takes one minute at bedtime to dash her stockings through Ivory Flakes suds. "Now they wear twice as long."

Pure soap prevents weakening of silk stockings

"Protecting the freshness of silk is the whole secret of getting real wear from stockings," say fine stores. "That's why we advise the soap flakes made from the famous pure Ivory Soap—the soap that protects even a baby's young skin."

Don't pile up stockings you've worn—don't use any soap less pure than Ivory Flakes—don't let your stockings get stale. All these make silk grow weak and old.

Start tonight with Ivory Flakes. One minute of daily care can add weeks of wear—Ivory Flakes are pure economy!

On the prairie, Miss Warbling Star gets musical accompaniment. Realism?

This Thing Called Music

There is nothing in the world quite so wonderful as music at the right time and in the right places, but I do not understand why the producers think it necessary to have music for every dramatic moment regardless of the circumstances. A singer, such as Grace Moore, or Lily Pons, or Jeanette MacDonald may be singing on a prairie just at sundown, and accompanying her perfectly will be a superb orchestra coming from where—out of clouds, flowers, or from behind trees? Is this realistic? For me it certainly isn't and I'm sure a lot of other fans feel the same way as I do about it.

Now, about that dramatic touch. In the most dramatic moments of "Parnell" when Clark Gable and Myrna Loy appear to be lost in a dense fog, soft music plays an accompaniment to their quiet laughter. I have never seen a London fog filled with music, but maybe Ireland fogs are different from those in London.

In "Captains Courageous," in mid-ocean, on a fishing schooner, Freddie Bartholomew and Spencer Tracy have an orchestra accompaniment to help them catch fish. I don't doubt that it might be soothing to the fishes' nerves, but for me it knocks the plot right out from under, and I'm jolted back into reality with the very annoying thought, "Ah, this is just a movie after all."

If an entire picture is a musical show, it is rather to be expected, though not always convincing either, to find music bobbing up almost any place, or if on the other hand an orchestra has been accompanying a picture from the beginning, that too, is different. But this thing of music suddenly appearing on a desert island, or on top of the Washington Monument, is just too, too absurd.—Lucia E. Harding, Charlotte, N. C.

WRITE A LETTER—WIN A PRIZE

Have you tried your luck in these columns yet? If you haven't, sit down now. Write a letter or poem about the stars or movies. Be sure it's original, however. Make it long or make it brief, and say your little say. Between You 'N' Me is an open forum, written by the fans, and for them. Tell us what pictures you think are tops, what stars you think are tops. Tell us what you don't like, too. We welcome your original contributions. No deadlines. Just send in your raves and peeves, and maybe a prize will find its way to your door. Prizes: 1st prize, $5; 2 second prizes of $2 each; 6 prizes of $1 each. Don Woods—Before and After Five summers ago, I met Don Woods and his wife, Jo, in a little out-of-the-way village in Connecticut. At the time they were practically penniless. Months before, Don had been working hard in all the parts he could get on Broadway to collect enough money for Jo to go to the country and rest. You see, after six years of marriage, the Woods were the expectant parents of an heir who would have little but love to inherit. They landed in Connecticut, and after settling in a comfortable Inn, made arrangements with a local doctor for the delivery. The little boy, christened Conrad, and nicknamed Splinter, was born late that August.

While waiting for him, my family and the Woods were having a grand time with corn roasts, feasts of watermelon, searching for an old cradle in antique shops, and putting on acts in the big Inn room on rainy nights. Till Splinter's arrival, both of them remained sweet and uncomplaining, and they won my heart completely.

That fall they visited us in our New York apartment. Don's career was now set. Eva Le Gallienne had taken an interest in him, and he was even then Hollywood bound. But he was the same down-to-earth chap of old. Conceit was something left out of his nature. We've moved since and haven't seen him again, but each year he sends either a Christmas card or a letter. Perhaps all stars aren't like him,

Wise Clark Gable

If you ask me, Clark Gable's wise
To be afraid of Temple's eyes—
Her dimpled cheeks, her teeth of pearl—
Oh she's a cute, intriguing girl!
No matter how, nor where, nor when,
She captivates the hearts of men.
Regardless who the leading man
'Tis Shirley pivots every fan.
Despite how each great star is cast
Our Shirley's role is first and last.
So, Gable's wise to fear his place,
When so much glamor he must face.
A pint-sized youngster holds the cup,
All Clark can do is stand and gu'p.—Mrs. L. L. Huffman, Lincolnton, North Carolina.

Prefers Stars Who Are Human

Do the movie fans really want glamor in motion pictures, or do they want real down-to-earth stories that tug at the heart-strings? That is a question which should not be hard to answer. Glamor may be all right but it should be served in sparing doses. The great popularity of Shirley Temple, Janet Gaynor, Wallace Beery, and the late Will Rogers easily proves that the more human the actor's portrayal, the more popular he becomes—and stays. After seeing a Shirley Temple picture, we can nearly always say, "Why, our Jane said the same thing as Shirley just last night," or while coming home from such a picture as "A Family Affair," we remark, "Father lights his pipe just like Lionel Barrymore!" Those actors and actresses who have remained tops with us for so long are the ones who act like the boys or girls down the block, or the men or women we meet every day. They've endeared themselves to us by their realistic portrayals, not by glamorizing themselves until they no longer seem like human beings.—Martha Nichols, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Knight Errant Named John Boles

Last year Mr. Boles was making personal appearances in Washington, D. C. Our school choir, billed on his program, invaded his dressing-room asking for autographs. He very pleasantly signed a hundred odd without any show of impatience.

I had always thought of stars as hardly speaking the same language as ours, but John Boles was, to my astonishment and delight, just like an ordinary human being. He saved my pink net dress from disaster when, in the confusion, I flounced too near some black shoe polish. And a whole year later, when my sixteenth birthday drew near, I was pleasantly mystified to receive a congratulatory note from him. I discovered later that Mother had wanted to surprise me and had written to him, reminding him of the incident of the year before. That's the kind of a star I like, girls!—Patricia Few, Decatur, Georgia.

"Old Fashioned" Girl Speaks Up

Maybe I'm behind the times or maybe I'm crude—just enough to like the ideas that went out with jigsaw puzzles and yo-yos, the heavy clinches, the risque scenes etc. Anyway I don't appreciate the new trend in the movies a-tall.

I've tried to be righteous about films with morals. I've laughed weakly at the pictures overrun with good clean fun. I've even forced myself to sigh over the pictures with those collar-ad cuties, Tyrone

★★★★ Dead End

You'll undoubtedly find "Dead End" on numerous "ten best" lists when 1937's quota of films has been catalogued and judged by the critics. It was an excellent play on Broadway, and it is a swell motion picture. It is drama on a New York street. All the action takes place from dawn to darkness, and the entire picture is played on a single set, where the street runs into the East River. Mr. Goldwyn's cameraman has achieved splendid photographic effects and the identical opening and closing panoramic shot is something you won't forget.

On the street you'll find Baby-Face Martin, once a tough kid of the district, who has returned to see his long-forgotten mother; Dave, who has grown up embittered by his failure to make an honest living; Drina, Dave's girl and the older sister of Tommy, one of a tough gang of East Side kids who gets himself in trouble with the law, and about whom the drama really revolves.

There are good performances by Humphrey Bogart, as Baby-Face, Joel McCrea as Dave and Sylvia Sidney as Drina, but acting honors go to the group of youngsters, imported from the stage production, who play the tough kids. Billy Halop plays Tommy, and the others are Huntz Hall, Bobby Jordan, Leo B. Gorcey, Gabriel Dell and Bernard Punsly. In the supporting cast there are notable brief portrayals by Margaret Main, Claire Trevor, Allen Jenkins, Wendy Barrie and James Burke. Directed by William Wyler.—Samuel Goldwyn.

★★★ Varsity Show

With the aid of Fred Waring and his band, the Warner Brothers have turned out a college musical which is tops in that kind of entertainment. It's completely unsophisticated and completely rah-rah, which is either a hearty recommendation or a warning, depending on how you like your musicals.

Waring plays a professor at good old Winfield, and his band manages to look and act like undergraduates. When the annual college show seems about to wind up behind the eight ball, the boys get together and solicit the services of Chuck Daly, who has gone from Winfield to Broadway and success as a musical comedy producer. When it turns out that Chuck Daly is none other than Dick Powell, you can sit back and be pretty sure that the big show is going to be terrific.

Dick Powell does an ingratiating job as the helpful alumnus. As his sidekick, Ted Healy steals the show with a swell comedy performance. Fred Waring is not at ease in the acting department, but his band and male chorus are splendid. Rosemary Lane, in the romantic lead, and her sister Priscilla, who supplies comedy, are both due for fine screen futures. Others who help are Lee Dixon Walter Catlett, Johnny Davis, Sterling Holloway, Mabel Todd and Buck and Bubbles. The finale, staged by Busby Berkeley, is gigantic and colossal. Directed by William Keighley.—Warner Brothers.

★★★ Souls at Sea

In 1841 the packet William Brown, sailing from Liverpool to Philadelphia, caught fire and burned to the water. Forty-one survivors crowded into the lifeboat The ship's mate, in charge of the boat, sensed at once that the small craft was overloaded, and in order to save as many lives as possible, he caused seven of the passengers to be thrown into the sea. Later, in Philadelphia, he was tried for manslaughter, and acquitted.

Out of this story—based on an actual occurrence—Paramount has fashioned an exciting and highly dramatic film, a sea picture which belongs in a select group with "Mutiny on the Bounty" and "Captains Courageous." It's a tale as powerful as the sea itself, and it's acted to the hilt by a swell cast. First honors go to Gary Cooper, who plays the ship's mate with all the force and ability which has marked all of his recent portrayals. Surprise performance is that of George Raft as Cooper's companion. Heretofore identified only with city slicker rôles, Raft, with no lubrication in his locks, and none of his former mannerisms, turns in a performance that will certainly open an entire new field of characterization to him. In lesser rôles, Olympe Bradna and Frances Dee manage to be both beautiful and convincing. Of the supporting cast, Joseph Schildkraut, Henry Wilcoxon, Virginia Weidler and George Zucco are outstanding. Directed by Henry Hathaway.—Paramount.

OF TODAY'S TALKIES

★★★ Broadway Melody of 1938

This year's "Broadway Melody" is recommended more for several of its parts than for the picture as a whole. It has several singing and dancing sequences which are completely delightful, and which help considerably to speed up a story that creaks loudly in some of its joints. In case you want to know, it's the old one about the young Broadway producer whose backer walks out on him because he is determined to star an unknown gal. This time the gal has a horse. The horse wins the big race, the money is put into the show, and the show is a howling success. So you won't be startled by the novelty of this idea, it may be well to warn you that the horse also appears in the show's finale.

Now for the assets. Best dancing is done in a box car by Eleanor Powell, George Murphy and Buddy Ebsen. Another number, in a park setting, by Miss Powell and Mr. Murphy, is also a show stopper. In the singing department, there are Sophie Tucker, Judy Garland and Igor Gorin. All three are swell, with little Judy Garland outstanding because she is given the best chance. Robert Taylor plays the romantic lead, and no one asks him either to sing or dance. Others who deserve mention are Raymond Walburn, Binnie Barnes, Billy Gilbert, Robert Benchley, Willie Howard, Barnett Parker and Robert Wildhack, who demonstrates sneezes. Most effective song is "Dear Mr. Gable," sung by Judy Garland. Directed by Roy del Ruth.—M-G-M.

★★★ Thin Ice

In her second screen appearance Sonja Henie manages to retain all the freshness and naïve charm which made her dear to thousands of customers in "One in a Million." In addition, she has made progress with her acting, for she exhibits a smoothness and finesse which she lacked in her first picture. Evidently sitting up nights with an actor (Tyrone Power) didn't do her any harm.

The producers have wisely kept the film's running time under control. In welcome contrast to the siege of recent over-long musicals, "Thin Ice" gets over its story, its song and its skating in slightly more than an hour, and audiences will leave it feeling they've had more than their money's worth of entertainment.

Tyrone Power has the male lead, and this accomplished young gent makes the most of his light comedy rôle. He seems as amused as the audience at Miss Henie's delightful accent. Melville Cooper, Raymond Walburn, Arthur Treacher, Alan Hale, Maurice Cass and Sig Rumann help considerably in supporting rôles. Leah Ray sings "My Secret Love Affair" and Joan Davis panicked a preview audience with comedy renditions of "I'm Olga from the Volga" and "My Swiss Hill Billy." In addition, there are several spectacular skating ensembles featuring Miss Henie. Directed by Sidney Lanfield.—20th Century-Fox.

★★★ Artists and Models

A mélange of gags, girls and music, "Artists and Models" is good entertainment because it is fast and funny and because it gives Jack Benny his first real opportunity in pictures. The smooth-talking Mr. B. delivers a fine job in the top comedy rôle, so good that when he isn't on the screen the pace seems to slacken considerably.

Paramount has gathered a large cast to support radio's Number One boy. In the leads are Richard Arlen, Ida Lupino and Gail Patrick. Mr. Benny wins Gail Patrick, which is better than most comics are doing these days. Among the added entertainers are Andre Kostelanetz and his orchestra, with Connie Boswell doing a swell vocal on "Whispers in the Dark," Ben Blue and Judy Canova, the Yacht Club Boys, and Martha Raye with Louis Armstrong in a Harlem setting singing "Public Melody Number One." It's Martha Raye in blackface, in case you want to know. In addition, the cast contains six well-known artists—Russell Patterson, Peter Arno, Arthur William Brown, John LaGatta, McClelland Barclay and Rube Goldberg, portraying six well-known artists.

"Artists and Models" isn't the world's best musical, but it can certainly be recommended for an evening's entertainment. Directed by Raoul Walsh.—Paramount.

"I want Mennen Antiseptic Powder that keeps me SAFER from germs!"

"Honest, Mummy, I'm not cryin' just to be bad. I'm SCARED of those germs that are always landin' on my skin; and I want the baby powder that'll protect me from 'em. I mean Mennen. You know, Mummy, there couldn't be a powder that's softer than Mennen, or that works slicker in keepin' my skin free from chafin'. Besides that . . . this Mennen Powder is what my doctor ordered; 'cause it's antiseptic. It keeps a baby's skin from gettin' infected. And that's what counts! So Mummy—what?—you'll get me some Mennen Powder! Gee, that's great! Now I'll love you more'n ever!"

CALLING

BY MURIEL BABCOCK

WHEN THE whole Hollywood chorus gleefully started to chant, whistle and sing, "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off," in the matter of that big romance of Sonja Henie and Tyrone Power, they reckoned without Miss Henie.

Oh, yes, indeed! It will take more than rumor-crooning to shake the faith and the love that the blond load of sex appeal from Norway has for her king of glamor, Mr. Tyrone Power.

You take a girl like Sonja, and she knows where she is going in affairs of the heart. Or rather, what is more important to smooth performance and no mishaps, she knows where her boy friend is and what he's doing in his odd moments. She is the kind of a girl who makes romance a full-time job.

Maybe you remember how Hollywood buzzed not long ago with the story that Tyrone and Sonja had "ph'ffed," that Tyrone was stepping out with Janet Gaynor.

"Ooof!" said Hollywood, "that's the end!" And proceeded to fill the gossip columns to this effect.

Cried Sonja to this reporter, upon land-

Yes, the Henie-Power

Sonja and Tyrone date Cupid. Yep, if this isn't love, it'll do until love comes along. What do you think?

Tyrone finds himself the center of attraction when he's with the ladies —and of discussion when he's not!

THE CALLING OFF, OFF

ing from an American airliner at Newark on her way through Manhattan to a vacation in her home town of Oslo, Norway, "It could not be! He did not even know Janet Gaynor. Besides, I know he did not have dates with her. He could not. He was with me."

Your reporter turned to the studio press-agent who had also met the plane and said, "You heard? It could not be. Now, I think that's the way to keep a man in line."

Sonja didn't quite understand, but she laughed. "It could not be," she repeated. "Foolish, the whole business. We are just the same as always. I see Tyrone every night, and we work together every day."

And from that frank admission, draw your own conclusions as to how Sonja feels about Tyrone, despite the fact that she has never before admitted they are to be married, nor does she wear a big sparkler on her third finger. Personally, I'd say she was in love.

At any rate, she was a little wrought up.

But let's go back to the beginning and let you in on the whole story.

It was about noon of a hot late Summer day in New York. Cameramen, reporters and yours truly, a-scribing for MODERN SCREEN, were waiting at the airport for Miss Henie.

Out of the clouds came the big American skyliner and out stepped Sonja looking mighty trim.

The reporters and cameramen closed in and Sonja posed on the steps coming down from the plane, posed waving her hand, with big smile, with sober countenance, posed on safe terra firma, even posed surrounded by a crowd of eager and insistent autograph seekers.

Said one reporter timidly, "And now, Miss Henie, how about Tyrone Power?"

"We are just good friends," Sonja replied.

"Ah," said the young man, "just good friends." And scribbled on his pad. "Anything more, Miss Henie?"

"Good friends, we are," she repeated, closing her mouth firmly.

BUT IN the limousine riding into New York, over the Pulaski Skyway and through the long Holland Tunnel under the Hudson River where we found ourselves shouting in order to be heard, she got really warmed up on the discussion with me.

I gathered from her remarks that Mr. Power is pretty important in her life, very important, so important, in fact, that she was mad as a hoot owl about the little episode in Hollywood, when they tried to sing, "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off" for her and her boy friend.

"How those things start!" she exploded. "It wasn't true. It was dreadful. At first when it comes out in the paper, we laugh very hard. Somebody is having a nice dream. Then four or five days go by and all the papers say so and it goes out over the radio, and it is not so funny. You try to laugh, but you cannot laugh at that. You know when people look at you, they are thinking about it. You see people talking and they stop when you come up, and you know they are talking about it.

"Besides, it does funny things to you inside—people saying that you have had a fight (Continued on page 106)

IF You MET ROBERT TAYLOR

BY ANNE McNAMARRA

I SEE by the papers that Bob Taylor is coming to New York soon. I wonder if he'll fly or come by train? If he comes by train. . . . Let's see, the Century gets in at ten. I could go up to Grand Central. Maybe I'd see him.

Well, what earthly good would that do you, Annie McN.? Do you suppose he'd notice you on the platform when he's got Barbara Stanwyck on his mind? Still, it doesn't hurt to think about it, does it? It's fun to think about him. I'd like to know him. I bet he's nice, as well as good-looking. Suppose you did meet him? What would you say—what would you do? I wish—I wish I could be of some kind of service to him—help him out of a jam—show him that fans can be nice. Wasn't it awful last year when that mob of females tore him apart! Took his shoes off. And stormed the Waldorf. And he didn't get to see hardly any of New York, because he didn't dare leave his hotel suite. His first trip to the big city, too. He said he had wanted to see Grant's Tomb and the Aquarium and buy a present for his mother in Saks-Fifth Avenue, just because she had always wanted to shop in that store herself.

I wish . . . I wish. . . .

The sleek, beautiful train came gliding down the track. I was there, in the right spot, as close as I could get to the newspaper photographers. I heard a wild-looking, unkempt young man telling a spruce, persistent young lady that "Mr. Taylor was not going to give any interviews. Too busy." She said, "My mother told me never to believe anything a press agent said." Doors opened, baggage was dumped out. The camera boys looked bored. The press agent looked increasingly unkempt. The spruce young lady stayed her ground. People began leaving the train. All the people left the train. None of them was Mr. Taylor.

"Musta got off at Harmon," said the press agent.

I started home, disappointed.

Over at the west end of the great terminal was such a mob as you've never seen. I knew—I knew. I got there first, before the press agent, the young lady and the camera boys. A shrieking, howling crowd of girls and women were pulling and tugging and shouting at the screen's No. 1 Boy. Tearing buttons off. One had his hat. Another his handkerchief. It was disgusting. He was trying to fend them off without using his fists—as he

KIE

"There's plenty to laugh at," philosophizes Jack. "F'rinstance, pompous celebrities inflated with the gas of their own glamor."

BY CAROLINE SOMERS HOYT

Yes, anything that life can give—bumps, skids, uppercuts—Jack can take—and always with a shrug and a merry twinkle in his eye

CAN TAKE IT!

OAKIE CAN take it, tit for tat, right on the slightly double Oakie chin. The bruises, disappointments and practical jokes. Yes, anything that Oakie can give, Oakie can take.

"I've often wondered about Jack. 'Tain't nat'ral, always to be in the sun. Or is it? Maybe we're wrong. I've often wondered when I've talked, through the years, to the people who work with him in pictures. The tales they tell. As on the set the other day when Eduardo Ciannelli said, "Oakie always knows his lines. I don't believe he goes up on them more than once in every picture, if that. And when he does, he never stops and just stands there, like most of us do. No, he goes right on and off into a story. It's always a story that has nothing whatsoever to do with the scene, and it's usually unprintable. But the point is, Oakie isn't stopped. Nor does he sulk. It's a remarkable temperament," said the Latin Mr. Ciannelli of Mr. Oakie of Sedalia, Missouri.

Ann Sothern, working with Jack, said, "We worked all day yesterday in the pouring rain. Studio-manufactured rain on the set. Our clothes stuck to us, soppy and steamy. It was hotter than Tophet outside and clammy and chilly here on the sound stage. We were all sneezing and sniffling and obviously catching our deaths of cold. We were all hitting the all-time low—all but Oakie.

"Jack managed to avert a sitdown strike by such cracks as, 'Well, any day now M-G-M will be calling me to play opposite Garbo—that Boyer don't light up!' Or an aside to Edgar Kennedy, about me, 'If she says her heart goes pit-a-pat every time she sees Gene Raymond, it's a lie.' Or, to me, 'Kennedy's a low comedian, not my type at all, a face-maker, a mugger.' Or, 'Guess I'll be doing Rathbone parts next. The directors want a full face for their money. They're tired of using two profiles stuck together.' Or, when the director would call him to the set, he'd yell, 'Sorry, I couldn't come today!'

"This kept up until, at the last, he pretended to succumb to the general gloom. He stood up on the stage, pretended he was bawling like a baby and said, 'Here I stand, day after day, year after year, rained upon, kicked around, and what do I get out of it? Two million dollars!'

"Well," laughed Ann, "what can you do with a man like that? The result was that we all felt better, finished the sequence with a flourish. That's Jack, the greatest little morale-builder in the business. And, I believe," Ann said, seriously, "I believe it's because he's got such swell morale himself. It's 'Never say Cry,' with Jack."

Yep, I thought, there's more to Jack than the laughs he gives and gets. But what? And, more importantly, how? Easy enough to explain the wisecracks. Many a man has worn the cap and bells. But there does come a time when the motley is doffed. What manner of man is he then?

Was Oakie born this way, a laugh in his mouth instead of a silver spoon? Or has he, through the years, achieved a fool-proof philosophy with which to thumb his nose at fortune? Or is he one of those (Continued on page 83)

"Folks say marriage has settled me down," claims Oakie. And, looking at the attractive Mrs. O., you don't wonder he's content to be that way.

THAT HEPBURN

Ladies and gen'men! We have in this corner, Katie Hepburn. What she wants, she takes! How about "Stage Door" honors?

BY FAITH SERVICE

FIREWORKS! Frenzies! A feud?

Danger signals flared in all the Hollywoods. The grapevine system buzzed and bumbled. Studio folk awaited the explosion. For RKO, barging in where archangels would fear to tread, were co-starring Ginger Rogers and Katharine Hepburn in "Stage Door." Those two redheads, dynamically different in backgrounds!

All very well to put two male stars together in one picture, such as Gable and Tracy in "San Francisco." Men, Hollywood reminded us, are not the deadly species. But look what threatened when Janet Gaynor, Loretta Young, Constance Bennett and Simone Simon were together in "Ladies In Love." Cold shoulders. Omens of hair-pulling and wire-pulling. Now Hepburn and Rogers, of all the incendiary combinations!

Oh, woe, moaned Hollywood.

Hollywood heard that there were ructions. Roaring, red-headed ructions. Over costumes, Ginger wanting her designer, Hepburn wanting, and getting, hers. Ructions over stills, Hepburn killing stills in which Ginger was good and she bad, and vice versa. Ructions over lines, and over, above all, billing. Co-starred as they were, Ginger's name was to get top billing. "Hepburn in hysterics," hollered Hollywood. For could anyone imagine La Hepburn, with her Theatre Guildish propensities, taking second billing to Ginger of light musical comedy fame?

It is told how Hepburn threw a glass of water on Ginger's new mink coat, how Ginger made the retort courteous when she said, "It's real mink; it won't shrink." The story broke in the papers. No one paid heed to the revealing fact that Ginger was more upset by it than Katie.

No one heeded the true version which was that Katie and a producer were having a conference on the second floor of an executive building and that, just as Ginger happened by, the executive threw a paper cup, containing a few drops of water, out of the window. Ginger did say, "It's real mink; it won't shrink." However, Katie didn't do the throwing. But Hollywood would have none of that.

THE TOWN expressed itself, forcibly. Said that there were substantial reasons for a feud, and so there must be a feud. For:

The two girls are too much alike—in the wrong ways. They are too much alike physically, which is always bad. Both girls are tall, Ginger an inch the taller of the two. They weigh within one pound of each other. Their bust, hip, waist measures are the same. Both have changeable, blue-green eyes. Both are natural red-heads. Yes, the physical similarities between Rogers and Hepburn were the fuel to the feud, said "They."

Both girls are athletic. If one were an Amazon and one a languid lily, all might be well. But no. Both ride well, swim well, dive, dance, play games. Ginger excels in tennis, Hepburn at golf.

Both are Americans from way back. Both from families studded with professional and political names. Katie is the third of six children. Ginger the second of three, two sisters dying in infancy.

These are the similarities, wag the head-hunters, which engender feuds.

And then, the dissimilarities begin. These are even more significant. For they are psychological. This is what Hollywood has to say about them:

Hepburn is a fighter. What she wants she goes after and gets, one way or the other. Born in a large family, she spent most of her childhood playing with boys, with an elder brother she idolized. Her quick pride made her do everything the boys did. She took every dare from jumping off roofs to swimming across bottomless lakes to skinning rattlesnakes. And she has been fighting for what she wants ever since.

Ginger, on the other hand, waits and watches, outwardly casual. She was raised among women. Her mother took care of her, and as Mrs. Rogers had to work, Ginger learned to play by her mother's various desks and be quiet.

While still a child, she learned what Katie has never learned—the discipline and the meaning of the stage, of struggle. And early, too, she learned that, in her case, things have a way of "just happening." As a result, Ginger today has developed a belief that you must never cross your bridges until you come to them, for much of the time they are not there at all. Katie, on the other hand, would row a hundred leagues and build a bridge across the Hellespont. No little struggles for supremacy mar the even tenor of Ginger's days and ways. She earned her career by working hard and by a genius for being in the right place when the right job turned up.

With Katie, it is different. Her professional background is one of fighting for every break. Earn a part, and then lose it—partly because she refuses to conform to a part or to direction in which she has no faith, partly because she plays in bad luck.

Today, Katie still fights. Ginger still works and waits. What, shrieked the Hollywood sirens, what would be the outcome of two such diametrically opposed forces? Would Hepburn's fighting spirit go marching through the film to glory? Or would Ginger's watchful waiting, her smooth serenity, prove the immovable body over which Hepburn's militant spirit would dash them both to pieces?

Neither.

THERE was no feud.

Sorry, Hollywood, you were wrong. Never wronger in your vigilant life. I know, because I watched them on the set for hours. I browsed about the lot and talked to everyone from gatekeepers to props, waitresses, cameramen, photographers, directors, supervisors, extras. (Continued on page 94)

Over here—in fine fettle—we see Ginger Rogers, whose game is watchful waiting. Watching Katie—and waiting for anything!

ROGERS FEUD !

FUN IN

A sense of humor plus one good

Jimmy Stewart can't understand why people like to talk about their operations. But hospitals! Well, there's never a dull moment, to hear him tell it.

JIMMY STEWART came in, all six foot three of him, looking longer than usual because he was thinner than usual. His face was sunburned, but he still walked as if he and his legs were not on the best of terms. He dropped into a low chair, which brought his knees about to the level of his eyes.

"You know," he complained, "technically speaking, I'm going to owe some people a lot of money for giving you this story. Well—say, a hundred thousand dollars, in very round figures. I signed the fellows at home to an agreement that anybody who mentions hospitals, doctors or any kind of sickness pays a fine of five thousand dollars—including me. By the time we're through here, I'll be a technical bankrupt. How's if we talk about something nice, like the heat or toothache or Al Capone?

"No? All right. But remember I'm sacrificing myself for my art. I can't understand why people ever want to talk about their operations. If I'd broken my leg or got smashed up in an airplane—something reasonable like that—it might have been different. You see what I mean, don't you?" he inquired anxiously.

"You fall and you crack a bone, cause and effect, two and two make four, rational as ham and eggs. People glare at you in disgust and say, you blamed fool, now you've gone and held up production, why in blazes can't you be careful and look where you're going? Something simple and sunny about it. But here comes this arthritis from nowhere and swoops down on you and doubles you up, and you don't know why. I don't like mysteries. I don't like diseases that come sneaking up on you from behind. And I don't like people to look at me sort of appalled—I'm appalled enough myself without any help."

Stewart's eyes always look mournful, even ailment and you can have yourself a time. Ask Jimmy, he knows when his spirits are at their blithest. It's his natural style of deadpan. But there was a grimness about the set of his lips at this point, which indicated that he meant what he said, and no funny business.

When he finished the exacting role of Chico in "Seventh Heaven," he was bone-tired. He should have taken a rest. Instead, he went to Yosemite to ski, and did a thorough job of it. His lazy movements, his drawling voice, belie him. Work or play, he puts his heart into it.

Then he went into "Vivacious Lady" with Ginger Rogers, and collapsed so thoroughly on the set that he was taken straight to the hospital, where he stayed for two weeks—too ill the first of those weeks to see anyone, but not too ill to note dimly through his pain what was going on about him.

BY IDA ZEITLIN

"They stuck me into bed, and I could feel my feet sort of dangling half way to the floor. Try sleeping that way when you're normal, and see how far it gets you. I'd pull my legs up in tent formation for awhile, then hang 'em out again to air. They weren't used to patients my length, and I don't know how long it took 'em to get a bed to fit. Even then the mattress was still too short, but at least my feet didn't have so far to go. That was something.

"Then they went to the other extreme. After letting my feet roam free, they locked 'em up. Did you ever sleep in a hospital bed? Well, they've got their own peculiar notions of making 'em. Or maybe it's me that's peculiar. I'm broadminded enough to see that every man has a right to his own design for sleeping, and if you like to sleep in a strait-jacket, that's your privilege. I don't. They got those sheets and things tucked around me so tight, I couldn't budge. Arthritis by itself is bad enough, but combine it with claustrophobia, and you've got something. I tried to pry the stuff loose but, first, I hadn't much strength and, besides, Houdini himself couldn't have done it.

"There was a button arrangement at the end of a long black wire that the nurse had told me to push if I wanted her. 'This will summon the nurse'—that's what she'd said, I remember exactly now—'this will summon the nurse.' Well, she'd stuck it right alongside my ear, and what good was that? I couldn't summon her with my ear, and I couldn't get my hands out of jail. I remember lying there, trying to figure it out, wondering if maybe I could turn my head and butt it with my forehead, or what would happen if I just cut loose and yelled. As a matter of fact, I tried to yell, but the noise all stayed inside. I could hear myself yelling, and still I couldn't hear a sound, and that got me so mad that I managed to yank out a hand and push the button. I felt as though I'd accomplished a miracle.

"So they made me a thing called a cradle—big sort of canopy that went over the foot of the bed, and they draped the sheets and blankets around it. I was like a king under that canopy, wriggling my feet any which way I pleased. Till it turned cold. I was half asleep by that time, and I pulled the covers up over my head and dug in. Then I felt the breezes dallying with my feet. I'd pulled the whole works down off the contraption, and there it stood, high and dry, making faces at me. That was when I gave up. Someone tossed a pill in my mouth, and next thing I knew, someone else was saying breakfast.

"I didn't want any breakfast. I wanted to sleep. But it seems a hospital's got whims, same as a patient—only difference being the hospital gets its whims humored. One of them's this: sick or hungry or

THE AWFUL TRUTH ABOUT IRENE DUNNE

BY JAMES REID

Has Miss D. been keeping something from us? Yes—and here it is!

THERE SHE was, on the set of "The Awful Truth"—modern for a change. And poised and sensible-looking, as always. Except for one thing. Her hat. If it could be called a hat. A sliver of black felt with five or six other slivers rising straight up from its center. That should have warned me.

The setting was the front of a courtroom. She was in the witness chair, asking for a divorce. Dramatic setting, dramatic situation. But the dialogue was hilarious. And she wasn't serious, she was coy.

In the middle of a line she stopped, in sudden self-doubt. The camera also stopped. "No," she decided, "that line wasn't right. It sounded almost sensible." The script girl told her what the line should have been. She started again.

A few feet away, facing her, stood Cary Grant, from whom she was asking the divorce. Midway between them stood a wire-haired terrier, now Mr. Smith, once Asta in "The Thin Man," and real name Skippy. The dog was there by the judge's order, the dog being the main issue in the divorce. The divorcing couple were fighting over his custody.

The judge had said, "In cases of this kind, we frequently let the party involved decide which one he wants to live with."

So there was Mr. Smith—and there were both of them, trying to entice him. But whatever his cue was, Mr. Smith wasn't getting it. He wasn't reacting to either of them. He was just standing, staring into the camera, prolonging his close-up.

They doubled, then redoubled their bids for his attention. The only result was a mad bedlam.

Beside me stood a prop man, who looked human, sane and normal. Suddenly, he started shaking his head, and talking to himself. I didn't quite catch what he was saying, but it sounded like: "Is this picture scur-rew-y!"

At approximately the same moment, the girl in the pixie hat threw up her hands, frustrated. "You know," she said, to Director Leo McCarey, "I think we have a temperamental star on our hands. Either that, or he's high-hat, after acting with Bill Powell and Myrna Loy."

"We'll fix that," said McCarey. "We'll have him eating out of your hand in five minutes!"

He called for some dog biscuit. He crumbled some into her hand. Then she called to Mr. Smith. This time, Mr. Smith reacted. He leapt into her lap. Her expensively gowned lap. She didn't scream. She acted flattered.

Five times more, in rehearsal, she proffered Mr. Smith dog-biscuit crumbs. Five times more, she had her lap leapt on by thirty pounds of canine. Then they were ready for the "take."

This time she didn't have any crumbs, but Mr. Smith leapt just the same, and she turned to the judge, with a warm, disarming smile, and said, "I win, don't I?"

The girl was Irene Dunne—who used to have a reputation for dignity. She'll be lucky to have a shred of it left after "The Awful Truth."

And why is she making such a picture? Why is she turning from epic drama (see "High, Wide and Handsome") to mad merriment?

There is only one answer. The awful truth about Irene is that she's a person who likes to un-suppress her desires, at least once in a while. And to do amusing things is a rampant old desire of hers. The awful truth is the girl has a sense of humor.

No one has suspected it until just recently. There's nothing particularly funny about a singer, not when she sings as Irene can. She didn't make her professional debut in the chorus of the Metropolitan Opera, as once reported. She started as an understudy to Peggy Wood, but from there she went straight to stardom in Broadway operetta.

There's nothing particularly funny about a dramatic actress, not when she acts as believably as Irene does. Not when she wins screen stardom in a "Cimarron" and a "Back Street," undergoing, in both, a transformation from youth to middle age.

There's nothing especially comic, either, about a girl who lives one of the quietest lives in Hollywood, seldom appears in public or the gossip columns, and makes a spectacular success of a marriage that "didn't have a chance"—a marriage in which, eight months of the year, husband and wife are a continent apart.

If, on top of all this, she is also a beauty, such a girl doesn't accumulate a reputation as a clown. In fact, just the opposite. People—men and women alike—think of her as intellectual, idealistic. As finely emotioned as she is finely featured. Ambitious, yes, but also modest, quiet but courageous. All of which Irene is. But she is also amusing. She's proving it.

Hollywood should have suspected this side of her long ago. After all, she has the blood of Erin in her veins—and when, bedad, was an Irish girl ever born without a sense of humor?

Also, she consented to make her movie debut in a comedy number entitled, of all things, "Leather-necking." And then there was that famous remark of her early film days. She was appearing in an inexpensive picture. On the same lot, a high-priced epic was in the making. The studio offered a prize of fifty dollars for a new title for the epic. Some co-worker of Irene's wondered why the studio didn't offer a fifty-dollar prize for a new title for their picture. "Because," said Irene, "if they did, it would double the budget."

Hollywood saw her first picture, and was amused. Hollywood also heard the story, and laughed. But, somehow, her lighter talents were (Continued on page 89)

Don't let the wistful expression fool you. She's probably thinking up a wisecrack.

Irene and Cary Grant do battle over "Mr. Smith." Yep, he's the four-footed gent between them.

HER BROTHER-IN-

Paul and Bella—Mr. and Mrs. Muni to you—take time out to say hello, with smile effects.

BY MARY JACOBS

YOU THINK you know Paul Muni. You've read thousands of words, dozens of stories on what he's like—a very serious, sober man, shy and diffident, with no time for hobbies, for anything but work. And how he married without loving his wife, Bella Finkle, and only fell in love with her after their marriage.

To all of which I say Bunk.

For I spent an entire afternoon chatting with a young lady who knows Paul Muni better than anyone except Mrs. Muni. A young lady who has known and loved him for fifteen years.

I'm talking of his sister-in-law, Lucy Finkle, to whom he is brother, brother-in-law, fine artist, grand fellow and playfellow combined.

Lucy herself is a slim, petite girl with laughing brown eyes and curly dark hair. She resembles her older sister, Bella, Paul's wife, very much. "Except," she adds, "Bella has gorgeous brown eyes and is an inch shorter."

We chatted together in the lobby of the Hotel Wellington where Lucy lives, and works very hard to prepare herself for grand opera. She has a lovely soprano voice.

Lucy Finkle saw Paul Muni first. Yes, even before her sister Bella did. Rather, she saw his hands first, and fell for them.

It happened fifteen years ago, when Paul Muni was the star of the Irving Place Theatre, and was top man in the Yiddish theatre, earning $250. a week. Now all the Finkles are theatrical folk. Papa Finkle was the father of the

So you think you know this fine

LAW, PAUL MUNI

And here we have Muni the artist, portraying the difficult role of Emile Zola, with Erin O'Brien-Moore.

Muni in a mood. And it looks pretty serious. But don't let it fool you—he has his gayer moments.

Jewish theatre in the United States; Bella's and Lucy's mother, Emma Finkle, was a famous actress; and both Bella and Lucy have appeared on the Yiddish and English-speaking stage.

Lucy, serving her apprenticeship as a girl in her teens, went to every performance she could. One night she went to the Irving Place Theatre to see "The Lily," in which Paul Muni played a middle-aged man, a friend of the family to whom everyone brought his troubles.

"Because of his make-up I couldn't see his face," Lucy told me. "But what attracted me were his hands. I always judge people by their hands. His looked full of character, slim and sensitive.

"When I went home I told Mama how much impressed I was by Muni's hands. Of course, he had acted well, but those hands—no one but a real artist could have them."

At the time, Bella was playing at a rival theatre, the National Theatre, and she had never met Muni.

Fate has a way of working things out according to her own designs. Shortly afterwards at a party given by some theatrical friends, Lucy spied Paul Muni.

"Look, there's the actor with the hands," she whispered to Bella.

"Hush, Lucy," Bella whispered back, "don't be silly."

Their hostess introduced Paul Muni to them. "I wanted to tell him how grand I thought his performance was," Lucy laughed, "but even to my childish eyes it was obvious he didn't know I existed. From the minute he saw Bella, he had eyes for her and no one else."

No shy lad, Paul. Immediately he made a date with Bella and started courting her. He was serious at once.

"Mother was crazy about Paul the first time she met him, and kept telling Bella what a wonderful young man he was. And notwithstanding what has been printed, Bella thought a good deal of him, for once she began going out with Paul, no one else had a chance.

"About three months after they met, she went to Atlantic City for a vacation."

Evidently Muni could not stand being without her, for he followed her the next day, and they came back engaged!

"They were a mighty dizzy couple," Lucy chuckled. "Instead of buying something for themselves in Atlantic City, they bought Mother a silver engagement ring, with a huge jade stone in it. To her dying day Mother prized that ring.

"Two months later, on May eighth, Bella and Paul were married. Before their marriage, they had never played together, though they had wanted very much to appear in 'Maytime,' the stage play, in which Paul was to be the old man playing the comedy role—the one who chases all the young girls—and Bella, the young chorus girl he finally marries.

"But Bella's employers refused to release her from her contract, so Paul had to play his part without her."

Shortly after they were married, they went on tour together. They were as happy as two larks.

"When they came back, they bought a house next to ours in Brighton Beach, and we all spent a good deal of time together," Lucy said. (Continued on page 80)

actor? Well, here's someone who reveals things you never suspected

Lola Lane and Ramon in a torrid scene from "The Sheik Steps Out." Finishing it, R. stepped out — on Hollywood.

"We've seen men get attention before," marvels our correspondent, "but Novarro topped 'em all."

A NIGHT WITH NOVARRO

BY MARY PARKES

YOU MAY remember that Ramon is the only known gent in captivity to have beaued the glamorous Greta Garbo to the New York night spots. According to all reports, they had a large evening, but nobody ever knew exactly what they did or where they went. They were secretive about it.

But we can and will tell all—well, almost all, about our night with Novarro.

It had its moments. Mebbe not the kind you're thinking of, but moments to us. For example, there was the one when we found ourselves stumbling down the aisle of the Ethel Barrymore Theatre behind a very confused little usherette.

Ramon gallantly halted her with, "Please, let me. You know I used to be an usher."

He found 'em, too, in the twinkling of an eye.

There was the moment when we were almost knocked down and walked upon by a mob of yelling women trying to get at Ramon, clutch his coat tails, pull his tie, get him to sign autograph books. We were scared. It was our first experience of such ilk, but Ramon didn't seem to mind a-tall.

There was the moment when—but, let's go way back to the beginning.

Ramon, finishing up his first picture, "The Sheik Steps Out," after returning from Europe, decided to spend a first holiday in New York in a long time.

We met in the lobby of the Savoy Plaza Hotel at six o'clock to make an evening of it—dinner, theatre, a night club. Ramon was punctual to the dot, looking exceedingly debonair in a dark blue suit and carrying a radio script under his arm. He broke the sad news that we were to have an hour's interruption of our fun while he did a radio broadcast over WINS. But, first, dinner at Luigi's!

"I've just heard of it," he beamed. A big Italian garden, waterfall, trees, tables outdoors, delicious food. It's on Fifty-Eighth Street near Eighth Avenue. You would like? You would! We go."

We hailed a cab. But—the taxi-cab driver looked bewildered. He'd never heard of Luigi's. Couldn't find it listed, but—we started.

We toured sundry streets up and down. No luck. Finally, from Mr. Novarro, with wrinkled brow, "Maybe it was Forty-Eighth Street."

A dirty look from the cab driver, but he made a daredevil turn in the middle of the block and headed hence. Eventually, from the host hanging out the taxi side and checking door numbers, came a shout, "It's there. Stop."

Now Ramon's face lighted up. Ah! It wasn't Luigi's. It was Leone's he was looking for. Aside from having the wrong name and street address in mind, Ramon was as near right as most members of the male sex when they start out to find a new restaurant. However, it did look delightfully cool; there was a waterfall, and there were shade trees in the garden.

We were given a big table and a good one right near the fountain. Waiters hovered about—we never saw so many or had such attention in a New York eatery before! There was an impressive looking menu.

"Please," said Ramon, "let me order. You like Italian food? Yes? We'll have Italian dinner all. I know what will be good."

He knew all right. And what a meal our sheik for the night ordered.

It was almost eight when the waiter brought the check, and we had to rush to get to the radio station. We felt stuffed. I must have gained at (Continued on page 87)

TRY, TRY AGAIN

Phyllis Brooks is the happy answer to the perseverance adage

BY MARTHA KERR

I AM an actress," stated Phyllis Brooks simply, "because my mother was not."

And that direct statement, ladeez and gen'men, aptly characterized Fox's blue-eyed potential star. No, there's no beating around the bush for Phyllis, nor is there a "rully, I wouldn't care to answer that" in her system. You ask the questions and she'll answer 'em—willingly and unflinchingly.

"Many a less sensitive soul than I would have shuddered at the thought of another try at the movies," the Brooks volunteered. "You see, contrary to most reports, I'm no novice when it comes to having my face and figger struck in celluloid. No, indeedy. I've been on the coast before—for two different companies. Each gave me a contract with an option and when the option came due—well, let's say that some careless person permitted it to lapse.

"Wasn't it Bette Davis who said that she called her dog 'Option' because no one ever picked him up? That was practically my story. Of course, I could tell the one about my asking to be let go, that I was miscast, that—well, you know how it goes! However, being fair to myself, nobody paid too much attention to me. They had originally found my face on a toothpaste ad and usually transferred it to the cutting-room floor. Bitter? No, not I. I learned an awful lot through disappointments and waiting around. While it perhaps didn't do much toward developing my ego, it certainly gave me patience and perspective. I got to know what not to do—in case I ever got a chance to do it."

Under the Brooks blond tresses, there beats—a brain. She knows what she wants—and that, you'll admit, is half the battle—and goes after it. Detours to her goal only served toward determination, not discouragement.

About a year ago, when her second contract exploded, she met Edna Ferber, who was about to put "Stage Door" on Broadway. After several interviews and a reading or two, Phyllis was selected to play the role of a dizzy damsel who wanted to be a movie actress simply because she was "a little ermine coat and big swimming pool" addict. Immediately it was announced that Miss Brooks was cast in this important production, every picture company along the gold coast made her offers.

She considered and, having learned by experience, turned them all down. Phyllis figured that a season on the stage would do wonders (Continued on page 74)

Phyllis realizes now that it's one thing to have a movie contract and quite another to work in a movie.

Their Beauty

Here's how the Glamor Girls get that way and—what is more

WHAT DO the stars do to keep beautiful? To keep thin? To put on a little weight? Betcha they're forever running to beauty parlors and masseuses, huh? Do they diet, exercise, or both? Is So-and-so a real blonde? Is this true, that true, the other true?

I've just returned from Hollywood. All my friends (and dear me, suz, it's marvelous how many friends I have all of a sudden) have been asking me questions, questions, questions. I told 'em all to go fly a kite—that I'd been out there to collect just as much stellar beauty information as I could for y-o-u, and if they wanted to know the answers, they could find them in MODERN SCREEN.

This is the basic beauty low-down on the stars: They're all pretty good-looking, of course. That is, they must have good figures, although they have figure faults, too, even as you and I. They have interesting, photographable, but not always beautiful, faces. But they have to keep after their good looks, watch and tend their figures, skin, hair, teeth, hands and general grooming much more assiduously than you and I. Some of their tricks to keep in trim and to improve upon Nature, I am going to pass along to you.

First place, I found out that there are more ways of keeping slim than you could shake a stick at. Of course, none of the stars are out-and-out fat, or they wouldn't be stars. Their problem is the lump-and-bump problem, the problem of excess flesh cropping up in the wrong places.

Carole Lombard, now, has a little trouble keeping her streamline hips streamlined. Her answer to the problem is exercise—definite corrective exercises. Here is a good one: Sit on the floor, bracing yourself with your hands placed behind you. Your legs are to be kept absolutely straight. Roll from side to side. That's all there is to it. But do it for twenty minutes every morning, and watch those bumps disappear.

Carole finds that she can eat pretty much what she pleases, within reason, and even indulge in a sociable cocktail without doing any damage, just as long as she watches "them hips" and does the exercises faithfully. She plays quite a bit of tennis, which keeps her fit generally, but will not reduce her a particle in the desired spots. Remember that, all of you! Athletic sports in general will keep you trim and in good condition, but they'll not chase away localized fat.

Alice Faye, who could be quite plump if she'd let herself, goes on a diet of fruit juices one day a week. She takes six ounces of fruit juice every two hours. Tomato juice, orange juice, grapefruit juice—or you could take grapefruit and pineapple juice mixed half and half, if you find the grapefruit too acid. This stunt, incidentally, gives the stomach a much-needed rest. It's a good idea for anybody except very thin people.

Myrna Loy has a grand figure, and she has no trouble

Do you think the sleek Alice Faye doesn't have her "figger" worries, even as you and you? Guess again, m'loves!

Myrna Loy has a grand figure to start with, and that helps, but she's not resting on her streamlines just the same.

Secrets

at all keeping slim. It happens that she dotes on salads, likes every vegetable that grows, and doesn't give a hoot about desserts. All of which is a help to any figure. However, Miss Loy gives herself a ten-minute workout every morning to keep her body supple and to make certain that the muscles, especially the abdominal muscles, are kept firm.

She touches the floor with her hands ten times, bending directly forward and not bending the knees. Then ten times to the left side, still without bending the knees, and ten times to the right. This is good for the waistline, not only to keep the spare tire away, but also for the grace of the body generally. Then she sits herself down on the floor and, still without bending the knees, touches her fingertips to her toes twenty times. She finishes her workout by putting her head on the floor, between her knees, ten times, the legs still kept absolutely straight. That's a dancer's exercise, not easy, but awfully good for what ails you.

DEANNA DURBIN—there's a darling, if ever I met one—is too young to have the lump-and-bump problem, but she has some of the problems of the so-called awkward age. On the screen, while she's thinking about herself, she can keep an excellent (Continued on page 96)

Even that youngster, Deanna Durbin, has the beauty problems of the awkward age to cope with. But she's one smart girl, and you can bet she's out to lick 'em.

Carole Lombard's answer to the beauty problem is definite, corrective exercise, done daily.

Nat's been a jack-of-all-trades and master of—all! Here he is with Jessie Matthews in "Gangway."

PENDLETON, the PROMOTER

BY ROBERT McILWAINE

MANY A poor, benighted soul has talked himself out of a good job, but Nat Pendleton has talked himself into one after another even if, at the time he was in a conversational mood, there wasn't a job in sight. Yep, when it comes to personal promoting, our Nat puts the circus barker to shame with the confident spiel he gives his favorite product—himself. But—and here's where he has you—he's good, and he knows it.

Pendleton recently returned from abroad, where he occupied himself making "Gangway" with Jessie Mathews. And so, we wanted to know his initial impression of Europe. The question seemed to slightly irk him.

"Hey," he said, "this wasn't my first trip across! It was my tenth. I was over before the war; in business in Lisbon. I worked for an oil company here and they sent me over, originally to Egypt, but the Big Fight broke out and the Arab who was in charge there had ideas of confiscating the plant, so he didn't want me around. The company then sent me to Portugal and it was there that I ran amuck.

"I spoke Portuguese, so I took over the firm's books. The old man who had been there for years returned to find a new system of bookkeeping in effect."

"What sort of bookkeeping?" we asked curiously.

"Well—you know—bookkeeping. Anyway, to get on, the fellow ranted and raved, threatening to have me fired. I told him that I was running the show and if he didn't like it, he knew what he could do! In fact, if I decided to have a bon fire and light up all the tanks, it was strictly my affair.

"The funny part was the guy took me literally and wired the company that I was about to set fire to the works. I got word to return to America at once, so I cabled that if they wanted to fire me, to do it and allow me the passage money back. They did just that and the old gent tried to give me passage on a boat that took about twenty days and only cost eighty dollars fare. D'ya think a Pendleton would stand for that? I wouldn't and told them the only line I'd sail on was the Spanish. They were the only boats that weren't fired on—to say nothing of their being the most expensive. Anyway, I got the passage money and with it went into business in Lisbon.

"I had quite a business, too—importing and exporting." To our inquiry of what sort of business, Nat replied, "Why I exported goods and imported goods. Pendleton Importers and Exporters, was the firm." Well, that took care of that!

Nat can get himself a job—even if there isn't one to be had!

Miss Peggy Stevenson

A CHARMING GOLFER FROM THE NORTH SHORE OF LONG ISLAND . . . WHO ILLUSTRATES THE IMPORTANCE OF HEALTHY NERVES

Watch Peggy Stevenson tee off calmly before a crowd (below) and you can well believe that her game is never upset by jangled nerves. "It takes healthy nerves to play a good game of golf," Miss Stevenson remarked recently, "so my smoking is confined to Camels. They're mild!"

Copyright, 1937, R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Winston-Salem, N. C.

PEGGY, lovely daughter of the Philip Stevensons of Glen Cove, Long Island, has been fêted from Newport to Palm Beach. In clothes, Peggy's taste is simple. Note the nubby woolen jacket she wears above—a "comfy" for the golf she enjoys so much. Her cigarette preference is Camels. "After nine stiff holes of golf," she says, "I'm not so fresh as when I started out. But Camels give my energy a lift! And they are gentle on my throat." Turn to Camels. Like Miss Stevenson, you will find that Camels are so mild that you can smoke them steadily without their getting on your nerves.

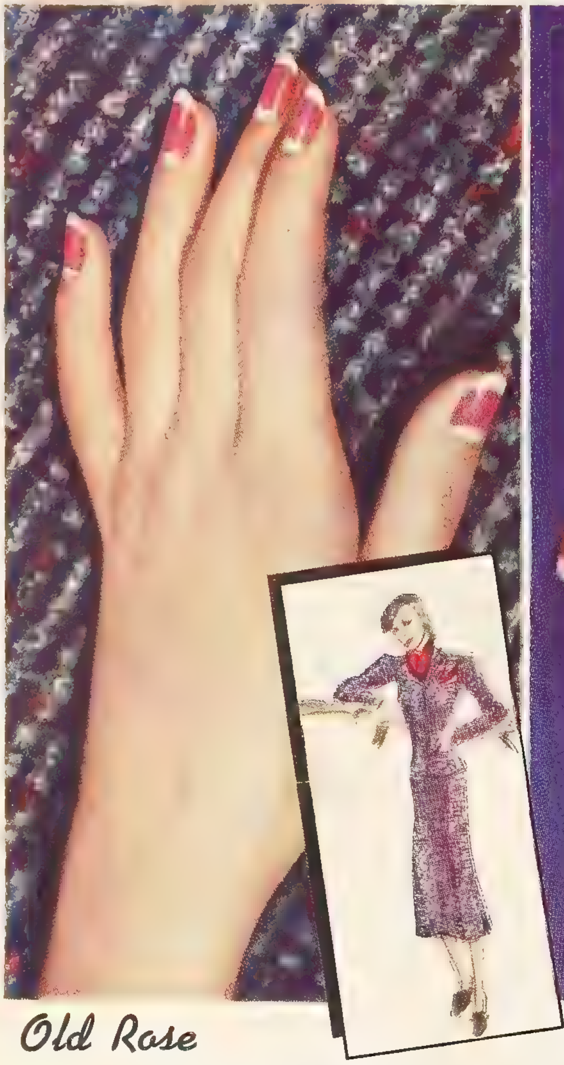
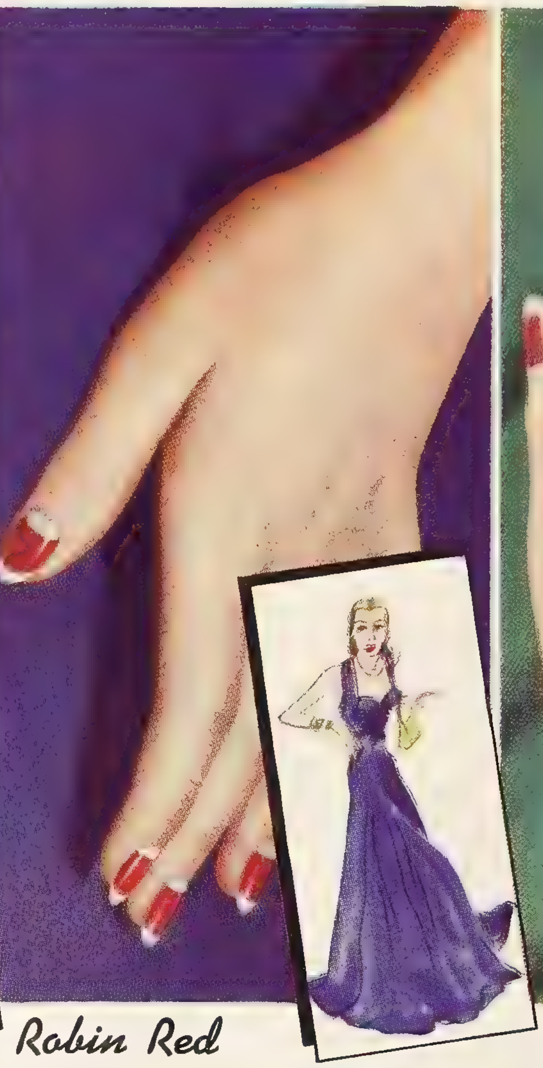
FOR HER FALL WARDROBE MISS ELYSE LAW CHOOSES

3 "Smoky Nail Shades"



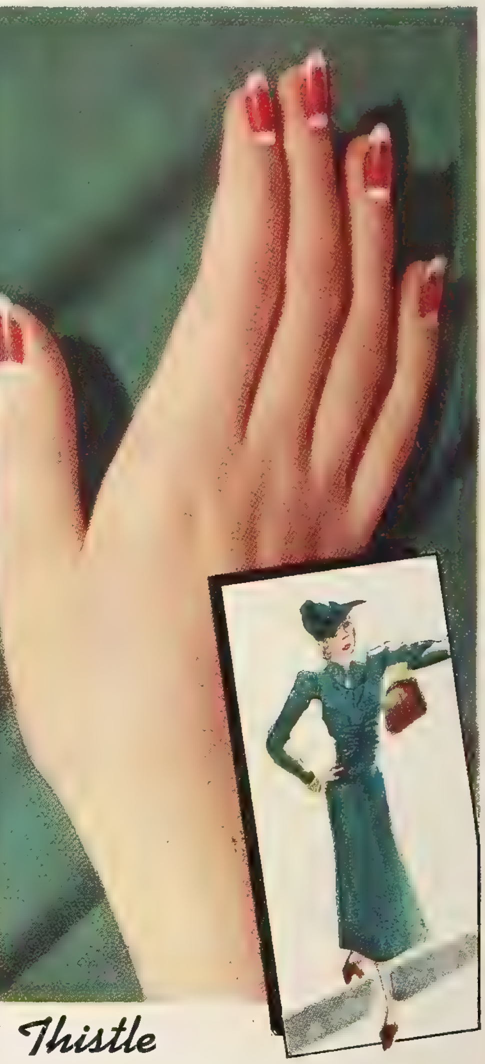
Old Rose

For country week ends in Del Monte, Elyse Law chooses a suit of the new tapestry tweed, in clover-lavender. "Cutex Old Rose is heavenly with it!" she says.



Robin Red

Miss Law will wear this gown of royal blue to the Spinster's Ball at the Palace Hotel, this Fall. "Won't Cutex Robin Red be marvelous with it?" asks Elyse.



Thistle

Miss Law has chosen Albany green for a town dress to wear lunching at the St. Francis Hotel. She picks the new Cutex Thistle for this . . . a rosy faun color.

SAN FRANCISCO'S smart younger set boasts one of the loveliest debutantes ever presented to Society. Elyse Law's beauty is the kind that is only seen once or twice in a lifetime . . . Divinely tall, slim, with hair that shines like wheat in the sun, a faintly golden skin, blue eyes deep-set under a high, pure brow.

She's a very vital young person, too! Golfs, swims at Pebble Beach, Santa Barbara. Adores far places . . . has traveled a lot. Likes music, the theatre. And has a really extraordinary flair for color and design in clothes.

In composing her color harmonies, she uses the rich and subtle new "smoky" nail shades with unusual imaginativeness. "I never get tired of playing my Cutex nail shades against costume colors," she says. "I wish every girl appreciated what exciting possibilities they offer as contrast."

Now—this new Cream brings to Women the Active "Skin-Vitamin"

Applied right on the Skin—this special Vitamin helps the Skin more directly

"IT'S WONDERFUL," says Mrs. C. Henry Mellon, Jr.

one of the first women to use Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream. "It's wonderful," she says. "My skin is so much brighter—and finer textured. The new cream is even better than before. Congratulations to Pond's—and to all women."

Badminton and horseback riding are Mrs. Mellon's favorite sports. Both of them mean the out-of-doors. And the out-of-doors dries your skin. Mrs. Mellon says: "The new Pond's Cold Cream with 'skin-vitamin' in it keeps my skin better than ever. It's never dry or rough now, in spite of sports."

THIS NEW CREAM does more for the skin than ever before! It contains a certain vitamin found in many foods—the "skin-vitamin."

When you eat foods containing this vitamin, one of its special functions is to help keep skin tissue healthy. But when this vitamin is applied right to skin, it aids the skin more directly.

Here is great news for women!

First doctors found this out. Then Pond's found a way to put "skin-vitamin" into Pond's Cold Cream. Now everyone can have Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream!

Famous beauty cream now has "Something More"

Pond's Cold Cream has always been more than a cleanser. Patted into the skin, it invigorates it, keeps it clear, soft, free from skin faults.

But now this famous cream is better than ever for the skin. Women say its use makes their pores less noticeable, softens lines; best of all, seems to give a livelier, more glowing look to their skin!

Same jars, same labels, same price

Already this new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream is on sale everywhere.

The cream itself has the same pure white color, the same delightful light texture.

But remember, as you use it, that Pond's Cold Cream now contains the precious "skin-vitamin." Not the "sunshine" vitamin. Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not "irradiated." But the vitamin which especially helps to maintain healthy skin—skin that is soft and smooth, fine as a baby's!

TEST IT IN 9 TREATMENTS

SEND FOR THE NEW CREAM!

Pond's, Dept. 9MS-CL, Clinton, Conn. Rush special tube of Pond's new "skin-vitamin" Cold Cream, enough for 9 treatments, with samples of 2 other Pond's "skin-vitamin" Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10¢ to cover postage and packing.

★★★ The Prisoner of Zenda

If you're in the mood for a romantic tale of mythical kingdoms, handsome heroes in costume and beautiful princesses, "The Prisoner of Zenda" is certainly your dish, for it's tops in that field of entertainment. Lavishly produced, its gorgeous settings. make an ideal backdrop for the romantic doings of Ronald Colman and Madeleine Carroll, for the swashbuckling antics of Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., and for the plottings of David Niven, C. Aubrey Smith and Raymond Massey.

Ronald Colman is perfectly cast as the adventurous Englishman who rules a kingdom for a few days because of his amazing resemblance to the actual king. In his brief hour of glory he is fortunate enough to win the love of Madeleine Carroll, fight a thrilling duel with the younger Fairbanks, and thwart a dastardly plot by the evil Mr. Massey. At the end, he relinquishes the throne and the princess to the rightful king (whose role he also plays), and disappears nobly over the horizon.

In the supporting cast, Madeleine Carroll retains her status as one of the most beautiful, but hardly the most capable, ladies of the screen. Mary Astor is colorless in the role of Raymond Massey's sweetheart. Massey himself is properly sinister in his role of pretender to the throne, and Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., overacts in his customary fashion. C. Aubrey Smith is effective as one of the king's aides, and David Niven takes second acting honors with a fine humorous portrait of another of the monarch's men. Directed by John Cromwell.—Selznick-International.

★★★ Big City

"Big City" is pure hokum all the way through, but it's good entertainment for weary audiences who are jaded with million dollar musicals and the so-called "goofy" high comedies. Actually, it's nothing but an old-fashioned western brought to town. The hero is a cab driver instead of a cowboy, and the villains are gangsters' henchmen instead of rustlers. Everything else fits right into the pattern. The hero is honest and the villains are unscrupulous, there's a chase, and the thing is climaxed with a terrific mob fight involving such personages as Jack Dempsey, Man Mountain Dean, Jimmy McLarnin and a host of names right out of the sports pages.

Spencer Tracy and Luise Rainer are the picture's stars. Tracy turns in a grand performance, which should rank among his best. Miss Rainer's work is adroit and often delightful, but she is much too talented to allow herself to indulge in those spells of overacting. The gents from the sports world acquit themselves creditably and there are good performances by Joseph Schildkraut, Eddie Quillan, Regis Toomey, William Demarest and Charley Grapewin. Directed by Frank Borzage.—(M-G-M)

★★ Something to Sing About

You probably didn't know that Jimmy Cagney is now a song-and-dance man. Neither did we, until we saw "Something to Sing About." Jimmy hoofs, sometimes in the manner of Fred Astaire and sometimes in the manner of Bill Robinson. He's not as expert as either of these two gentlemen, but he's surprisingly good. And since no Cagney picture is complete without a fight, it won't be news to report that this one features a slug fest which will satisfy even the most rabid Cagney fans.

"Something to Sing About" is a picture about the movies. Cagney plays a band leader who comes to Hollywood to act. Because his producers want to build him up as a romantic hero along with their foreign heart-throb (Mona Barrie), he is forced to conceal the fact that he has a wife (Evelyn Daw). As the plot unravels one is treated to a good share of laughs and a lot of action. All in all, it's a first-rate picture which should please most any audience.

Jimmy Cagney turns in a top-notch performance as the band leader. Evelyn Daw displays an excellent voice, but she needs more coaching on her dramatics. Gene Lockhart does a swell take-off on a producer, Bill Frawley is amusing as a press agent, and Mona Barrie furnishes grand comedy in the role of the temperamental foreign star. Directed by Victor Schertzinger.—(Grand National)

★★ Make a Wish

Master Bobby Breen makes another appearance in this one. So you know what to expect. Bobby again runs the gamut from A to Z and the scale to high C. However, we can recommend this picture above "Rainbow on the River" because of a capable supporting cast and an excellent setting for a boy's picture.

A camp in the North Woods is the locale, and it is here Bobby goes to spend a summer with some two hundred other children. The campfire songs, with Bobby as soloist and a chorus of boys' voices, are outstanding. But when the boys decide to put a musical version of "Rip Van Winkle" in order to earn money for charity, but really to give Bobby a chance for some of his cuter cut-ups, we weren't so enthusiastic. Across the lake from the camp lives a composer, Basil Rathbone, who is struggling to get out a new musical comedy for a Broadway show. He lacks inspiration and is having a pretty tough time of it, until he meets young Bobby. And when Bobby's mother, Marion Claire, puts in an appearance at the camp, Basil just whips the score out. Miss Claire is a former singer, but has promised to give up all stage aspirations to please Ralph Forbes, a very dependable and stuffy gentleman with a million dollars or so.

Marion Claire has a pleasing screen personality and a good singing voice, Basil Rathbone gives a good performance, considering its obvious limitations and Ralph Forbes and the rest of the cast are adequate. Directed by Kurt Neumann.—(RKO-Radio)

★ The Life of the Party

A year ago, this combination of dizzy farce and music would have been regarded extremely funny. Today the nonsensical plot is on the down grade, and "The Life of the Party" is routine insanity, if there is such a thing. What we mean is that "The Thin Man" started something which audiences are beginning to regret. You can take just so much of that sort of thing.

This one is loaded with names, everyone from Parkyakarkus to Gene Raymond —from the ridiculous to the sublime, one might say. In between are Harriet Hilliard, Joe Penner, Victor Moore, Helen Broderick, Billy Gilbert and several incidental songs and dances. Story has something to do with a gay young millionaire and a society belle who wants to break into show business. Confidentially, she finally breaks in. (Continued on page 106)

Fun in the Hospital

sleepy you eat breakfast at eight, you eat lunch at eleven-thirty, you eat dinner at six—on the dot. I didn't know that. I had an idea—not that I ever gave it deep thought—that a hospital was run along the lines of a hotel, American plan.

"Now I'm used to having my meals when I get around to them, and I didn't see why I should change just because I was sick. Anyway, I resented it. I thought they ought to come tiptoeing to my bedside, laying their white hands on my fevered brow, et cetera. Instead this nurse comes barging in, all bright and cheery, and planks down a tray. I gave her a withering look—that's what it was supposed to be, at least—and turned on the other side. I think I said, 'Eat it yourself and choke,' but I can't be sure. Those first days I never could tell whether my thoughts came out or sort of died away in my throat. Most of them would have been better off dead. Anyway, when I woke up at eleven, the tray was gone.

I SAID 'I'd like some orange juice.' The nurse said, 'You'll be getting your lunch soon.' I said, 'I don't want lunch, I want orange juice!' She went away, and she didn't come back. I thought, 'How long does it take to make orange juice in this dump?' It wasn't a dump, it was just the way I felt.

"At eleven-thirty sharp, in she marches with lunch. I combed the tray for a sign of orange juice. There wasn't any. You see, I looked weak and I couldn't talk very loud, which must have given them the impression I didn't know what I wanted. Well, I managed to clear up that point, but if you think it got me my orange juice, you're wrong. There's some rule that says you can't squeeze orange juice in a hospital between eleven and one. It gets the cook mixed up. It gets the whole hospital mixed up. It's like bringing a mouse to a tea-party. They all get upset and start dashing around, looking white. But it doesn't lead anywhere. I finally got hold of a nurse who must have had something on the cook, or else she knew how to squeeze oranges herself. Believe me, I hung on to her.

"Then there was the time they decided I should have a hot bath—in a bathtub. That was the second week. A man came in pushing a wheelchair, all for me. He had that look of pride and benevolence on his face, like a Boy Scout coming to take the baby for a stroll. It was my first wheelchair ride, and I was pretty impressed. They wrapped me up in all sorts of blankets and hats and towels and bedroom slippers, and wished me good luck, and hoped I'd come back safe, and off we started on this great adventure.

"We rolled up corridors and down corridors and across corridors, and saw all kinds of interesting things on the way—doors and windows and fire-escapes, and when the doors were open, we peeked in and saw patients lying down and sitting up. The big thrill, though, came when we passed one window, and the kind man stopped to let me look outside. There were people going calmly about their business and cars whizzing past and children frolicking, just as if the world hadn't stopped ten days before. 'Look!' I said to the man. 'What's there to look at?' he said. 'I don't see no accident!' So I told him to drive on.

"Finally we came to an elevator and went down a floor and rolled around some more, and by that time my coachman seemed to be lost. Out in the wilds of one of the wings we met a nurse and asked for directions to the bathroom. 'Let me see,' she said. 'I seem to remember giving someone a bath a couple of weeks ago. Take the first turn to your right, go a couple of miles till you come to a drugstore, bear left till you see a boulevard stop sign, and I think you'll find it somewhere around in there. If not, come back, and I'll try to think of something else.'

SO we finally came to a door marked Bathroom, but the architect must have changed the specifications. Or else the X-rays and things piled up in there were waiting for a bath. Anyway, there was no room for us. You'd have thought by that time we'd have called it a day and gone home. But we decided to be a couple of dauntless spirits and never say die.

"After half an hour or so, we came across somebody who'd once heard tell of a bathroom on the top floor. She'd never seen it herself, it was one of those legends handed down from nurse to nurse, but we were welcome to it. We sailed clear up to the top floor, and there, sure enough, we found a bathtub. At home we'd have called it a washbasin, but I'd had my mind for an hour and a half on a bath, and I wasn't going back without one.

"So I struggled out of my hat and carpet slippers, and folded myself up like one of these folding rulers and got in. When I tried to wet my shoulders, my feet hit the ceiling. When I tried to drag them back, I skinned my elbows on the floor. The soap flew out, because there wasn't room for both of us, and when my toes got tangled in the stopper and jerked it out, I began getting leery. 'Am I supposed to be doing a comedy blackout or taking a bath?' I asked the man. 'Search me,' he said. So I got out.

"After I was back in my nice little white bed, I asked the nurse about this bathtub situation. She was very soothing. 'People in hospitals are supposed to be sick,' she said. 'When they're well enough to bathe, they're well enough to go home to do their bathing.' "

"Is that a hint?" I demanded.

"If you like to take it that way."

"I'll go home right now. I'm not a guy to hang around where I'm not wanted."

"You'll stay right here till the doctor tells you to go.".

The doctor sent Jim home at the end of the second week. He lives with two friends in a household refreshingly unlike a hospital, in that it knows no routine. When they're hungry, they eat. When they feel like dining in state, the cook prepares a meal. When they don't, they grab a hot dog and run.

His housemates welcomed him back with song and rejoicing. Word spread abroad that Jimmie was home where he belonged. Friends trooped in, brimming with honest relief. "Gee, we're glad you're O.K. again, Jimmie. What can we do for you? How about a nice, juicy hamburger? Bill brought his sax along. We thought you might like a little music. How about a spin in Hal's new bus?—eighty miles an hour."

"How about a little rest and quiet?" asked the doctor, coming in to find him entirely surrounded by good will and looking a little green around the gills.

Something must be going on to get Bob Montgomery and Basil Rathbone so excited. They're pictured here at the Beverly Hills Tennis Club

"I'm all right," Jimmie protested. "My friends just dropped in to welcome me home."

"When did you have your last meal?"

"Oh—not long ago—this morning, I think. But I had it—all kinds of things. Milk—and milk—" His voice trailed off.

He was rescued by friends with a well-regulated home in Brentwood, established in a quiet wing of the quiet house, left to bask or read on the sunporch and watch the grass grow. He stayed three weeks and did exactly as he was told. Because, however lightly he may garnish the story now, there was just one thought fixed firm in the back of his mind—to get well as fast as he could.

HE makes no bones about the fact that the whole business had him frightened stiff. He'd known that people got sick and went to hospitals, sure—but what had that to do with a sound young man who'd never known illness in his life? Then suddenly here he was, Jimmie Stewart in person, laid low, racked by pain, delivered helpless into the hands of an enemy he could neither understand nor fight—except by following orders. So he followed them.

"And I've sworn off being sick," he informs you. You've grown used to the gleam of banter behind his gravest statements, but this time there is none. "Don't smile. I mean it. It's just something I've made up my mind to, same as you might make up your mind to swear off cocktails or painting your fingernails red. I've given the matter deep thought, and find it's not worth the money or effort.

"I'll be ready for work soon. I think my next picture is "Men of Brimstone" with Wallace Beery. Then I go back to finish "Vivacious Lady." But next time I'm tired, I'll go to bed. And if I feel that Yosemite can't get along without me, I'll go up and spread myself under a tree and count leaves. Try it some time when you need a sedative. Beats sheep all hollow. Nice cool green instead of a dirty white—"

"And talking of counting, do me a favor, will you? Count up the times I've said 'sick' or 'doctor' or 'hospital' in that story, and send me a bill. Even if you pay in toothpicks, you've got to play fair. Then, while you're about it, you could do me another favor. Spread the word around that nobody's ever to ask me how I feel. I'm feeling fine, and I'm going to stay that way till the end of the chapter. That's my last word on the subject," he announced.

And our last word on the subject is, more power to you, James.

toward raising her movie stock. And she was right. She scored a personal hit in the play and a Twentieth Century-Fox contract proved part of her reward.

This young lady spends her free time studying. Dancing, reading aloud, coaching with a prominent director. She goes into the proverbial conniptions, if her work doesn't please her.

"It's the most awful feeling, not giving a good performance," she remarked. "You see, it's nobody's fault but your own. There you are, out there in front of everybody, just being bad. If you're a painter, you can say the light was wrong or the colors not true, or something. If you're a writer, you can find explanations for a bad job if you look hard enough. But when you're an actress! Gosh, if you're not good, there is no one to charge it to but yourself."

Phyllis Brooks was trained from infancy to tread the boards. Her mother would love to have been an actress when she was a girl, but parental objection finished her career before it had time to get started. Therefore, she determined that her child would amount to something in the theatre.

And so, when many other little girls skipped rope and made dolls' clothes, Phyllis learned to recite and perform arabesques. It was no hardship, for the ambitious youngster took to "play acting" like the traditional duck to water.

She got her formal education "on the fly," for the family moved from town to town during her early youth. However, Phyllis did grab off a diploma in New York and, no sooner was it framed, than she met John La Gatta, famous illustrator. She became his pet model. Whenever there was an especially handsome job to be done, La Gatta called on Phyllis and, as soon as her likenesses found a market, she received more posing calls than she could handle. However, it was the toothpaste ad that gave her her movie chance.

"Well," she said, "when I passed that first movie test, I thought my future was assured. Little did I know that it is one thing to be under contract to a big studio, and another to be cast in pictures. Whenever it looked as if I were actually going to work, someone else slid into the role.

"Don't misunderstand me. I did appear briefly in a few pictures, but was allowed to do nothing that would warrant a studio's keeping me on. Repeated inferior roles made me determine to get back to New York and I know now that it was a step in the right direction."

Being one of the most preferred blondes, Phyllis still insists that she has no immediate matrimonial intentions. Cary Grant seems to be her best beau, for they are seen everywhere together. However, she claims there is nothing serious about their attachment and, since forthright Phyllis makes the statement, it's apt to be authentic.

No, she is interested in work only, these days, and if her former complaint was the lack of it, that is not the trouble now. Miss Brooks was delectable and amusing as the affected English girl in "You Can't Have Everything" and she has just been awarded the lead in "Dangerously Yours." She will make a few more pictures and then return East for a season on Broadway. That is to be part of her annual schedule.

Her studio realizes "it has something there," when it comes to the beauteous, talented Brooks, and so, they are determined to do right by our Phyl.

THE MAUCH TWINS. (First printing. Total number of requests 367). The Mauch twins like to whistle, play they're G-men, eat ice cream cones 'n' green apples, dodge their spinach and school work, and trade things—knives, marbles and personalities. They kid their mother sometimes by swapping clothes, and even though Bobby's one-eighth of an inch taller than Billy, she can't always tell the difference. They kid you, the fans, too, for in each picture, 'tis rumored, they play one scene as the other member of their twinship. That is, Bob plays Billy and Bill plays Bob, and by the end of the picture the producer's apt to be playing Napoleon in a nice quiet asylum. See if you can spot the dupe scene in their next picture, scheduled to follow "The Prince and the Pauper." At this writing, it's called "A Prayer for My Sons."

The boys began to act by appearing in local entertainments in Peoria, Ill., where they were born July 6th, 1924. A theatrical manager signed them to sing and dance, and it was just a hop from there to stage and radio engagements. Unlike most grown-up actors, they didn't have themselves a time at all in getting the breaks, for twins with personalities like theirs are scarcer than natural blondes in a Hollywood studio. They appeared on Lucky Strike programs, the Beauty Box Review, March of Time and Show Boat.

Billy got the first summons to work in movies. He was playing in a Broadway musical comedy, "Mr. Smith," at the time. He signed up to portray the boy Anthony in "Anthony Adverse," and, of course, Bobby went along as his stand-in. And, of course, you know what happened. When the director'd been out late the night before and was napping, they did their quick change act—Bob played Billy and Billy played Bob. Anyhow, Bobby got in some film acting experience before he was officially an actor.

During the making of "The Prince and the Pauper," Errol Flynn became their idol. Their mother says they wanted to dress like him, talk like him, and even regretted they hadn't been born in Ireland instead of Illinois. But even Flynn wasn't immune from their pranks. He'd been talking to the boys about his lion dog, and being smart boys, they knew he was spoofing them. So they spoofed him right back. They put a wolf skin on an Airedale and, with innocent faces, they told Errol they had a rare wolf dog.

Lately, Billy's eyes have bothered him a little from the strain of the studio lights, and he's had to wear glasses on and off. Mostly, though, they're off Billy and on Bobby. Yep, they've found one more way to fool their mother and bosses.

The only dilemma the lucky pair's been faced with so far is finding enough stories to act in. Stories, good stories, written around twins, aren't turned out every day, you know.

The Mauch movie salaries are three hundred and fifty dollars apiece, and Mrs. Mauch receives another one hundred and fifty for their care and guardianship. But the thrifty twins make pin money just the same by collecting and selling old bottles. They play baseball, tennis, field hockey and football, toss a mean ping-pong game, collect stamps and box. Red's their favorite color. They're about four feet ten (subject to change without notice) and have blue eyes and brown hair.

GLORIA DICKSON. (First printing. Total number of requests 246.) Not glamor, but yensomeness is the word which describes Gloria Dickson, the twenty-year-old blond girl who stepped right out of a WPA play into the lead of Melvyn Le Roy's movie thriller, "They Won't Forget." In case you're vague as to the meaning of the word, yensomeness is a coined term which means she's the kind of a girl you hanker to go back and see again, once you've seen her. It doesn't mean she's necessarily beautiful, though Gloria is that, too. It doesn't even mean she's got sex appeal, though Gloria has that, too. It means she has a subtle something which the camera catches and exaggerates. When the public sees that something, it goes ga-ga. All the toppers have it, of course—Power and Flynn and Durbin and Temple—and Gloria's sponsors, the critics and her growing number of fans assure us that the young Dickson has this box-office commodity in abundance.

Her real name's Thais Dickerson, and she was born in Pocatello, Idaho, Aug. 13, 1917. During her school days, which weren't very long ago, she did some footlight amateuring in a play called "The Melting Pot," and incidentally, this is still her favorite play. On leaving school, she trouped about the country for a time with a tent show. Each night's gate was divided among the players. Gloria drew anywhere from one dollar and ten cents to three seventy-five a performance.

Small wonder that she found herself, eventually, out of a job and in need of funds. A girl friend suggested that, since she was living with her mother in Los Angeles at the time, she apply to the Federal Theatre there. She promptly applied, and not so promptly, got work. First, she played Diane in "Seventh Heaven," then followed "Holiday," "Smiling Through" and "The Devil Passes."

It was right after the final curtain of the final performance in this latter play that a talent scout from Warner Bros. ceremoniously passed a card into Gloria's dressing-room. Thinking it was just a gag, she unceremoniously tossed it into a waste basket. But second thought made her rescue it, and shortly afterwards, in came the testing scout to invite her over to his studio next morning for a screen test. You can bet Gloria arrived in time to take it. The next thing she knew she'd passed the test with flying colors, and was being signed to a contract and offered one of the most coveted leading roles in Hollywood.

She lives quietly with her mother in a small apartment at the present time, and has a great desire to travel, which not even her tent-show days has cured her of. She loves nice clothes, and would like to shop in Paris, as who wouldn't. Purchasing coats, gloves and bags is her pet extravagance. And she can't resist bargains in costume jewelry, though she seldom wears it. She keeps fit by walking, swimming, playing tennis and riding horseback. In fact, she likes all sports—excepting prize-fights. She's five feet four inches tall, tips the scales at just one hundred and thirteen pounds, has blue-grey eyes and natural blond hair.

Right now, she's interested most exclusively in carving herself a bright, bright career.

HAWAII

Golden Pineapple Slices

Brush pineapple slices with melted butter, place in a baking dish, sprinkle with a little sugar and place under broiler until they begin to brown. Remove from broiler, place a marshmallow in the center of each. Place in oven until marshmallows are puffed and golden brown. Use as a garnish for sweet potato or a meat platter.

MARYLAND

Baked Chicken, Maryland

a 3-pound frying chicken
1 teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
flour
1 egg
1½ tablespoons cream bread crumbs
½ cup butter
½ cup boiling water

Singe, clean and disjoint chicken. Wipe each piece clean with a fresh towel—do not wash. Sprinkle with salt and pepper, dredge lightly with flour. Dip each piece separately in egg beaten with the cream, then roll each piece in crisp bread crumbs. Place prepared chicken in large greased baking pan. Pour melted butter and water into bottom of pan. Bake in hot oven 30 minutes or more, or until tender, basting frequently with the liquid in the pan. Remove chicken to hot serving platter. Add 1 cup milk to liquid remaining in pan. Thicken to taste with flour mixed to a smooth paste with a little water. Season and pour over chicken or serve separately in gravy boat.

MIDDLE WEST

Magic Sweet Potatoes

2½ cups mashed sweet potatoes
2 tablespoons melted butter
½ teaspoon salt
6 marshmallows
½ cup fine bread or cracker crumbs
1 egg
2 tablespoons water
deep fat for frying

Boil sweet potatoes until tender, peel. (Or use canned sweet potatoes which are excellent for this purpose.) Mash potatoes thoroughly—putting them through a ricer or food sieve will do a quicker and more thorough job of it. Add melted butter, mix well. Divide mixture into 6 parts and shape each into flat rounds about the size of the palm of the hand. Place a marshmallow in the center of each, bring the potato up around each and shape as for croquette. Roll croquettes in crumbs, then dip in egg beaten with the water, then roll in crumbs again. Fry in deep hot fat (410°F.) until golden brown (2 or 3 minutes only). Drain on white paper kitchen towels. Serve very hot.

NEW ENGLAND

Molasses Oatmeal Cookies

2 cups sifted flour
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon soda
1 teaspoon baking powder
½ teaspoon cinnamon
¼ teaspoon cloves
¼ teaspoon nutmeg
1 cup quick oats
⅔ cup walnuts (3 ozs.) chopped fine
¾ cup butter or other shortening
1 cup brown sugar, firmly packed
2 eggs
3 tablespoons molasses
2 tablespoons hot water

Sift flour, measure. Add salt, soda, baking powder and spices and sift again. Mix in the quick oats and the chopped walnuts. Cream the shortening. Add sugar gradually, creaming well together. Beat in eggs one at a time. Add molasses and hot water. Gradually mix in the dry ingredients. Drop by teaspoon onto greased baking sheet, about an inch apart. Bake in a moderately hot oven (400°F.) 8 to 10 minutes.

VIENNA

Chocolate Almond Torte

¾ cup blanched almonds
4 eggs, separated
¾ cup powdered sugar
3 squares cooking chocolate, melted
¼ cup grated bread crumbs
3 tablespoons milk
1 teaspoon vanilla
2 tablespoons flour
½ teaspoon baking powder
⅓ teaspoon salt

Either grate the shelled, blanched almonds; or put them through a grinder; or chop them very fine. Separate eggs. Beat yolks until thick and lemon colored. Add sugar gradually, beating well. Add melted chocolate slowly. Mix in the prepared nuts. Meanwhile soak breadcrumbs a few minutes in combined milk and vanilla. Add breadcrumbs mixture to first mixture, together with the flour, baking powder and salt. Mix thoroughly. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites, gently but thoroughly. Turn mixure into a very lightly greased spring-form or tube pan. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 30 minutes. Reduce heat to slow (325°F.) and continue baking 15-20 minutes longer or until cake tester inserted in cake comes out clean. Remove from oven, invert in pan onto a cake rack and allow to cool before removing from pan. Spread top with icing. If desired, the cake when cool may be split and an icing spread between the two halves.

It's three o'clock in the morning and is Herbert Marshall tired! That's what the night spots do, Bart!

No doubt about it, this night life gets 'em. Look what an evening's gaiety does to Maggie Sullavan.

When nothing else goes on, La Gaynor whiles the time away with a little game of handies—or something.

Where's that girlish enthusiasm Mary Carlisle usually displays? Surely, the food can't be that bad!

From the coast comes word that despite all the hullabaloo about selections for "Gone With The Wind," three top spots have definitely been cast. Margaret Sullavan is to play Scarlett O'Hara, Clark Gable Rhett Butler and Walter Connolly has been chosen for the important part of Scarlett's father.

Anna May Wong is now at Paramount where she is making a picture entitled "Daughter of the Tong." If it is a success, she is set for a series of similar productions with the same company. And speaking of Miss Wong reminds us of the story she told upon her return from China recently. Imagine her surprise the next day when she saw herself in headlines thusly: "Anna May Wong to wed prominent Cantonese named Art."

Perhaps you never give the property department of a studio much thought. But they certainly deserve a lot of credit. For instance, for Shirley Temple's new picture at Fox, they needed eight sabre cuts for some extras in a duelling scene. A call was made to the prop department and quick as a flash the wounds were delivered—eight strips of red tissue paper and a bottle of glue.

Mary Astor has stage ambitions—but she's willing to work at it besides talk about it. For that Santa Barbara play in which she appeared recently, Mary traveled a hundred miles every day, in order to work here at the studios during the day. Interesting to note, that after many people thought Mary's career was definitely on the skids, she's had the best year of her life—with her cinema and domestic life both taking a turn for the better. However, we learn from reputable sources, that Mary hasn't broken off that one bad habit—she still keeps a diary.

FELLOWS NEVER LOOKED AT HER

until she found a way to add 11 LBS. QUICK with IRONIZED YEAST

NEVER HAD A DATE WHEN SHE WAS THIN. NOW EVERYBODY REMARKS ABOUT HER BETTER LOOKS, AND SHE HAS ALL THE DATES SHE WANTS!

Posed by professional models

"I KNOW what it is to be skinny and pale. The fellows never look at you. Finally I got Ironized Yeast tablets. Soon I felt a lot peppier, my skin got smooth and in just 4 weeks I gained eleven pounds. Everybody says how pretty I've gotten and I have all the dates I want."—Ella Craig, Lancaster, S. C.

Thousands gain 10 to 25 lbs.

Skinny, friendless girls who never could gain an ounce, have easily gained 10 to 25 pounds, normally rounded curves, this new easy way—in just a few weeks! What is more, this new discovery has given them naturally clear skin and normally lovely color, new pep and charm, loads of new friends and popularity.

Scientists have discovered that many are thin and rundown simply because they do not get enough yeast vitamins (Vitamin B) and iron in their daily food. Without these elements you may lack appetite and not get the most body-building good out of what you eat. One of the richest sources of marvelous health-building Vitamin B is the special yeast used in making English ale.

Now by a new and costly process, perfected after long research, the vitamins from this imported English ale yeast are concentrated to 7 times their strength in ordinary yeast! This 7-power vitamin concentrate is then combined with three kinds of strength-building iron (organic, inorganic and hemoglobin iron); also pasteurized English ale yeast. Finally, for your protection and benefit, every batch of Ironized Yeast is tested and retested biologically, to insure its full vitamin strength.

The result is these new easy-to-take, marvelously effective little Ironized Yeast tablets which have helped thousands of the skinniest people who needed their vital elements quickly to gain just the normally attractive pounds, natural development and peppy health they longed for.

Make this money-back test

If, with the very first package of Ironized Yeast, you don't begin to eat better and get more enjoyment and benefit from your food—if you don't feel better, with more strength, pep and energy—if you are not absolutely convinced that Ironized Yeast will give you the pounds of normally attractive flesh you need—your money will be promptly refunded. So get Ironized Yeast today.

Her Brother-in-Law, Paul Muni

"Mother was as fond of Paul as if he were her own son, and he was mighty fond of her. Almost every day Bella and Paul would drop in. Paul would sit on Mother's lap, hug and kiss her. Always he asked for her advice on what he should do about certain roles. There was no in-law trouble between Paul Muni and us.

"In fact, if any misunderstanding had arisen, I'm quite sure Mother would have taken Paul's part, for she was so crazy about him.

"She used to tell people about a prank he once played upon her. One day there came to the back door an old beggar, shabby and forlorn-looking, with a long grey matted beard. Out of watery eyes he peered at Mother, and launching into a hard luck story, he begged her for a handout.

"It was a hot day, and her heart melted at the plight of this poor old man who said he had no family or friends. So she invited him in, gave him a glass of lemonade, and went to get her pocketbook.

"When she came back into the kitchen, it was to find the old beggar howling with laughter. It was her son-in-law, Paul Muni!"

WHAT was Paul like in those early days?" I asked Lucy.

"He hasn't changed very much," she confessed. "Always, he has lacked faith in his abilities. Today, he's blue and discouraged when he's shooting a film. My sister has to advise, criticize and encourage him constantly. He'd be lost without her.

"Fifteen years ago he underrated himself, too. I remember he came home one day very moody, because he felt sure he had made a mess of his performance in a new play.

"The next day my sister went to the theatre, and anxiously asked his fellow-actors how badly he had performed. 'Badly,' they said in astonishment. 'Why, he was magnificent.'

"She watched the play that day, and Muni was grand in it, but it took a good deal of talking on my sister's part to convince him of this.

"Another way in which he has remained the same is in his moodiness. Naturally a serious person, Paul becomes upset and worried easily, and becomes moody and downcast when things go wrong.

"I remember years ago he came in looking terribly tired, and threw himself on the couch, glum as could be. A few minutes later I was startled to see him kick his feet up into the air, whistle, and throwing himself off the couch, begin to clown.

"At the beginning it took us time to accustom ourselves to his moods, although, since we all come from theatrical, emotional stock, we were mighty sympathetic. I guess we're all a little nuts.

"Gradually, Bella has become so accustomed to his moods that hers now coincide with his. And intimate friends aren't shocked at all when they walk in and find Muni prancing about, walking on his head, and clowning!

"Paul is one of the greatest teases I know, and he always has been. But it is a privilege to be teased by Paul, for he teases only people he loves dearly."

Lucy is not married, and Muni constantly twits her about it. "He's always on the lookout for a suitable mate for me," she laughed, "and whenever he hears of some half-wit doing something idiotic, he'll say, 'Don't you think he's good enough, wouldn't you be able to like him? I'll fix it up for you.'

"If ever he feels he's hurt my feelings, he'll come right over and apologize, throw his arms around me, kiss me and say, 'There's a good kid. You know I'm just fooling.'"

He teases his wife unmercifully about being superstitious, for Bella has all the superstitions of stage folk, and then some. The very idea of giving stick-pins or brooches or any pointed object as a present horrifies her. After she's once started for some place she'll never come back for fear it will bring hard luck, and she'll never walk under a ladder or whistle in a dressing room. When Bella sees a black cat she winces.

"The amusing thing to me," Lucy confessed, "is that gradually and unconsciously my brother-in-law is becoming superstitious and avoiding the very things Bella is afraid of.

"It's just, I suppose, that married people grow more and more like each other with the years."

There's one thing for which the entire Finkle family is grateful to Paul Muni. That's teaching them to be punctual.

"We all were in the habit of being ten, fifteen minutes or half an hour late for appointments," Lucy explained. "When Bella and Paul were sweethearts, she was always late. But Paul would be so angry she grew more and more punctual, and today she's as accurate as he about time and never arrives a minute early or late.

"In time we knew better than to keep Paul waiting. He has no patience with latecomers, and explodes.

"I know many people misunderstand my brother-in-law, and say he's high hat," Lucy told me.

"Really," leaning forward earnestly, "he's nothing like that. Off-stage he's the most unstagy, unpretentious person you ever saw. It's just because he doesn't make friends easily, and is rather reserved unless he knows you well, that people get the wrong impression.

"Nor is he the type who believes in personal publicity, in broadcasting anything he may do for others. Such matters, he feels, are private. I know of several people whom he has helped to movie careers, but he'd shoot me if I divulged their names. Once he's sure that you have the goods, he'll go out of his way to help you. And if you fail, he considers it a personal reflection upon himself.

"If he doesn't feel you are competent, neither heaven nor earth can get him to help. He'd rather make enemies than help someone incompetent. Fifteen years ago he was like that, and he's like that today."

When he was starring in the Yiddish theatre, a close relative, an actress, wanted to get a job with his group.

"All you have to do, Paul," she told him, "is to recommend me to the manager."

But Muni refused. To his wife he explained, "She could never hold a job in our company, for she can't act. It would be cruel to place her."

Of course, to this day this woman believes it was only selfishness that motivated Muni, and they have been estranged for years. Paul Muni preferred to hurt someone he loved dearly, rather than get her a job when he felt she was not entitled to it.

"While he's perfectly willing to help any of us," Lucy added, "he's so proud when we stand on our own feet. We feel, too, that it is unfair to try to bask in his glory.

"He has offered to help further my musical career, but all I want is his moral support. I'd rather make my way on my own, even though it takes longer, and I know he agrees with my viewpoint."

Never once in the many years she was on the stage did his wife permit Paul Muni to help her get work.

Though she earned less than she might have if he had exerted his influence, that was the way she wanted it. And, should she ever decide to return to the stage, while her husband would not stand in her way, she'd be strictly on her own.

"Once my brother-in-law was heartbroken because people insisted he had used pull to get Bella a job on Broadway."

As was, and is, her custom today, Bella goes to all rehearsals with her husband. It was at the second rehearsal of "Four Walls," one of the early plays in which Paul Muni starred on the English speaking stage. No actress had been selected for the role of Bertha, a poor girl who loves a man hopelessly, and doesn't get him. Muni was to play this man.

June Lang isn't pining away over her wrecked marriage these days—and here's the reason. His name is Morry Morrison and he's veddy social register.

Seeing Mrs. Muni sitting near the platform, John Golden, the producer of this play, asked her if she'd read the part of Bertha. So well did she read it, that he said, "We've been searching the city for someone to play Bertha and here you are."

So Bella Finkle became Bertha. And to this day no one believes her own merit got the job.

TO Lucy, Paul Muni's amazing capacity for proving a real friend to his in-laws is unusual.

Three years ago, when she was touring with a theatrical troupe in South America, she got an attack of appendicitis. Knowing how her family would worry, she didn't let them know. But one of the girls in the troupe wrote to friends saying Lucy needed an operation, and they told Muni.

"He knew how frightened Bella would be, so he said nothing to her or to my brother. Instead, he phoned the hospital in Buenos Aires, where I was to be operated on, and ordering them to spare no expense, made arrangements with the head surgeon.

"Frequently he cabled me to find out what he could do to make me more comfortable, and of course, he paid all the bills.

"It wasn't till I was well on the road to recovery that he told my sister. When I tried to thank him, he laughed the whole matter off."

"I didn't do it out of kindness," he said, his eyes twinkling. "I heard you were ill the day we moved into our new Hollywood home. You know how superstitious your sister is. If I had told her, she would never have been happy there, for she'd have been prejudiced against the place from the start."

To her dying day, Mrs. Finkle, his mother-in-law, adored Paul. And do you know, when he bought his first house in Hollywood, eight and a half years ago, he picked out the nicest room and furnished it for his mother-in-law? Unfortunately, she died before she could go to visit 'her son,' as she called him.

"My brother, Abem Finkle, who is a script writer for Warner Brothers, is one of Paul's sincerest admirers," Lucy told me.

"And he's more than a husband to my sister, he's a real friend. They spend all their time together and he relies upon her judgment implicitly. She doesn't flatter him to hold him, either. She tells him the truth as she sees it, about himself, about his acting, his habits. There was only once when he felt she had erred in judgment."

That was after his first attempt at making motion pictures in Hollywood, when he flopped, and came East very much discouraged. Unlike most actors, he didn't blame Hollywood producers or the terrible picture in which he had been cast. He just blamed himself.

"I guess," he said sadly, "my wife and all of us have overrated my abilities."

It was his wife, incidentally, who persuaded him to try again in Hollywood.

In case you are interested in the hobbies of our greatest character actor, I'll let you in on a secret. Paul Muni is gadget-mad. Whenever he sees a gadget, he can't rest till he has bought it, taken it apart, and learned all about how it works.

"He's spent days experimenting with the best cleaners for phonograph records. He reminds me of a small boy who simply must take the clock apart, and put it together correctly," Lucy laughed.

"Once he solves something, he forgets all about it. Do you know he has a separate three-room apartment in his home, just for his gadgets?"

That fact alone should prove beyond all doubt, that Paul is just as human as the rest of us. He may be a great actor—when he's on the stage. But at home, he relaxes and he's just a nice guy who forgets all about fame and footlights.

And he'll never pass a stationery store without going in and buying something . . . paper, mucilage, pasters, posters, letterheads, stapling machines . . . he's got enough in his private quarters to start a store.

Another of his hobbies is the dictionary. Yes, I mean just that. He's got dictionaries in all sizes, shapes and languages. Since he reads a good deal of general literature, history and biography, he constantly has those dictionaries, every one of them, near him. And whenever he is in doubt about a word, he looks it up in all of them to catch the subtle nuances of meaning it may have.

If you were to ask him, he'd tell you that the real reason he bought a home was to have a place for all his gadgets!

Oakie Can Take It!

elect whom the gods leave, unevicted, in their place in the sun? If one should douse the twinkle in the eye, what would one find? It seemed worth while to find out, or try to. I determined to get serious with Oakie if I had to tear his heart right out through his wise-cracks.

While I lay in wait for Oakie, one of the prop boys added to my curiosity. He said, "That Oakie. He's a tonic as well as a panic. D'you know, he never forgets if it's a fellow's birthday or there's sickness in the family or anything like that. He's a lesson to every mother's quitter of us. He razzes the life out of us, but he can take it, too.

"Last week he ordered a bicycle. Said he wasn't going to wear out the Oakie patent leathers hoofing it about this man's lot any longer. The bike came. We uncrated it for him. And when we delivered it to him, we'd removed the regular saddle and fastened a horse's saddle on instead. We'd done a little paint job on it, too. We splashed 'Prez Oakie' in huge letters all over it. Oakie didn't turn a hair. He mounted that horse saddle just like he didn't notice, gave a wild western 'Yip-ee!' and went whizzing off down the lot. He left that horse's saddle on, and it's still on. That's Oakie."

I remembered a story Frank Morgan told me about Oakie. It happened some time before Jack's marriage. Jack and Frank were both in New York, stopping at the same hotel. Said Frank:

"I told Oakie one morning that I'd been to a barber shop the night before and had been manicured by the most beautiful girl I'd ever seen, in a long life of seeing to it that I see beautiful girls. She was worth

"I don't want you to come down with a bad cold. We're going to tackle it right now—at that very first sneeze. I'll just put a few drops of this Vicks VA-TRO-NOL right up your nose.

"Now the other side.

"There. Doesn't that feel fine! Notice how clear and comfortable it makes your head. Bet you couldn't sneeze now if you wanted to!

"Sure, Mummy does all this when she's here. But, shucks, I've got to keep up with the times, too, if I'm going to take care of a young lady all by myself.

"You know, Honey, Vicks made this Va-tro-nol on purpose for people's noses, 'cause that's where 3 out of 4 colds start.

"Even when I forget and wait till my own head is stuffed up tight, just a few drops are generally enough to let me breathe nice and easy again. And if you get after the cold early, like I'm doing with yours, why, lots of times it never does grow up into a real cold.

"'Course, some colds are plumb stubborn and get by no matter what you do. If you don't feel all better tonight, we'll get out the good old Vicks VAPORUB and give your chest and back a good rubbing, like Mummy does. Remember how good it made you feel that night when you started coughing?

"There's nothing like VapoRub when you're tight and achy with a cold. You seem to feel it working right through your skin and all the time you're breathing in those grand Vicks vapors. Before you know it, you're sound asleep just as if you'd never had a cold at all."

any man's pilgrimage to the shrine of the soap basin, I said. She was delicious. She was divine. Well, Oakie got all tottsied up, took a taxi and drove twenty blocks to that barber shop. He arrived, asked for the manicure girl, and was confronted by the plug-ugliest woman the Hand of the Potter ever shook in making! But he sat him right down, with that cockle-of-the-heart-warming smile of his and had himself a manicure! Because he wouldn't take even a chance of hurting the feelings of that poor girl. A girl he'd never be likely to see again. He didn't open his trap to me when he got back. Just showed me his trimmed cuticles. He didn't need to say anything. I was stopped and a bit ashamed. That's Oakie."

SO, over the luncheon table, I said to Jack, boiled in his boiled shirt, but beaming, "For the first time of all the times we've talked together, be serious, will you, Jack? Were you born this way? Or have you got this way, deliberately, with conscious effort?"

"I dunno, sister," said Jack. "Guess I was born this way, mostly. Guess it's hereditary. My mother is this way, too. Always has been. In all my life I've never seen her look worried, low in her spirits. I've never known her to be without a laugh. My dad was the same. My sister is the same, only more so.

"You may say, and rightly enough, that I've never had much in my life to moan and make faces about. Never had any terrible personal grief. I was born to swell, jolly parents, in a jolly home. I never had any of them there frustrations, complexes or like that. I didn't Suffer Through Adolescence.

"I fell into Wall Street, and even there, my mistakes came up smiling. I'd chalk stocks and things up on the board and make a lot of errors, and the next day, I'd find that the fellows who had taken my notations at their face value had come out on top. I fell into the theatre and onto the screen. No effort. No kicks. I got my dough out of the local banks before they closed their doors. With a puss like mine, you might suppose that I'd have had to support it and work pretty hard at the job. But no, it's supported me.

"Now I look back a bit, and I've begun to look back," Jack said—and for the first time in my long acquaintance with him, his gray eyes were sober—"now that I look back, I realize that I've always evaded life a little. I confess here and now, for the first time, that I may have used the laugh as a shield. Maybe it hasn't been altogether the breaks. Maybe it's been the breakaways, too.

"I guess I did run away from any emotion that couldn't be laughed at—or off. I made dates with that funny thing called love, and when love looked like it wouldn't be funny, I broke the dates. When I was getting kicked around a bit at the studio, I'd stall going into the Front Office and staging a big scene.

"I'd just crack, 'Say, they'll get me mixed up with Johnny Downs someday, and I'll be a dead pigeon.' Or I'd suck my thumb and go back to the bottle. That usually learned 'em. Because on the bottle, I'd pound desks and demand my rights.

"One time Lubitsch wanted me to make a picture. I didn't want to do it. He gave me the big sales talk. Finally I said, 'Okay, I'll do it. Call 'em up, and tell 'em I'll do it. But before I do it, I'm going to tip the jug a bit.'

"Lubitsch didn't wait to hear no more. He was on that phone quicker than an extra jumps into her hole when Garbo looks at her and said, 'Never mind about Oakie. Forget him. We'll get someone else for the part.'

"I had to take that, too. Not that it mattered. But what I'm getting at is this, before Dorothy Dell died, I was like that—escaping life at every street corner. No more.

BUT now," said Jack, "I'm not the broth of a boy I was. And I know why. You remember Dorothy Dell, don't you? You remember when she was killed? Well, that did something to me. Something I've never got over and never will. I hardly knew the girl. So there was no really personal grief to speak of. But I'd worked with her. I'd kidded around with her. And I'd seen her on the lot one day, young, peppy, full of life. And the next day—she was dead. Gone. I couldn't get over it. I've never got over it.

"And then Will Rogers died, and Irving Thalberg. Before them, Lew Cody. And I began to be aware of things I'd never been aware of before. Not only death, but grief and suffering, and how patient folks are and all the things that go where laughs are not. For the first time in my life I met up with something I couldn't laugh away. I've never been the same since.

"So now," said Jack, "it isn't as spontaneous as it used to be, the wise-cracking. I still play the fool, of course. It's bred in the bone. But it's like a kid who walked freely and without thinking, had paralysis, had to learn to walk all over again, step by step. He does walk again, but he had to learn how. I laugh now because I believe it's the way to beat any kind of rap.

"I've knocked around a lot. I've known everyone in this business. I've known the fellers in Wall Street, men and women in show business, in small towns, the good and the bad. I've never known one a laugh wouldn't help, if you could get it down. I've never known a grief a laugh wouldn't soften. I've never seen a love a laugh wouldn't lift out of desperation. I know this to be the truth. And so, why not laugh?

"There's plenty to laugh at still." Jack smiled a different kind of an Oakie smile.

"There's plenty to laugh at," he repeated. "Stuffed shirts, pompous celebrities inflated with the little gas of their own 'glamor.' That 'serious school of stars'—y'know, the kind that don't light up, the dead pan kind of whom the Intelligentsia say, 'But you can see what they are thinking.' I can't see, but I can laugh. The kind of stars that have grown awfully uh-uh—the kind I used to clap on the spine, say, 'Why you old so-and-so, you' and now have to give the 'Howjado, I'm sure—.' The fellows that go around, off-stage as well as on, giving it the do-re-mi-fa-so-la-si-do, getting their contracts out of their throats.

AND I also think you can laugh louder, longer and more often if you're not just interested in your own pwecious, pwiceless self. Now I think I'm a very remarkable fellow—on that point my Public and I are in perfect accord—but I do get a kick out of other people. All kinds of other people. I talk to the waitresses here in the café, to cab drivers, to prop boys, policemen on their beats, anyone who will listen to me. I even talk to big shots like the Kay Francis', the Hepburns, the Garbos. I'm not particular.

"Folks say marriage has 'settled me down.' Because I don't go the rounds the way I used to, stay up all night, shave the whiskers off and then go to work. I used to be all over the place, the bouncingest boy in town. Now I like to stay home. We're building us a house, overlooking the sea, my Little Woman and I. But we get a laugh a minute at everything, Venita and I. Maybe I've slowed down because I found something I couldn't laugh away. But I found out, also, that the thing to do is to keep on laughing—anyway."

That's Oakie. Now you know.

to the United States and where he put out another little masterpiece in promoting. He induced Bernarr Macfadden to back a movie company, called True Story Film Company. The versatile Mr. Pendleton was Vice President and General Manager in charge of production, for the short duration of this venture.

"Our first picture was called 'Wrongdoers,' and was pretty good, too," reminisced Nat. "It was a story about a kid who is taught to steal. Well, I got Lionel Barrymore, Henry Hull and Peggy Shannon for the picture with Dickie Moore playing the kid. In accounting for the expenses, I told B. M. what I was paying the cast.

"'I got Barrymore for three-fifty,' I said proudly.

"'Why didn't you get him for three hundred?' he asked.

"'The figure is three thousand, five hundred, B. M.' Well, the new picture producer nearly fainted until I explained that in seven thousand feet of film there were approximately twenty-one thousand pictures he could use for his magazines at no extra cost. He had world rights on them. Then all went well until we ran a contest in the Graphic.

"The winner was to get the leading role in our next film. Well, the releasing company wouldn't okay the girl selected because she didn't have a stage name. I sided with the releasers and that didn't set too well. But the final straw was when I bought a story outside. This couldn't and wouldn't be understood, not with twelve hundred stories in the publisher's files. So we split up."

IT wasn't long, however, before Luck again stalked Nat. An agent, who had supplied him with actors for his movie, decided to return the favor and give Pendleton a job.

"They were having trouble casting a role. It called for a prize fighter, but none of the actors who looked the part had the intelligence to read the lines right. I could do both so got the job and toured with Irene Bordoni in 'Naughty Cinderella' for fifty weeks. Fox saw me in it and tested me for 'The Big Trail.'

"When I did the test," Nat explained, "I padded my hip boots with towels—my shoulders too—and looked like a giant. Spencer Tracy was tested for the same role, but I got it. He's caught up with me since, though! I'm kinda sorry that I got off on comedy, because I should be doing that Tracy stuff now. You know, I wanted to play the part of the priest in 'San Francisco,' but the big boys said if I came out as a clergyman, everyone would laugh me off the screen and those that didn't would think it sacrilegious.

"Anyway, to get on, I went out to Hollywood for the picture. My first day there, I met Raoul Walsh, the director, and with one gander at me he said, 'Hey, I thought you were a big fellow. I don't want a midget playing this role. Another thing, your voice is too high.'"

Nat laughed and continued, "I explained that maybe my voice was a little high then, but I wasn't acting and when I did, it came over the mike much lower.

"'Well,' Walsh said, 'go out in the hills and holler till you're hoarse, then come back.'

"Do you know those hills in Hollywood? Well, I went up in the hills and for two days yelled my head off. When I came back, Walsh asked what I wanted. I explained about getting hoarse for the part and he said, 'Oh that? Well, we've got Tyrone Power for the role.'

"'Who, the kid?' I asked."

"'No, Tyrone Senior. Now, young fellow, go right down to the second set on the left and tell them I sent you for the Western.'"

"'But Mr. Walsh, they won't like that because I was sent out here to play in—'"

"'Don't argue with me, do as I say,' he snapped back. And so I was sold down the river to Westerns with George O'Brien.

"I did several pictures with O'Brien and found he had his own company of yes men who thought he was the last word. One day after we finished shooting some scenes, George stepped up to me and stuck his gun in my ribs, saying, 'I'm going to let you have it and teach you a lesson not to steal my scenes!' With that, one of his stooges let go with a forty-five right at my heels. That was to make me think he had really shot me. Well, I just caved in and fell to the floor, and they were running around like mad, putting cold towels on my head till the doctor arrived. I waited until he took out his stethoscope and then got up, dusted my hands off and said to O'Brien, 'Now let that be a lesson to you.' He nearly dropped and did he burn, but I didn't have any more of his practical joking while I was there."

We jerked back from the Arabian Nights tale of Scheherezade Pendleton to ask about his recent London trip. "Maybe it was a toss-up between Astaire and me," Nat kidded. "But I could hoof it and talk tough too, so I got the role. I thoroughly enjoyed working with Miss Matthews. And it was pretty nice to be treated with deference. You see, I know a little more about the picture game than most of them do over there—at any rate about gangster parts. They certainly made me feel I was somebody, not the way Hollywood does—taking you for granted!"

Nat explained that the reason most films made over there seem slow to us, is because the English sense of humor is so entirely different from ours. Too, after all, their pictures are primarily made for British and not American consumption.

The fact that Jessie Matthews goes over with a bang in this country, Pendleton explained to his complete satisfaction. "Well, you see, her forte is singing and dancing—and that is good in any language. She can't go wrong with a good tune and a nice bit of hoofin'."

"I do a little writing," Nat remarked modestly. "But I can only write about a subject when I thoroughly know it. I've sold one of my stories called 'Deception' to Columbia. It was about wrestling, and Leo Carrillo played in it with me. I've got a better one though. Does it have a punch ending! A scene where the ropes around the ring are wired with twenty thousand volts, so the promoter can knock off the wrestler if he doesn't do as he tells him! This guy is fighting the champion and the hero is supposed to be backed into the rope and bumped off, but the chump forgets and gets his hands burned off—so the hero comes out on top!

"Warners made me an offer for it, but they wanted Sir Galahad—I mean Kid Galahad—to play the leading role and that's what I want to play, so we didn't make a deal. But I've got those Londoners looking over the script so something may turn up on it at any minute.

"Then, of course, something may not."

And if it doesn't, be sure something else will, for Nat can always promote himself something good—and make good at it!

A Night with Novarro

least three pounds! Don't know about Ramon.

Once in the auditorium which fronted the broadcasting chamber, we found ourselves on our own. Mr. Novarro found a chair for us and then left us flat to retire to a corner and study his script. But the poor man had hardly sniffed the script when the gals in the audience started to move in upon him. A harem of 'em. One even brought him a box of flowers.

We've seen men get attention before, but Novarro topped 'em all. We felt kind of sorry for him. Seemed as if the director would never call him for his spot on the program. It evidently seemed that way to Ramon, too. He'd shake himself loose from an admirer, walk up and peer through the glass partition at the director with a wistful "Now?" on his lips. Finally, to our relief, and we kind of expect, to his, he was summoned.

There had been laughing and talking while the fashion reviewer, the movie chatterer, the orchestra were on the air, but for Ramon there was attentive silence. And then it was over, and we ran for the elevator which we found, surprisingly, manned by a cop in uniform.

"You stay right here while the other officer calls a cab," he warned. We wondered why, until we got out on the street, and there was this wildly yelling enthusiastic crowd of fans, pushing and pulling to get at Ramon. Six policemen with a rope held 'em back and made an aisle through which we hustled to the waiting taxi.

We had tickets for the hit show, "The Women," with its all feminine cast. We elbowed our way to our seats. We elbowed our way out again after the play.

Then to the Bedford Hotel roof garden. There, twenty stories above Manhattan, with the city spread before us—boats plying their way up the East River, the brilliantly lighted tower of the Empire State building to the right and the honking taxis and automobiles in the streets far below, we drew our breaths. And Ramon began talking about his European junket and his plans for the future.

"I have been away from Hollywood two years," he said thoughtfully. "Two wonderful years that I would not give up for anything, but I am glad to be home.

"Look," he said with a gesture toward the streets below. "See how little man is? You think you are so, so important, until you go up on a high hill or on top of a high building. Then you look down and see how insignificant man is. You see things at a distance, with perspective.

"Those two years I spent away from Hollywood can be compared to going up on a high mountain and looking back at where I have lived and what I have done. They gave me time to think about myself, to attain balance.

"I was tired and sick when I left Hollywood. I did not want to make any more pictures ever—I had two more, but we tear up the contract so I can go."

"WHY?" we inquired, "should you go away when you have pictures and money to make. Why not do them, collect the money and then go?"

"Well, I have some money," explained Ramon, as if to a child. "And to get more, I have to work more and give up precious time. I talk for years about going on a concert tour, but I never have the time. It is time that I take it, to make my dreams come true. I want to sing, I want to be an actor in plays. I have my little theatre in my home in the hills, but that is not enough.

"So I start out. First, there is the play in London with Doris Kenyon. It is called 'Royal Exchange.' It is a failure. I am inexperienced on the stage. They say I choose the wrong play also. But I do not know, I think it is good, and," defiantly, "maybe it was."

"Was that the one," we queried, "where they heckled you so?"

"Heckle me," expostulated Ramon. "They shout right out, 'Go back to Hollywood!' It was somebody in the gallery who had had too much to drink, but he started all the others. Then while I am standing on the stage trying to calm the audience, the curtain comes down on my neck. It make us all feel very badly, but particularly it is hard on my neck!

"All this happening is very bad for the life of the play. Bad publicity, bad for us. We do not sell tickets, so I put my own money in for two weeks, that the people who have rehearsed so kindly with us do not lose all their wages. Then we close."

It seemed to us that such an episode might break the spirit of an actor and send him scuttling home to the haven called Hollywood where all was admiration and not heckling. We remarked as much.

"No, that is not sensible," said Ramon. "I am starting a new career. Maybe I am not good at first, but that is true of everybody. When I begin to work for my living, I am first an usher, a waiter. I work in the Automat, then I get bits in pictures. I do all sorts of things to get started. You always have to fall down, pick yourself up and start over again.

"So then I prepare some songs for a tour with my sister who dances. We are in London and in the English provinces. We appear before the same people who did not like my play. This time, they like me now. We go to Dublin.

"Then we go through Europe. It is in Budapest that I have an unfortunate experience which comes about because I do not know all the tricks of show business." He paused. "Oh, it is funny now, but it was not so funny then.

"I hear later—and how I hear—that a news story comes out of Budapest saying that Ramon Novarro is broke and has to borrow money to get home.

"People read this and start to send me money. Yes, really. Not very much money, to be sure, but friends from whom I have not heard for a long time write and say, 'How much do you need?' Some people send me ten dollars in envelopes. I even get a couple of five dollar bills from fans who do not give an address so that I can send the money back."

"Were you really broke?" we asked.

NOVARRO gave a pained look. "No," he said, "no, no. That is silly."

"A Budapest theatre manager comes to me in London and says he will pay my railroad fare, my expenses and a good salary if I will appear for a week at his theatre. I go. I sing. It comes two days before I am to go to London, and I have received no money. I go to the manager and he says, 'I will pay you when you go. Be assured.' But I am not assured because I am told after I get to Budapest that this manager is crooked, and you have to get your money every day from the box office. I tell him I will sing no more until I get some cash. He will not give it to me. So I wire London. It is Saturday. The bank is closed. The bank is still closed Monday because it is Boxer Day.

"I am desperate. I wire some friends thinking they can send on a little, and so the story gets out I am broke. It is the hotel man who finally comes to my rescue and says, 'Mr. Novarro, do not worry, I will get your tickets, and when you get back to London, you send me a draft.'

"That was one of many things that happened to me. I would not have missed any of it. I finally come home because I have yellow jaundice which probably came from the food I ate traveling. I am in Hollywood resting when this picture, 'The Sheik Steps Out' is offered to me.

"I like it. It is like one I did once for Rex Ingram that was very good for me. I do not even talk to my lawyers about it or my friends. I think I like it. I will do it. That is part of the philosophy that I have attained. It is: do the things you think best, and do not worry.

"So I am back in Hollywood to stay." He gave a big sigh, which might have been a yawn. (In fact, we're sure it was a yawn.)

Now, we dunno what Garbo would have said at that moment, but after all, it was two a. m., so we said, "Ay tank ay should go home."

Mr. Novarro took us, pronto. And that, alas, is the finale to our "Night With Novarro."

The Awful Truth About Irene Dunne

ignored. Somehow, she wasn't the comedy type. Hollywood insisted on casting her in drama, with a song interjected here and there. Until Irene, herself, decided to do something about it.

In "Show Boat," she interjected a shuffle-clog in burnt-cork make-up. She sneaked to the sneak preview, unnoticed, to get the reaction to that one scene. The theatre rocked with spontaneous laughter. That decided her. She would make "Theodora Goes Wild."

"I received some awfully bad notices in 'Theodora,'" she told me, ruefully. "Some letters that said—a bit violently—that I ought to leave comedy to other people. But most of those who took the trouble to write in seemed to like the change. And all a sinner needs, to sin again, is encouragement.

I'M under contract to four studios. At one, maybe two, I'll do drama. At the third, I'll sing. But when I'm at Columbia, I'll do comedy.

"People, visiting this set and seeing me in this zany role, ask me, incredulously, 'Is it true you're going to make "Madame Curie" later?' I am going to make 'Madame Curie' later. And there won't be any comedy in that. Thinking of it, I say to myself, 'Well, Irene, while you are doing comedy, you'd better let yourself go.' So—I'm letting myself go. And having the time of my life."

She can't stress too strongly that comedy hasn't been forced upon her by the studio. She asked for it. And now she got it.

"It's funny, but the comedians all want to be tragedians, and the people who do straight dramatics would like to do comedy. At least, I plead guilty.

"I'm sure we'd all live years longer, if we let ourselves laugh more. And worried less."

Irene isn't much of a worrier. She never has been.

"I had an Irish father, who was easy-going—at least, with those around him. Life wasn't a trouble to him; it was a constantly entertaining experience, easy to enjoy. He was very beloved, very gay, especially with children. I know I had a grand childhood, pal-ing with him. And I think I've inherited his sense of humor, his outlook on life."

In other words, her enjoyment of laughter, her liking to hear others laugh—isn't something new for Irene. Irene has never had a dramatic success story to tell, because life has never been difficult for her. And this is why.

"You know," she said, "I can't remember ever being desperately discouraged, trying to become a singer, then an actress. I think my background and my sense of humor spared me." She smiled, in enjoyment of a thought she had just had. She told it to me. "I didn't get really discouraged until I was a star. Then I discovered that I had a battle on my hands, if I wanted to sing. They wanted me to do straight dramatics, and I wanted occasional songs. Ah, me—the troubles I've had!" She gave a sigh of mock distress.

Unlike other actresses who have come upon success by way of Melody Lane, she singularly lacks a reputation for being temperamental. I asked her about that.

"Oh, I fly at maids who leave hats on beds and shoes on tables and frighten them half to death, probably. But it's only a pose. I'm only trying out my acting on the home folks. I'm not as bothered as I make out."

I can readily believe that. I have seen her at work often enough. She has no primadonna complexes. She doesn't harass the people who work for her or with her, she mixes with them. At Columbia, she has the swankiest dressing-room of all, the penthouse atop the stars' building—and spends most of her time in the box-like crate on the set laughingly called a "portable dressing-room." She doesn't even have tantrums under provocation. As, for example, the other day:

She was having fashion portraits made. She was wearing a glamorous costume, very full, with semi-train. As you may or may not know, when a star poses for full-length fashion portraits, the folds of her skirt are pinned to the floor in careful array. Robert Kalloch, the designer, was there in person, to do the pinning. In the midst of the photographing, Kalloch was called away and forgot to come back. The photographing over, Irene couldn't move, without danger of shredding her costume—and the photographer didn't dare to try to remove the pins for fear of tearing it. Here was

New Cream brings to Women the Active "Skin-Vitamin"

BETTER THAN EVER FOR SKIN says
MRS. W. FORBES MORGAN OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

DOCTORS have known for some time that a certain vitamin is particularly beneficial to the skin. When we eat foods that contain it, this vitamin helps to keep skin healthy.

Then doctors applied this vitamin right to skin in cases of wounds and burns—and found it healed the skin more quickly! This is the "skin-vitamin" that you now get in Pond's Vanishing Cream.

Always grand for flaky skin. Pond's Vanishing Cream has always been especially good for a powder base and overnight softener.

But now, this cream is even better for the skin. Use it for helping your skin in every way. Its use makes the skin smoother, softer, softens lines; best of all, gives the whole skin a livelier, glowing look!

The same jars, same labels, same price

The new Pond's "skin-vitamin" Vanishing Cream is on sale everywhere.

Remember—it now contains the precious "skin-vitamin." Not the "sunshine" vitamin. Not the orange-juice vitamin. Not "irradiated." But the vitamin that especially helps to maintain skin health.

SMOOTHS ROUGHNESS AWAY

"I have always depended on Pond's Vanishing Cream," Mrs. Morgan says, "for smoothing little rough places. It's a grand powder base and overnight softener. But now with the new 'skin-vitamin' in it, it is better than ever for my skin."

a situation to tempt the temperament in any woman. But it struck Irene funny.

She told the photographer, "It's the first time in years I've felt anchored to any one studio. I guess you'd better telephone Mr. Kalloch and tell him I'm a forgotten woman."

And she had to stand as she was, where she was, for fifteen minutes before he arrived, apologetic, anticipating a storm. Instead, he heard, "Fine thing, standing a girl up, when she's going to buy her lunch, herself!"

Little things that would harass most stars amuse Irene. The other day, for example—a very hot day—she had to wear a dress of brilliant blue sequins. It clung to her. It wasn't comfortable. And when she took it off, she bore, only too plainly, the imprint of the sequins.

"I looked like The Tattooed Woman," she said. "It reminded me of the day I was married—one of the hottest days New York ever had. It was in mid-July. They threw confetti all over me. And when I changed to my traveling outfit, you should have seen me. I looked like a rainbow trout."

In the picture, she wears a dress of translucent glass beads—beads made from milk, hardened under pressure. Someone cracked that she was going around in yards of milk. And she flipped right back, "It's the only way I can take the product. Externally. I can't afford to get fat."

She has a flair for glamorous gowns, yet no star is so addicted to pajamas. She wears them constantly around home. She wears them to the studio in the mornings, and goes through her first rehearsal in them. "I like to start the day right," she told me. "Comfortably."

She also has a knack for having happy people around her. Her maid, Anita, is the most cheerful-looking star's maid I have ever encountered. But there is an explanation, I discovered.

Anita came in, unusually upset. The reason, it seemed, was that she had just escaped, by inches, from being struck by a reckless driver. "The way some people drive, you'd think they owned the street!" she said, indignantly.

"Yes," said Irene, "you'd even think they owned the cars." She's quick, like that.

And Anita's indignation vanished in a laugh.

Irene, herself, had a chance to be indignant the day before, and turned it down. It happened this way.

"I have a new nurse for the baby. She came home yesterday, after being with a maid nearby. The other girl had told her, 'Did you know this is Irene Dunne's third husband?' My nurse didn't quite believe it. She wanted to deny it and defend me—but she thought she had better make sure of her ground first. I got quite a bang out of that. That was one story I hadn't heard about my marriage.

"I thought all rumors about—and interest in—my marriage had been exhausted long ago. I've had bales of letters from people, saying, 'We're so sick of reading about your husband. Won't you please talk about something else?' I'm amazed every time a new rumor pops out at me. And amused.

"Maybe people still are waiting, or hoping, to hear me say, 'It's an ideal arrangement.' I won't say it. It isn't ideal. It's a necessary arrangement that happens to have worked out.

"There's only one new change in the arrangement. Dr. Griffin does most of the commuting now. We have a house now, after all these years. And the house happens to be in California. And," she added, with a smile, "in the house is a baby—too young to do much traveling."

SHE calls the baby by both her names—Mary Frances. A blonde with wisps of curls and tremendous blue eyes, Mary Frances has a smile that would enslave anyone around her for five minutes. I know—I've seen her. And Irene is enslaved. I know that, too. I've seen her with Mary Frances.

She is as proudly embarrassed as any young mother, when anyone comments on her child's prettiness. "But looks are so secondary in a child!" she told me. "All that we wanted was a child in perfect health, with a perfect background. And Mary Frances fitted the description.

"Now I hear that we're going to adopt a little boy as a playmate for her. It's so silly! It's hardly worth denying. You don't just say, 'I'm going to adopt a child,' and go somewhere and get one. You have to know the child and the child's background; you have to be so sure, in fairness to the child, that you can give him—or her—a lifetime of affection.

"For years, we had talked intermittently of adopting a child. I thought I wanted a boy—until I actually saw Mary Frances. Now I can't imagine another baby in her place."

It was more than mother-instinct that prompted the adoption. It was partly that old urge in Irene to have happy people around her. And children are happy people.

Irene, herself, is the happiest she has ever been in her life. You can't escape that impression, being with her, hearing her talk about her new life, her little girl.

"We have breakfast together, every morning at six. Most homes are so still then. But there is such life, such goings-on, in ours, at six in the morning. She calls me 'Mimi' or 'My Mimi,' with such feeling. And she definitely has a sense of humor. She never fails to imitate me when I've said something I shouldn't have said, like 'Uh-huh.' She's teaching me, as much as I'm teaching her. I don't like ocean swimming particularly—I've been knocked out so many times by breakers. But every time we go down to the beach, my baby screams at coming out of the water, not getting in. She'll probably make a swimmer out of me yet."

The Joel McCreas (Frances Dee) take in a preview. Joel looks like he's in a hurry or maybe he's just anxious to see how he turns out in "Dead End."

mandy house on a hilltop in Holmby Hills, Irene had a reputation for restlessness, constantly moving from house to house. But that reputation was an accident.

"I made a bad mistake, when I first came to Hollywood," she told me. "I didn't stop at a hotel downtown, where there would have been a little excitement, a little noise, a little life. I stayed in a hotel in Beverly Hills. I had a room over a garden, facing some little white houses. Regular little Dutch Cleanser houses. There I was, shut up in that hotel room by one of those heavy California dews, looking out over that garden at those little white houses. Nobody ever seemed to go into them, nobody ever came out. For three weeks, absolutely nothing ever happened. It just rained.

"When it looked as if Hollywood wanted me to stay, the first thing I did was to get out of that hotel room and into a furnished house. Any house. The one I rented, I could have for only six months; then I had to move. I never could seem to rent a place for any length of time. I always had to be moving.

"And—well, finally, I reached the point where I had to have a solid, permanent home. Also," she added, with a reminiscent smile, "I couldn't forget all the furniture we had, and no place to put it, except into storage. It had been there practically ever since our honeymoon . . . I think," she added, "I had a domestic urge."

Her favorite piece of furniture is a deep-cushioned easy chair covered in chintz, now in her library. "I'll never part with that chair. I can remember myself curled up in it, reading my first telegram from Hollywood, asking myself, 'Shall I go? Will I like it? Will they like me? Am I a movie type?'"

The rugs from the house came from Austria. They bought them on their trip abroad last year, spending far more than they intended, impelling Irene to cable a Hollywood friend, "Having wonderful time. Wish I could afford it."

The yard has no swimming pool, because, says Irene, "I've noticed a funny thing about people with pools. They don't know what to do with them. They practically have to beg people to come and swim, so that they can honestly feel they're getting their money's worth out of their pools."

The yard does have a garden, but Irene has given up trying to work in it. She says, in explanation, "It's amazing how gardening blisters your hands, through the gloves."

That would seem to make her out a softie. Yet she is the only woman golfer in Hollywood, and perhaps the world, who has ever made a hole-in-one, not once, but twice. How did that happen?

"The second time, I went out to the Bel-Air course, with only just so long to play. I had to go around quickly. So, instead of warming up, I started out with a terrific drive—and pulled some tendon in my arm. It was painful, but I dragged myself around the course. I wasn't to be cheated out of my game.

"Finally, the arm was so bad, I could hardly lift it. But on this one hole I lifted it enough to get off a long drive—hoping to save myself strokes. And plop!—it was a hole-in-one. My caddy goes back to the clubhouse and tells everybody. With the result that I have to buy everybody champagne. It seems it's a club rule, when anyone makes a hole-in-one. Even the women have to pay. Can you imagine it?"

She laughed and I had to laugh with her. She's like that. Always full of fun and ready to tell any kind of a story on herself. That's why everybody likes her, why she's considered such an easy person to work with.

As I said before, the awful truth about Irene Dunne is—the girl has a sense of humor.

TO HELP END THE CATHARTIC HABIT

Try This Improved Pasteurized Yeast That's EASY TO EAT

LAXATIVES? I NEVER NEED THEM ANY MORE!

YEAST FOAM TABLETS

At Your Druggist—Now in the New DOUBLE VALUE 30-Day Bottle

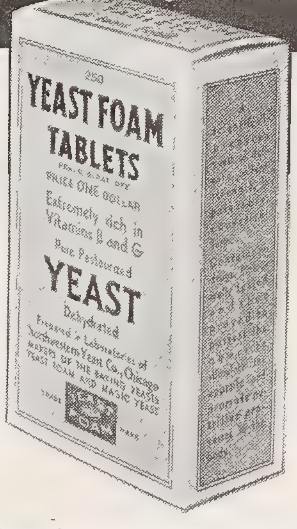
IF YOU take laxatives to keep "regular," you know from experience that drugs and cathartics give only temporary relief from constipation. Such remedies merely cause a drastic purging action. They do not correct the cause of your condition.

Doctors now know that in many cases the real cause of constipation is a shortage of the vitamin B complex. This precious factor is often deficient in many typical every-day diets. In many foods it is entirely lacking. When this factor is added to such diets in sufficient amounts, constipation goes. Elimination becomes regular and complete.

Energy Revives—Headaches Go

Yeast Foam Tablets are pure pasteurized yeast and yeast is the richest known food source of vitamins B and G. They should stimulate your weakened intestinal nerves and muscles and quickly restore your eliminative system to normal, healthy function.

Thus with the true cause of your constipation corrected, you will be rid of the evil cathartic habit. Your energy will revive.



Headaches of the constipation type will go. Your skin will be clearer and fresher.

Don't confuse Yeast Foam Tablets with ordinary yeast. These tablets cannot ferment in the body. Pasteurization makes this yeast utterly safe for everyone to eat. It has a pleasant, nut-like taste that you will really enjoy. And it contains nothing to put on fat.

All druggists sell Yeast Foam Tablets. Get a bottle today. Refuse substitutes.

That Hepburn-Rogers Feud

No feud, and here's why:

The two girls are friends. More, they have been friends ever since they first came onto the lot, both gangling, practically unknown and certainly unsung, freckle-faced (yes, both of 'em) and red-headed.

Ginger had made a few pictures for other companies. Late in 1932, RKO needed a young dancer to play opposite Fred Astaire in "Flying Down To Rio." They chose Ginger. Thus her career was born. A few months before that, in July, Hepburn came on from New York to a studio which, to put it bluntly, was definitely not sold on her. She made "Bill of Divorcement." Thus her career was born. Together, the two youngsters began on the same lot. And with careers such leagues apart, their friendship was conceived and grew.

They became stars. They have dressing-room suites on the same corridor and have had from the start. Make pictures at the same time. Report together to the make-up man and chatter amiably over cups of coffee and pots of grease-paint liberally provided by that master maker-upper, Mel Burns.

Ginger says, "Go ahead, Katie, your turn first," and Katie says, "No, you go first, it's okay by me."

Now about that matter of still pictures. As you may know, all major stars have a right to "kill" any stills of themselves which they do not like. The publicity department wondered when it realized that Hepburn and Rogers were united in a picture, whether one would kill stills another okayed and vice versa.

The department told me that it was pleasantly surprised. There was a lower mortality among stills than was customary. And one day an interesting thing happened. Katie was not working. She dropped onto the set for a visit. A group of proofs was handed to Ginger, who was so busy that she went over them hurriedly, passed them without really examining them. Hepburn noticed the casual okay. She went over them in her turn. One was swell of Katie, not at all swell of Ginger. Quietly Katie took it over to Ginger. "It's okay by me," she said, "but do you think you want it?" The still was killed.

They would come to grief over the matter of wardrobe, said Hollywood. Muriel King dressed Hepburn for "Sylvia Scarlett." The two girls are close friends. Katie wanted her to dress her for "Stage Door." Now, Muriel has also dressed Ginger, but she has done more for Katie, and there is the little matter of their personal friendship. The studio wished both girls to be dressed by the same person. What would happen?

Nothing happened. Hepburn played a wealthy girl, stage struck, trying to make a name for herself on Broadway. Ginger played a young dancer, trying to get a musical-comedy job. Both girls agreed that there could be no conflict between their wardrobes, and both agreed that, of course, Muriel King must dress them. So all was calm.

Neither girl, I am told, was ever temperamental on the set. No, not even Hepburn. She may be difficult with interviewers and photographers, shy and evasive with Mr. and Mrs. John Public. But on the set she was the equal of Ginger in coöperativeness and good humor.

The Best GRAY HAIR Remedy is Made at Home

You can now make at home a better gray hair remedy than you can buy, by following this simple recipe: To half pint of water add one ounce bay rum, a small box of Barbo Compound and one-fourth ounce of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it yourself at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. Barbo imparts color to streaked, faded or gray hair, makes it soft and glossy and takes years off your looks. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.

ANOTHER thing people wondered about was the tea-time hour. For years now, Hepburn has served tea and cakes to the entire cast at four o'clock. And people also knew that Ginger has a habit of serving ice-cream and cakes. Ginger so dotes on ice cream and allied confections that she has had a complete soda-water fountain installed in her new home. So what would happen?

Both girls laughed boisterously when they heard that this was rumored to be part of their feud. For what would happen, they asked the heavens? Very simple. Hepburn still brought the tea and cakes. Ginger still brought the ice-cream and cakes. And the cast and crew waxed fatter and fatter.

They disagreed at times, of course. Hepburn tried to sell Ginger the idea of flying. Hepburn won't travel unless she can fly, and Ginger is deathly afraid of the air. And Ginger often tried to sell Hepburn the idea of giving interviews, of playing the publicity game for her own good. Hepburn leaves the set the instant the last shot is made. She often hops a plane for New York with her make-up still on, so as not to lose any time. Ginger stays around until the final cutting and editing is done, interested in every detail. They argued about this point. Each failed to convince the other. But remained on excellent terms.

The real secret of their friendship lies, however, not in such external congenialities. I believe that I discovered the reason.

They both have a genius for realizing that people are as they are, and that you either accept them as they are, or you let them alone. And, they have the rare ability of letting each other alone. They sense the forbidden territories in one another and never trespass. Ginger, for example, loves to give parties and go to parties. Katie prefers to keep to herself when she is in Hollywood, doing her entertaining when she is at home, in the East. That's all right with both of them. Now and again, Ginger goes to Katie's house for a quiet dinner; now and again Katie goes to Ginger's for the same sort of an evening. Otherwise, they go their separate, social ways and no questions asked and no grudges borne.

Another secret of their friendship is that they laugh at the same things. It has been said that if two people in love can laugh together, their love is safe. Katie and Ginger laugh together, and so their friendship is safe.

THE first time I ever saw the girls together they came around the corner of one of the streets on their lot in Katie's disreputable Ford beach car. Katie was at the wheel, exceeding the studio's rigid rule of five miles an hour on the lot. Ginger was hanging onto the side. Both were dressed in the favorite attire of both—slacks. And both were laughing uproariously at some private joke of their own.

They pulled up at the main gate, tumbled out in a heap, accompanied by four assorted puppies, something that resembled an oversized picnic basket, another girl, and a huge Maltese cat. With a shout of greeting for a group of studio executives standing near, a nod to one of the most dignified of the women stars, they disappeared momentarily into one of the buildings, to reappear shortly minus the luggage but still accompanied by the menagerie.

They hopped into the car, Ginger still risking her million-dollar legs on the running board and disappeared in a cloud of dust, while the executives shut their eyes, folded their hands and prayed for the best.

Studio executives tell me that they never attempt to talk business to one girl if the other is around. Some horrid practical joke is inevitable. There is something about the pomposity of business which rouses their risibilities, fatal to anyone concerned.

They are constantly to be found, in odd corners of the lot, giggling over some new joke, frequently a practical number. Startled visitors recently who had been told they might be vouchsafed a glimpse of Ginger but never, never, never of Hepburn, beheld the pair of them perched together atop one of the huge ash-cans which are placed at convenient intervals about the studio. They were curled up there comfortably reading one of the gayer weekly magazines and chortling like school girls. Both were indulging in all-day-suckers.

Nor is "Stage Door" the first picture in which their studio almost cast the girls together. Ginger wanted desperately to play the role of "Queen Elizabeth" in Katie's "Mary of Scotland." She actually took tests for the role—under an assumed name. You know the rest. She got found out and that was that. The studio was a bit fearful about how the public would accept their favorite dancing star in such a very dramatic role. "Easy does it," they reasoned. And, of course, had Ginger played "Elizabeth," her name would have taken second billing. Juggle it as you will, say both girls, someone's name has got to be billed first. They never gave the matter a thought, they both aver, until the rumored feud set everyone a-fuming.

No, there were no fireworks. No feud. There is only friendship.

This is the "inside" of the most rumored feud Hollywood has ever tried to nurture on its broad buzzum.

Their Beauty Secrets

posture, but in everyday life, she's apt to forget. She'll slump, duck her head forward and walk badly if she isn't careful. So she does posture exercises. Walks back and forth across the room with a book on her head. Does the goose-step, to strengthen the muscles of her legs, which are a bit on the childish, reedy style as yet.

I asked her if she had ever tried the stunt I told you about last month, tensing the muscles of the thighs, which automatically throws the stomach in, slims the hips and buttocks, and prevents slumping. She said, yes, she did that on the screen when she wanted to maintain a good standing posture, but that it wasn't a bit of help when one is sitting down. I thanked her for a good bit of criticism and asked what she does when "sitting pretty." She said she makes believe she is trying to pull her abdominal muscles back to meet her spinal column.

"Which," she said, giggling, "comes under the head of the impossible, but you'd be surprised what it does for sitting posture." Try it, and see if Deanna isn't right.

I talked to a couple of the gals who have trouble putting on a little desired weight, Loretta Young and Janet Gaynor. They allowed as how the only way to put on weight is to eat, live right, and get plenty of sleep. And—wouldn't you know it—both these girls vastly prefer consommé and spinach to pie and mashed potatoes, while those who should stick to vegetables go in for creamy food and sweets galore.

An important factor in the lives of three lovely models from "Walter Wanger's Vogues of 1938." Forgive our pun, but we just want to let you know that these three pretty things, together with most of feminine Hollywood, use Max Factor's preparations on account of they like them best.

FIVE nights a week they try to get to bed by ten o'clock. One day a week, when she isn't working, Janet stays in bed. Reads and sews and lallygags around and enjoys it immense. They both eat three good healthy meals a day and offered this tip to thin girls who simply detest breakfast. They don't try to eat directly after they get up. They go for a walk or a ride first and let the fresh air work up an appetite for that uninteresting morning meal. And they always have cereal for breakfast, even if they can't quite manage the eggs and bacon. A big bowl of warm cereal—even in warm weather—with cream and sugar and maybe some fresh or stewed fruit. If you have that, thin girls, you'll be taking a big step in the right direction, and then if you can go as far as a poached or boiled egg or two, and a little toast and a beverage, that'll be so much the better.

Loretta doesn't like milk, but she forces down a large glass in the middle of the morning—flavored with vanilla, it isn't so bad—and in the afternoon as a big frosted drink. A chocolate milk-shake or a malted milk, or something like that. Janet doesn't like eggs much, so she goes in for custards, made with plenty of eggs. And these two girls, it may surprise you to learn, are among the very few stars who go in for massage. For thin people, who are inclined to live on their nervous energy, an occasional relaxing massage when one is very tired is a swell idea.

For plump folks, now, as I've said before, massage is an emergency measure, and not a very sensible one. It may be instrumental in doing away with excess flesh temporarily, but, quoting La Lombard, who tried it once and learned better, "It's as impermanent as a bath. You shortly have the same work to do all over again, so you might as well do it the right way in the first place."

I went over to Warners and had a most sensible and helpful chat with that sensible and helpful star, Bette Davis. She's noted for thinking straight and talking straight on every subject, and beauty problems weren't any exception.

"In the first place," said Bette, "I'm no beauty, so let's not call them beauty secrets. Good-looks secrets, if you like. I'm just like millions of girls all over the country. I have my good points and my bad points. Large eyes, good teeth, and folks say my mouth is dramatic, whatever that means. But I have freckles. My hair is in good condition because I take good care of it, but I wish I'd never had it bleached. However, that was for my art, and photographic reasons.

"I'm not overweight, but I have figure problems like most of the world. A tiny waist and, for my size and weight, a rather large front. Once I had a tendency to slump, in a misguided effort to look smaller in that there locality. 'Twas a mistake. All girls who are, or think they are, full-busted should stand up straight, look like women, wear a good uplift bra, and not be self-conscious.

"When, as, and if I do put on weight, it goes promptly in the wrong place—around the hips. And you know what the effect is when one's waist is small and one's hips zoom out below.

"There's no secret about any of the following; it's just plain common sense. But most girls won't be sensible about their figures. They won't cut down. They wait till they tip the scales at one hundred and sixty, and then they cut out. They'll starve when they do make up their minds to do so, but they won't give up a potato or a biscuit otherwise. Conversely, thin people stuff themselves periodically in an effort to put on weight. Then their overworked stomachs rebel, and the owners of those stomachs go back to eating entirely too little, or all the wrong things.

I EAT what I please, in reason. I exercise moderately. I take a cocktail or two now and then. I'm not a slave to the weighing machine. I have one dress which is my figure-gage. It's long and tight through the body, and has tiny covered buttons all the way down the front.

"If, standing facing the mirror, the umph of that dress is spoiled by a wobbly hip-line, I pep up my exercising. If, stand-

"TREAT YOURSELF TO BEAUTY—the way I do!"

BEFORE—"Summer sun left my hair all streaked with lighter shades—so unattractive I was ashamed to go out."

AFTER—"I'm only starting to realize the wonderful change Marchand's made in restoring my hair to its natural shade."

FAMOUS N. Y. MODEL TELLS HER SECRET OF POPULARITY

"I was born blonde," says Miss H. C. "but my hair gradually darkened as I grew older. Then, one summer vacation, overexposure to sun and water caused my hair to become lighter in streaks. In desperation, I went to a famous beauty specialist for advice and he recommended that I use Marchand's Golden Hair Wash—to restore my hair to its original, natural sunny, golden shade. Now I'm more popular than ever and everyone admires my hair."

Thousands of other smart, successful, popular women use Marchand's regularly—to restore and retain the glorious lighter shades of hair everyone admires. Marchand's is guaranteed safe—always gives perfect results and is easy to use. Marchand's Golden Hair Wash will lighten any color hair to any attractive shade desired.

All good druggists carry and recommend Marchand's. Get a bottle today—and treat yourself to beauty. P.S. Fastidious women use Marchand's to make arm and leg hair invisible. Colorless. Odorless. Stainless. Cannot leave stubble. Complete directions with every bottle. For perfect results always use Marchand's Castile Shampoo.

ing sideways, the buttons indicate an unwanted curve over the tum, I go buy myself a new, nice, snug girdle, and cut down a little on the eating. It isn't how much you weigh that's important—within reasonable limits, of course. It's how firm and healthy your flesh is, and how trim and trig the lines of your figure are.

"For breakfast I have fruit or fruit-juice, a great big highball glass of either of the last two, and one piece of toast with butter and honey, and one cup of coffee with the fixings. It doesn't matter what kind of bread you eat, I'm convinced.

"But if you're trying to lose weight, toast the bread to a dried-out crispness. Use no butter at all, or just a thin scraping—enough to make it palatable. Honey isn't fattening. Also, if you're trying to lose, drink the beverage straight and like it. And don't sit around half the morning swigging black coffee, either. A lot of liquid in your stomach makes you bloated. Twice I have gotten rid of a slight bulge in front by cutting way down on liquids alone, and continuing to eat as usual.

"For lunch I usually have clear soup, a green salad and iced or hot tea. But if I'm real hungry, I believe in eating a good meal in the middle of the day occasionally. Especially when I'm working. It should be a sensible meal, though. A lamb chop, or small steak, with two green, unadorned vegetables, is far less harmful to the figure than some creamed tea-room nonsense, or a drug store sandwich and soda.

"When I do indulge in a hearty meal in the middle of the day, I'm careful to eat a rather skimpy dinner. Otherwise, I go in for the works at dinner, only cutting out desserts and the starch element when I think the figure needs it.

"If any of that could be called secret, your readers are welcome to it. I like to swim, and I swim as much as I can. It keeps one firm and supple at the same time, but it won't reduce you. My hip exercise sounds pretty funny and looks still funnier, but it does the trick. I bounce—bounce on the offending bulge, whether it's right smack on the rear or over to the side—you know, on that little cushion which appears to the southeast of the hipbone."

Well, ladies (this is La Marshall speaking now) I've devoted all that space to Bette's advice because I think it's so sound. But I'm not forgetting some other beauty tips sent to you, with love, from certain of the other stars. We've finished with the figger for this article and we'll see what the Hollywood belles have to say about hair, make-up and such.

I asked Madeleine Carroll about the care of fine, blond hair. Her advice was, in effect: don't wash it too much. It's a great temptation to do so, because blond hair does look so elegant and fluffy after a shampoo. Rub your scalp and the hair itself with a Turkish towel, every other night, to remove dust and surplus oil. Or put a pad of cotton over your hair brush and brush your hair with it, changing the cotton as soon as it's even faintly soiled.

Miss C. confessed without any self-consciousness to using rinses. They're necessary for golden blondes, ash blondes and medium blondes, says she. The only kind of blond hair which usually retains its color and sheen without a little mild assistance is the kind with quite a bit of red in it. But, she said, do be careful with these here rinses. Use only a little, and the best.

You've all heard, I suppose, that Joan Crawford washes her hair every day. That's not quite true, as is the case with so many of the things you read about the moom pitcher stars. Joan has a daily shampoo only when she's working, because the necessary heavy picture make-up gets in her hair in more ways than one. Otherwise, Joan has a fortnightly shampoo, just like other folks. Another point here, which Miss Crawford brought out, is that her hair is rather coarse, sturdy, has always been healthy, and consequently can stand a little rougher treatment than fine, silky hair.

GINGER ROGERS passed along a nice frivolous make-up tip. Only to be used for evening wear, she cautioned. It has to do with putting on mascara, and it gives an elegant, glamorous look to practically any pair of eyes. Carefully rub a little cold cream or oil into the lashes. Then powder them rather thickly. The cream makes the powder stick. Now apply your mascara. The cream and the powder make the mascara stick, just booful, and your lashes seem twice as long and thick as they really are.

Claudette Colbert answered the call for help with several clever and practical tips. She said her favorite make-up cleaner-upper is, and has been for years, an ordinary pipe cleaner. She goes around the eyes, in the corners of the nose, and in the crease of the chin with a pipe cleaner, to remove excess powder. The same little inexpensive aid to grooming will fix up the lipstick line, if your hand has slipped.

She also said that, after she applies cream rouge, she goes away from the mirror for a few minutes, then comes back and looks at herself anew. Cream rouge, she says, has a habit of sneaking up on you and, while you may not think you've

No waiting for results when you use the

NEW LINIT MAGIC MILK MASK

HERE is a new, complete twenty-minute beauty treatment that begins its gentle, toning action as soon as it is applied, and leaves the skin looking soft, smooth and refreshed.

If your complexion is dull and sallow, the Linit Magic Milk Mask will help to clarify it through natural stimulation, and will heighten the natural bloom.

Look how easy it is for you to make the Linit Magic Milk Mask at home: *Simply mix three tablespoons of Linit (the same Linit so popular as a Beauty Bath) and one teaspoon of cold cream with enough milk to make a nice, firm consistency. Apply it to the cleansed face and neck and relax during the twenty minutes the mask takes to set. Then rinse off with clear, tepid water and pat the face and neck dry.

Feel your face—the petal-like smoothness and softness; observe the enchanting bloom of youth. The Linit Magic Milk Mask leaves the skin with a velvety "film" that is an excellent powder base, as it eliminates shine and helps to keep make-up looking fresh for hours longer.

Why not try Linit Magic Milk Mask NOW? If you do not have Linit at hand, your grocer can supply you.

applied too much, it's apt to brighten or deepen in tone after it gets on your face. She hopes you all know enough to put lipstick on dry lips—moisture sperls the smoothness.

And, unless you have a full mouth, here is the best way to apply it for the most natural looking results: fix the upper lip as you want it and apply plenty of lipstick. Then press your lips together, as if you were saying "Mmmm!" and sufficient lipstick will blot off on the lower lip. Blend it properly in, and that's that.

She says if you'll kindly remember not to wet your lips, drink a glass of water, or smoke a cigarette for ten minutes after you've put your lipstick on, it'll kind of "set" and stay put for a surprisingly long time.

WE all have our preferences for brands of make-up, and the movie stars are no exception. However, I was surprised at the number of them who use, exclusively, the preparations of a certain gent who is famous the world over for his products, both those which take care of the skin, keep it clean and stimulated and so on, and those which dress it up.

The stars all say that these products are, of course, pure as the driven snow, which is the first important consideration. But over and above that, this brand provides such a variety of shades of powder, rouge, lipstick and eyeshadow. Enough to suit every type. And moderately priced, what's more.

Dorothy Day, one of the beauteous Walter Wanger models for his "Vogues of 1938," gave me a tip which I think you'll be glad to hear about. I admired her page-boy bob because it was so soft and not stiff and artificial-looking, as so many of those bobs are. She said she did it herself.

I guess I looked as if I didn't believe her, for she proceeded to show me. It's a trick that can be worked if you have medium coarse hair with a slight tendency to curl. Fine hair, or absolutely straight hair wouldn't do.

After your shampoo, do your hair up on those rollers you can buy in the five-and-dime, but instead of turning it up, turn it under. It's as simple as that, but you must be very neat and careful and not put too much hair on one roller. And you must let the hair get absolutely dry before you take the rollers out. Don't be in a hurry to see how it looks and spoil all your work. A little patience and you will be surprised how simply gorgeous your hair-do will look with nary a visit to the beauty parlor!

There now—that's all I've time and space for. I hope you'll find a hint here which will solve your troubles. If not, watch for M. M. in the next issue of MODERN SCREEN.

If You Met Robert Taylor

should have done. His tie was yanked so tight around his throat that he was about to choke. He didn't say anything—he just stood there, as best he could, the picture of white, furious, disgusted misery.

A woman on the outside of the crowd fainted. It gave me an idea.

Somehow, I fought my way to him. Using elbows and feet to advantage, I got there. I was right next to Taylor and threw my arms about his neck. He said, "Please . . . !" in a strangled sort of voice. I whispered rapidly:

"Please play along with me for a minute and I'll get you out of this. Take the steps there down to the lower level."

Perhaps the poor guy was willing to take any sort of a chance at that point. Anyway, he did play along with me. I fainted —beautifully and convincingly. He picked me up, shoving aside a bevy of hysterical wrens as he did so.

"I've got to get this girl out of here," he said. "Kindly stand aside."

For some reason or other—perhaps it was the tone of his voice—they did stand aside. He made for the steps.

On the second flight of steps toward the lower level, he put me down.

"Now let's run like hell for the Union News lunch room over there," said I. "Duck your head down and look like a commuter."

In the lunch room is an old dear of a waiter who has served me my morning coffee for years—all through school and the four years I've been working. I knew he'd help me.

"Here," I said to Bob Taylor, handing him my tortoise-shell glasses. "Put these on." I grabbed a paper from the newsstand. "Hide behind this. Two coffees, please, Dan, and two of those bun things."

The lunch room wasn't very full, thank heaven. The coffee and buns came.

I turned to old Dan.

"We're in a little trouble and perhaps you can help us out."

"Sure, an' I will if I can."

"This gentleman is Robert Taylor. The movie star," I added since there was some doubt in my mind whether Dan had caught up with anything more recent than "Broken Blossoms."

"Mother of . . . !" he commenced and piously stopped.

"Shhh! He's been torn apart by a bunch of silly fools upstairs. How can we get out of here and can you lend him a hat?"

"A hat, now," pondered Dan. "Me own! 'Twould be a disguise for innybody. An' if the two of yez want to slip behind them cakes there, and go to the left, an' thin to the right, an' thin to the left agin, ye'll come out on Lexington, through an alley. Ye know where I mane?"

"Uh huh!"

"I'll get me hat."

Dan came back with the hat, a nice shapeless brown fedora model that had seen better days a long time ago. And with Dan came a high soprano shriek from the revolving doors.

"There he is! There he is!"

Bearing down upon us, hat askew and stylish-stout chiffon afloat in a breeze of her own creating, was the vanguard of the mob. I didn't have to tell Mr. T. to get going. He told me. He grabbed me by the hand and we flew around them cakes, to the left, to the right, to the left again and out into the alley that led to Lexington Avenue and the comparative safety of a taxi.

"Where to, Mister?" asked the driver.

"Oh. Huh?" said Bob Taylor.

"Why don't I drop you first, Jack?" I asked, fancying myself pretty much over the Jack. "Don't you want to stop by the Waldorf?"

"Oh. Yes. I'm supposed to go to the Waldorf."

"Okay, mister."

WE started crawling through the nerve-wracking traffic of midtown.

"Maybe it would be better if you went up to the Metro office first," I said. "They could get you a police escort or something."

"No," answered Bob Taylor. He was silent for a few minutes and then he said:

"Look here. I'm—I'm stuck for something to say to thank you. You've certainly been—well, swell is tame!"

"Well," I answered, "if I want to be truthful, I should tell you I've gotten a great kick out of this little adventure in my humdrum life. I—I have admired you on the screen and I had come down to the train to gawp at you like all the rest of those women. But I hate the way some of them acted!"

"Yes," he said, and stopped again.

"Say," he sat up suddenly. "If it's not too much. . . . I've gotten this far under your chaperonage—couldn't we ride around for a while? I mean, I don't want you to think anything funny. But I'm better off in a taxi than I'd be anywhere else. Just say so, if you don't want to, but—"

If I didn't want to! Oh, my land, my land! If he could have known the foolish, shameful, giddy thoughts that surged up in my mind. But no—no, no. I'd continue to be nice and casual and sensible and friendly. As I really did feel. Really I did. In the upper layer of my consciousness, if you know what I mean.

"Well," I said, in as matter-of-fact a voice as I could summon, "I should enjoy it very much, you must know that. If you think it would be all right. We must be careful and not get caught in any mob scene again and have some stupid gossip start. Where would you like to go?"

"Could we do some sight-seeing? I'd like to see Grant's Tomb. And the Aquarium. And Radio City. And the Empire State Building. And buy a present for Mrs. Brugh in Saks-Fifth Avenue." His voice sounded dreamy.

We went. We went up Riverside Drive first and Bob Taylor said he never could understand why that lovely locality wasn't regarded as the swankiest residential part of New York. Why Park Avenue, he wanted to know—stuck there in the middle of town, over the railroad tracks? I said I guessed it was just another evidence of the dumbness of fashionable localities. We went into the building which is the last resting place of the fiery, blasphemous little man who took one blood-drenched half of the Union and made it say "Uncle!" to the other. We remembered, at the same instant, Gary Cooper standing in Grant's Tomb in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town," and Bob Taylor said, "You know, I feel the same way Cooper was supposed to feel in that scene. You New Yorkers take this sort of thing so for granted. It doesn't mean anything to you. I used to read about things like this back in Beatrice, Nebraska, and long to see it all."

He was very serious most of the time. None of the flip wisecracking that is Hollywood's chief form of conversation. Coming out onto the Drive again, I looked sentimentally over to the buildings of Columbia University.

"It's good to see the old place, occasionally," I remarked. "I went to Barnard."

"Did you? A girl from the next town to us went to Barnard. She had a swell time. The envy of all the rest, because she went to college in New York. I wanted to come East and study medicine but—well, look where I landed." He blew out his cheeks and pushed Dan's hat further down on his nose.

"You're not doing badly," I remarked drily. Was he going to be one of these movie stars who bemoan their pitiful lot?

"Oh, I'm not complaining, by any means," he hastened to say. "But I get so woggly in the head out there sometimes, I don't know what I want. When I'm working, it's okay—I do the best I can and try to improve. But when I'm not working. . . . Sometimes I'm sick and tired of the whole game—the artificiality and the hooey and the politics. I don't know whether I want to stick—or quit. I don't know whether I want to get married—or not. That hasn't anything to do with my feeling for—for her, you understand. It's just that I can't tell whether we'd make a go of it in that screwy atmosphere. Like as not, the studio would have fits if I really up and did get married. And that's to be considered, too—for there are the days when I find the life pretty fine. The money, and the fame and the glory. And some of those directors can really take hold of you and make you feel the reality and emotion of the story you're doing. Then it all means something. I dunno." He looked out the taxi window. "This is a wonderful city. Where are you taking me now?"

"Well, it depends on how much time you have," I said. "I thought we'd—"

"I've got all day, dammit!" he shouted. "And all evening, too! That reminds me. . . . Are the Stadium Concerts on?"

They were.

"Then I want to go to the one tonight, if the rain stops," he shouted some more. "Look, we'll do all we can today, and have dinner, and if it isn't raining, we'll go to the Stadium, and if it is, we'll see a show —'Room Service'—that is, if you haven't seen it—or else—"

I calmed him down. Told him that we couldn't go to a restaurant on account of his famous pan, nor to a show. But we could sneak into the Stadium among the music lovers and I'd take him home and cook him a dinner. And in the meantime, we'd see everything he wanted to see that was safe. He looked at me for a long time and took both my hands and I couldn't stop my heart from thumping, thumping. Nor could I help noticing how amazingly blue his eyes were, and what a genuine, lovable personality shone through them.

"I'm thinking about the man you marry," he said. "He's a lucky, lucky fellow!"

(Ah, there, Henry! Take notice of that. I really do love you, Henry, and we're going to be married next June. But it doesn't hurt to dream dreams occasionally, does it? Bet you moon around over Ginger Rogers or Lombard or one of those belles sometimes yourself.)

WE actually did go to the Aquarium (so help me, I'd never been there before in all the years I've lived in New York) and took the boat trip around the city, and the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and the Natural History Museum—and if this makes Robert Taylor sound dreary and dull, I've told my tale very badly. Because it was all wondrous to him. Things he'd read about and heard about all his life. Things he was convinced must be interesting and marvelous, not routine and kind of dumb and to-be-expected as I had always felt. He apologized a dozen times for dragging me through places that I must know practically by heart, and I was ashamed to say that many of them were just about as brand-new to me as the Taj-Mahal would be.

Come six-thirty, I dragged him by main force to my two-by-four flat. Telephoned for groceries. Gave him towel and washcloth and told him to go clean up his dirty face. Would he have a highball? No. Sherry? Yes, thanks. A dinner—so easy to prepare, so dear to every masculine heart—appeared upon the table. Steak, medium rare. Beaucoup onions. Hash-brown potatoes. A really good salad, if I do say so, as shouldn't. A huckleberry pie from the place on Eighth Street. Coffee, good and strong. Then I said:

"It's cleared up, and if we're going to hear a concert, we'd better step on it. You really seem to care for music, don't you?"

"Yes," he said. "I do. You've probably read in the dear old fan magazines about my playing the 'cello. Well, I do play it, though not especially well. I'm the fellow who always says, 'I don't know much about music, but I know what I like.' The only thing is, I flatter myself that I usually like pretty good stuff. Iturbi's conducting tonight, I saw. Let's go."

The fates were with me. For they played "The Ride of the Valkyrie," Tschaikowsky's Fifth, the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and Strauss' "Salome's Dance." A program to stir the pulses if ever there was one! And we weren't noticed once—we were just one of the crowd. My glasses, and Dan's hat, and the slicker, two sizes too big, were a better disguise than Paul Muni's make-up in "Zola."

I said, "Let's find a taxi and you get out at the Waldorf." It was over. He said, "No, I'm going to take you home." And I couldn't help but say, "All right."

I held out my hand on the first step of the brown-stone-front.

"It's been wonderful," I said.

"It has," said Bob Taylor. "I'd like to

What Two Things Happen When You Are Constipated?

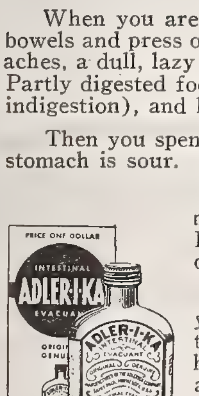
When you are constipated two things happen. FIRST: Wastes swell up the bowels and press on nerves in the digestive tract. This nerve pressure causes headaches, a dull, lazy feeling, bilious spells, loss of appetite and dizziness. SECOND: Partly digested food starts to decay forming GAS, bringing on sour stomach (acid indigestion), and heartburn, bloating you up until you sometimes gasp for breath.

Then you spend many miserable days. You can't eat. You can't sleep. Your stomach is sour. You feel tired out, grouchy and miserable.

To get the complete relief you ask you must do TWO things. 1. You must relieve the GAS. 2. You must clear the bowels and GET THAT PRESSURE OFF THE NERVES. As soon as offending wastes are washed out you feel marvelously refreshed, blues vanish, the world looks bright again.



There is only one product on the market that gives you the double action you need. It is ADLERIKA. This efficient carminative cathartic relieves that awful GAS at once. It often removes bowel congestion in half an hour. No waiting for overnight relief. Adlerika acts on the stomach and both bowels. Ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only.

Adlerika has been recommended by many doctors and druggists for 35 years. No griping, no after effects. Just QUICK results. Try Adlerika today. You'll say you have never used such an efficient intestinal cleanser.

"Thanks. I bet M-G-M is having a hemorrhage," I said.

"I bet they are, too," said Bob Taylor, in tones which (I wouldn't swear it) expressed infinite delight.

Power and Robert Taylor. Well, now I quit. It's time to rebel 'cause now they've even gone to work on Gable! Imagine! Sex appeal personified, and they try to make a gentleman out of him. That's too much for any honest Gable fan to take without a murmur. Haven't we enough college-boy heroes without turning the last of our rugged individuals on the screen into an animated cream puff? Phooey! Give me the old Clark. A lug who can slap a lady down and make her like it. Who can put a little of the Gable "umph" into an anemic flicker. Don't let the restraining hand be put on him. Our Naughty-Nice Screen Tots

Most of us want at least a little realism in the pictures we see. Do we not see mischievous children all around us? We always wonder if the child across the street is ill if he never causes any trouble. I'd rather see the child who has to be scolded or spanked once in awhile than the perfect little gentleman or lady. And what's so wrong with a face that gets dirty? It's a kid's privilege to roll in the mud occasionally. Heaven forbid taking that privilege away from our American screen children. And what's so wrong with a child who possesses a sense of humor? Of course he steps into the danger zone more often than the humorless sort. Real, honest-to-goodness kids are too busy enjoying life to think of consequences, and that's as it should be. The time to settle down to seriousness comes soon enough. Let them be free as long as possible. Let's not mar their naturalness by insisting that they speak conventional English, either. Our Americanisms are full of meaning, even if they do sound barbarous to the Englishman.

Give me the roguishness of a Jane Withers or the waywardness of an Edith Fellowes any day. Can you honestly call them unattractive? Perhaps they don't have beautiful faces, but they have spirit. They're adorable because they're normal and real. Those who don't like them neither understand nor like the average American child.—Mrs. Reba Simmons, Wattis, Utah.

Murder Mystery de Luxe

At last, a murder mystery—without rain or thunder or lightning or howling dogs! Yes, the producers have at last found a way to create horror without the aid of the obvious, believe it or not. I'm speaking of "Night Must Fall." It was gruesome, it was horrible! But there weren't any loose shutters banging in the wind, no black clouds rolling ominously toward the house of evil, no shatters of lightning. And in the quiet of the countryside, no suspicious canine, no mournful howl of death. Yes, they did use one black cat. But it didn't scurry across the floor with the fur bristling on its neck, and its eyes weren't pictured glowing brightly in the dark dark darkness. What a thrilling, chilling picture that was without benefit of hokum. Everything was done by implication, and something was left to the imagination of the audience.

Congratulations, you people who made "Night Must Fall" so refreshingly horrible!—Verna Yantos, Waukesha, Wisconsin.

Don't Split Up the Team

Really, it burns me up when someone writes in to you and says, "Bust up the Rogers and Astaire team." If I were Editor, I'd tell 'em to go West and shoot snipe. If they don't want to see Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers dancing together, let them stay away from their pictures. We, the common people, hope they'll never break the team into two pieces or two persons. Here's greater success still to that grand pair. May all their pictures be made—together.—Gladys Annen, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Ameche Wins By a Mustache

Say, did that mustache work wonders for Don Ameche! He'll give Taylor and Power a run for their money now. Heretofore Don's face was just a mug accompanied by a good voice and a nice smile.

And then the mustache. Presto! A personality. A guy to make the girls swoon. Carry on, Don, old boy. Don't give up the mustache!—Thelma Louise Smith, Memphis, Tenn.

But Not With This Fan

Why is it that Hollywood insists upon putting mustaches on some of the screens' otherwise handsome men? As I was looking through a movie magazine the other day, I found myself gazing at a handsome young man with a crisp mustache plastered above his upper lip. Imagine my surprise upon discovering after reading the notes beneath the picture that it was Fernand Gravet in a scene from his latest picture. I have silently taken the sad news when I've seen such movie heroes as Errol Flynn, Dick Powell, and Don Ameche serving as human guinea pigs in Holly-

FREED

Woman's place was in the home!

Not many years ago, it was unthinkable that women would ever compete with men in business, in sport, in art! The ordeals of her sex made it apparently impossible.

Yet today, woman is freed. Everywhere, in every field, she competes on a basis of strict equality. Her's is a new life.

And the greatest contribution, perhaps, to this new freedom, was one woman's courage in defying tradition. She dared to say that women were not meant to suffer. She dared to claim that no wife or mother must spend one-quarter of her life wracked with pain. She dared to assert that the ordeal of motherhood could be eased.

We know now that Lydia Pinkham was right. And it is doubtful whether, throughout the entire world, any single aid to woman has won more eager gratitude than Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.*

We have received more than a million letters blessing Lydia Pinkham for enabling the writers to go "smiling through" the ordeals of a woman's life.

The bitter aches and pains, the terrific mental and nervous strain that so many women undergo, are often needless. As wife, mother, daughter, you owe it to those about you to test whether Lydia Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will not help you, also, to go "smiling through." Why not get a bottle today from your druggist?

*For three generations one woman has told another how to go "smiling through" with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It helps Nature tone up the system, thus lessening the discomforts (functional disorders) which must be endured, especially during wood's latest fad, but when a new discovery suddenly dons a mustache for his second picture—well, that's too much.

when you have not fought. We have never, never had a cross word in all the time I have known him. And to say that he is going with other girls, when he is not going with other girls, because how could he go with them? He goes with me! Ach, I know!

"It is ridiculous and it makes you feel both sad and mad. When it came out over the radio, it was time to do something. We sent Walter Winchell a wire denying it.

"Then just before I come away, Tyrone and I get all dressed up and we go to the Trocadero where people will see us together. Oh, it is funny when we come in. People stare and look surprised to see us together when, of course, we have never been apart. Then the story comes out that we have patched up our fight!

"We don't go out to parties because we do not have the time. We both work very hard and this last picture, 'Thin Ice,' has taken so much time. I get up at five o'clock in the morning and am at the studio at seven. Then at night, we rehearse the lines.

"Yes, Tyrone helped me a great deal in this picture. Every night we did our scenes together. He listened to me and told me what was good and what was wrong. I think it helps so much to rehearse the night before. You remember better. You do your lines better."

But about this Janet Gaynor rumor?

"So silly," she repeated. "He did not know her at the time the story started. He had talked to her on the telephone two weeks before about a radio thing. Yes, they worked in a picture together a while ago, but not at the same time. They did not shoot scenes together. He was a stranger to her when these stories came out and said he goes out with her! He told me so.

"When I am gone to Norway? Of course, I expect Tyrone to have dates and go places with other girls. I am gone four weeks. He is not going to stay home and feel sad. Have I boy friends in Norway? No, there is nobody there, but I will go out if it is pleasant.

"I think it is all right for him to go out with girls when I am not in Hollywood. I tell him that. That is understood, but I suppose stories will start again!" And she shrugged her shoulders.

We were going through the Holland Tunnel now and were practically shouting in order to be heard above the roar of the cars.

"Have you heard from Tyrone since you left Hollywood yesterday?" I yelled.

"What?" she screamed back.

"Did he wire you last night?"

A smile crossed the Henie countenance, a big smile.

telegram. No, I didn't mind waking up for that."

"Have you made any plans for your marriage?" I asked boldly.

"We are both young. We have our careers. We are busy. I have much to do yet. So we will not marry for a year."

And more than that I could not pry from her.

WHEN it was suggested that maybe the story about the romances with other girls was a publicity stunt, there was a good round blast of indignation.

"It might have been," she said, "but it was not our publicity office. I think—I am not sure—but I think I know somebody else started it to get publicity, but it was not Fox."

The press agent sitting by, listening, reassured her, of course, it could not be.

"Maybe some newspaperman started it, Miss Henie," he said. "You know when there are 300 reporters in Hollywood all looking for things to write about, news gets pretty scarce and sometimes just a whisper will turn into a big story."

She cogitated a moment.

"Maybe," she admitted. "But it was not true. They should not do those things."

Your reporter remarked that the recent story about Eleanor Holm and Arthur Jarrett separating seemed like a publicity story. Sonja pricked up her ears.

"I know her," she said. "She is nice. Is it true about her and Arthur Jarrett?"

"You see," we pointed out, "now you are believing that. See how quickly people might believe things about you."

Sonja thought a moment. Then, firmly as ever, "It was not true. It could not have been—about us."

Whether it was due to her wrought-up feelings about the unfair story about Tyrone stepping out with other girls while she was right on the job, whether it was just excitement at getting into New York, or whether it was because she had been dieting, Sonja looked like a million dollars.

Does she like herself in pictures now? I recalled seeing her right after she had first seen herself on the screen in the preview of "One in a Million" and finding her quite perturbed.

"Oh, no, I never think I am good," she said frankly, and unselfconsciously. "I am better this time, but I am not good—not the way I'd like to be. I must learn much more. It is strange to see yourself on the screen."

The limousine was rolling up Park Avenue to my hotel. I said goodby and wished her luck. I did not see her triumphal entrance into the Waldorf Astoria, but I heard later that it was really something. And that—most important—there was a long distance telephone call waiting from Tyrone Power.

So, for the time being at least, let's call the calling off, off, and Hollywood, you go sing some other tune!

★★ Vogues of 1938

Without Technicolor, "Vogues of 1938" would be pretty dull stuff. With it, this glorified fashion show should delight the women and scare the pants off the husbands in the audience. No wife is going to see "Vogues" without setting out on a shopping expedition the next day. Men who have no bills to pay but their own can relax and enjoy gazing at the twelve lovely models who swish about in Mr. Wanger's expensive garments.

It's getting trite to say that Technicolor improves with each new picture, but it's true. Color makes the gowns gorgeous, and it has the added quality of dressing up the routine story which hides behind it. Incidentally, it gives the film's leading lady, Joan Bennett, a warmth and beauty which she has never displayed before on the screen.

Story concerns a fashionable designer (Warner Baxter) whose business goes on the rocks because of the costly ambitions of his wife (Helen Vinson). However, a society gal (Miss Bennett) and Technicolor (Technicolor) get together and put him back on his feet. Miss Vinson is a capable villainess, and Baxter is altogether believable in the role of the designer. Outstanding in the supporting cast are Mischa Auer, Alan Mowbray, Hedda Hopper and Alma Kruger. In addition, there is swell singing by Virginia Verrill and top-notch tap dancing by Georgie Tapps. And the fashion show is really something for the ladies. Directed by Irving Cummings.—Walter Wanger.

★★ That Certain Woman

Ten years ago Gloria Swanson starred in a tear-jerker about mother love, called "The Trespasser." The picture, written and directed by Edmund Goulding, drew considerable acclaim. Now Mr. Goulding has sponsored a talking version of his picture, with Bette Davis in the role of the unfortunate woman who sacrifices all for the love of a child. "That Certain Woman" is old-fashioned melodrama, and Mr. Goulding is guilty of pouring on the misfortunes and sacrifices of the central character with too generous a hand. What Miss Davis goes through for the love of her young son reaches a point where audiences will feel like going up to the screen to see if there's anything they can do.

The early part of the picture, with

Mischa Auer and Polly Rowles in a scene from "Vogues of 1938."

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE...

Without Calomel—And You'll Jump Out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

The liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile into your bowels daily. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays in the bowels. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

Laxatives are only makeshifts. A mere bowel movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good, old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c.

What made their hair grow?

Here is the Answer

"New Hair came after I began using Kotalko, and kept on growing," writes Mr. H. A. Wild. "In a short time I had a splendid head of hair, which has been perfect ever since."

Mary H. Little also has luxuriant hair now after using Kotalko. Yet for years her head, as she describes it, "was almost as bare as the back of my hand."

Many other men and women attest that hair has stopped falling excessively, dandruff has been decreased, new luxuriant hair growth has been developed where roots were alive, after using Kotalko to stimulate scalp action.

Are your hair roots alive but dormant? If so, why not use Kotalko? Encourage new growth of hair to live on sustenance available in your scalp. Kotalko is sold at drug stores everywhere.

"That Certain Woman," featuring Henry Fonda and Bette Davis.

Miss Davis holding down a respectable job and trying to live down the notoriety attached to a gangster's widow, is effective drama, but after that the picture sinks to the level of an out-and-out tearjerker.

Bette Davis suffers admirably, and there are good performances by Ian Hunter, Donald Crisp, Mary Phillips and Hugh O'Connell. Henry Fonda is wasted in the poorly written, illogical role of the child's father.—Warner Brothers.

★The Sheik Steps Out

Marking his first Hollywood venture in several seasons, Ramon Novarro chooses as his "comeback" vehicle the type of thing which once found considerable favor with his fans. However, Lola Lane in the feminine lead steals the picture. Loyal Novarro followers will find their idol a bit plump, but in possession of the same mannerisms which first won him their hearts. In this one, he is once more the strong and comparatively silent son of the desert whose polite charm subdues the haughty American heiress and saves her from becoming the bride of the ever-present British nobleman whom she really doesn't love.

Lola Lane is the pampered daughter of Gene Lockhart, a corkscrew tycoon, and the two of them, along with Aunt Polly (Charlotte Treadway) and Cousin Gloria (Kathleen Burke), are in Arabia to purchase Mad Chestnut, the fastest horse in the world, owned, of course, by Sheik Ahmed Ben Nesib. It seems that unless Lola wins the next Irish Sweepstakes she will be forced to marry a vapid individual named Lord Byington (Robert Coote). Thanks to the dashing Mr. Novarro, she is spared this fate.

Some of the scenes are effective, and Lola Lane puts humor and vitality into the role of the gal. She's undoubtedly on her way to better things. Best in the supporting cast are Gene Lockhart, Stanley Fields and Billy Bevan. Directed by Irving Pichel.—Republic.

★★Mr. Dodd Takes the Air

Adapted from a Clarence Budington Kelland serial of two years ago, "Mr. Dodd Takes the Air" is a pleasant and diverting screen musical which will get favorable comment from almost any audience. While it offers good fun and innocuous entertainment throughout its unreeling, the picture's main assets are that it brings two newcomers into screen prominence. Kenny Baker, of course, has been seen briefly in a couple of films, and has been heard for some time on the Jack Benny radio program, but this is his first real screen chance. He comes through with a fine voice and a refreshing, youthful personality which assures him a profitable future on the screen. In the feminine lead, Jane Wyman manages to be pert and cute and dramatically skilfull all at once. Put her down as one of the season's discoveries.

"Mr. Dodd Takes the Air" is the story of a small town electrician whose pleasing voice takes him to the big city networks and into the clutches of conniving females who are after his scalp and his bankroll. In the course of these events there are several good tunes and quite a bit of good, clean fun. Gertrude Michael does nicely as the heavy, Alice Brady gets laughs as a temperamental opera star, and Frank McHugh adds comedy in the role of the crooner's manager. Directed by Alfred E. Green.—Warner Brothers

★★ Double or Nothing

If you're a Bing Crosby fan, we might as well let the matter drop right now. For there's no argument, you'll like this picture. It's just like all the others which the Crosby fans have flocked to for the past few years, no better and no worse. But what we'd like to know is, why can't these Crosby pictures be better? When it comes to crooning, Bing is as good as the next one and when it's a matter of action, he can deliver the goods. Paramount even furnished a good supporting cast for him in all his celluloiders. But when it comes to a story that will hold interest, the studio evidently decides to economize on their time and money. In "Double Or Nothing," the very thin story has to do with a wealthy man who leaves inheritances to a group of people, with the understanding that they either double the money or else. Worked into these goings on are several good numbers by Bing, and a romance with the very decorative Mary Carlisle. And there's Martha Raye, too, who does a good job on pretty slim script pickings. When Bing opens a night club, a logical excuse is given for a super de luxe floor show, and with the star as master of ceremonies, and some really good songs and dances, this sequence is the high note of the picture. Directed by Theodore Reed.—Paramount.

★★ Charlie Chan on Broadway

Even if you aren't a Charlie Chan fan, you'll have to admit that this latest picture of the super-sleuth's doings is interesting right through the last reel. For this time, there is something else besides Mr. Chan's charms to recommend it. The story is as good a whodunit as you've seen for some time. There are the usual murders—two

Happy Relief From Painful Backache

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys—and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are Nature's chief way of taking excess acids and poisonous waste out of the blood. Most people pass about 3 pints a day or about 3 pounds of waste.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, poisonous waste matter stays in the blood. These poisons may start nagging backaches, rheumatic pains, lumbago, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness.

Don't wait! Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills, used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help the 15 miles of kidney tubes flush out poisonous waste from the blood. Get Doan's Pills.

Madeleine Carroll and Francis Lederer clown a bit in "It's All Yours."

of them to be exact—but they are accomplished in such an intriguing manner that nothing short of an earthquake would make you leave your seat until light is shed on the dirty work. Keye Luke, as Warner Oland Chan's son again, has his most amusing role to date. He gets into all his customary trouble and comes out at the finish with two of the blackest eyes ever seen on the screen. A good supporting cast is comprised of Donald Woods, as the news-reporter and Joan Marsh, his rival news-scooper and leading lady. Harold Huber is especially good as the police department executive, while J. Edward Bromberg does a good job as the newspaper publisher. Louise Henry is attractive as Billie Bronson, who starts all the trouble because she's another of those gals who has to keep a diary. Joan Woodbury takes all the feminine honors, however, in a small role as a cafe dancer. If you're a candid camera fiend, you'll particularly appreciate this novel twist to the plot, for the mystery is solved through a series of candid shots taken by the patrons of the cafe where the murders transpire. And we'll bet ten to one that you will never guess the murderer This time! It was all pinned on such an innocent-appearing person, that next time we're going to suspect Charlie Chan right from the start. Directed by Eugene Ford.—20th Century-Fox.

★★ Back in Circulation

When the movies make a picture with a newspaper background, you can rest assured that none of the principal characters will act even remotely like an actual newspaper reporter. This tradition is carried out again in this film, which contains the usual moronic cameraman, frantic city editor and, true to the new vogue, the crack gal reporter. This time we find the reporters on a murder hunt, so busy telling district attorneys and state authorities how to conduct the affair that one wonders how they find time to get out their newspaper.

Joan Blondell, as the gal reporter, believes she has discovered a murder and sends the victim's widow (Margaret Lindsay) to prison. Then, discovering she was wrong, she suddenly changes sides and sets about to save the woman from the chair. The power of the press is magnificent!

In spite of all the hokum, "Back in Circulation" is a lively and entertaining film. Director Ray Enright keeps it at a furious pace, and Miss Blondell comes through with what is probably her best screen performance. She handles her breezy role with perfect assurance, and manages to steal the picture from Pat O'Brien, who

THIS BEAUTY SECRET
Comes from a doctor

Most women don't need beauty parlors. Your own doctor will tell you that sallow complexions and pimply skins are rarely matters for cosmetics. Because most skin blemishes are aggravated by constipation.

Dr. F. M. Edwards treated hundreds of women for constipation and frequently noted remarkable improvements in their appearance. He used a purely vegetable compound —Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. This laxative is gentle, yet peculiarly effective because it increases the bile flow without shocking the intestinal system. Try Dr. Edwards' Olive Tablets. At all druggists, 15¢, 30¢ and 60¢.

Loretta Young and Don Ameche in "Love Under Fire."

does a fine job in the role of the city editor. Margaret Lindsay wins sympathy as the widow, and there are good performances by John Litel and Walter Byron. Directed by Ray Enright—Warner Brothers.

★ Love Under Fire

A conglomeration of love, the Spanish revolution, a stolen necklace and Borrah Minnevitch and his Harmonica Gang, "Love Under Fire" is too confused to get anywhere at all in the entertainment department. The story, which concerns a handsome Scotland Yard detective and a beautiful jewel thief who really isn't a jewel thief at all, dashes off in all directions every few minutes until it has the audience hanging on the ropes.

Don Ameche is a Scotland Yard man vacationing in Spain, when he is called upon to apprehend a young lady suspected of a jewel robbery. The young lady is Loretta Young, who never stole a nickel in her life. Ameche sings a love song to her while Spanish bombs burst overhead, and from there the film goes on to airplane crashes, gunboat pursuits and several other items the script writers were able to toss in.

★ On Such a Night

This one won't look good even with bank night and a set of dishes. It's old fashioned melodrama, one of those things in which the hero is about to go to the chair for a crime he didn't commit. He won't reveal the real culprit because it will sully the good name of his wife. Just about at that point in the proceedings they bring in the Mississippi Valley flood, which up to that time had taken no part in the conversation. The flood washes our hero out of jail and into the arms of his wife, and later allows him to pin the crime on the villain of the piece. Watch out for this one, even if they offer you two sets of dishes.

Grant Richards is likable enough as the misguided hero, and Karen Morley is an adequate heroine. Eduardo Ciannelli overacts the role of the villain—he's so dastardly that audiences will howl at him. Roscoe Karns and Alan Mowbray stand out in the supporting cast. Directed by E. A. Dupont.—Paramount.

★ She's No Lady

It is our duty to report that "She's No Lady" is no entertainment, either. It's a picture based on a weak plot, involving the theft of a diamond necklace from a wealthy dowager. A gang of thieves, headed by Harry Beresford and including Ann Dvorak and Guinn Williams, is behind the jewel-lifting. It's all supposed to be very involved, but by the time the necklace is grabbed and passed on to the various crooks, all trying to out-smart one another, the plot looks like a game of button-button-who's-got-the-button.

At a party given by Aileen Pringle, society gal, Harry Beresford gets a job as waiter. Then Ann Dvorak wangles an invitation to the party through John Trent, whom she supposes is a wealthy playboy. Beresford gets the diamonds from Miss Pringle's neck through the most obvious trick we've ever seen, passes them on to Ann Dvorak, who is then relieved of them by John Trent, who by this time turns out to be a thief himself. This goes on for reel after reel, until Ann's conscience suddenly hurts her, when she finds herself in possession of the diamonds and decides to return them. Then Mr. Trent discloses that's he's really an honorable detective, and all is lilies and bluebirds, and pretty stuffy. Ann Dvorak, however, surprises with a really good performance—the only good one, in fact. John Trent shows a painful lack of acting experience. Aileen Pringle is, as always, lovely to look at. Guinn Williams does the best he can with a very bad bit, and Harry Beresford's acting in this picture leaves much to be desired.—Paramount.

★★ Flight From Glory

If you're aviation-minded, you'll find this picture of particular interest. And you may find it genuinely good entertainment just because of the originality of the plot, even if excellent flying shots don't appeal to you. The locale of the picture is in South America—a disreputable camp which is the headquarters of a company furnishing supplies to mines in the Andes mountains. It takes a crack pilot to fly through the treacherous mountains. It also takes first-class planes.

Onslow Stevens, who is the manager of the camp, gets good pilots from the United States, dare-devil ones who have had their licenses taken away from them. However, he doesn't bother with good planes, and as a consequence, the men crack up at an alarming rate. Among the group in the camp are Chester Morris, Solly Ward, Richard Lane, Douglas Walton, Walter Miller and Paul Guilfoyle—all A-1 pilots, and bitter about the spot they find themselves in—a spot impossible to escape since the crooked Stevens keeps them in debt to him. And into this group comes a new pilot, Van Heflin, and his wife, Whitney Bourne. Heflin can't "take it" and from then on it's a story of sacrifice to try to save him.

At that point the story begins to fall flat—for the heroics of the men and the silent suffering of Whitney Bourne are considerably overdone. It's our opinion that if the director had left out the beautiful Miss Bourne, and made this a man's picture from start to finish, he would have had a really outstanding picture. Directed by Lew Lauders.—RKO-Radio.

★★ It's All Yours

When E. J. Barnes, the millionaire attorney, dies, his will discloses that he has bequeathed his playboy son the sum of one dollar. His fortune goes to Linda Grey, his secretary. For several years Linda has been secretly in love with Jimmy, the son, but he has never so much as looked at her. (The fact that she's Madeleine Carroll seemed not to impress him at all.) Jimmy determines to break the will, and Linda sets about to make herself glamorous and desirable, hoping by that method to win the young man's heart away from the chorus girl to whom he pays all his attention.

Linda does her most successful taunting when she allows herself to be seen about with the Baron de Montigny, a gay, fun-loving faker who makes a business of marrying into money.

The picture's best moments are the scenes between Miss Carroll and the Baron, played delightfully by Mischa Auer. When they are together, the film assumes a lighthearted attitude which it never seems to catch when Jimmy, played by Francis Lederer, is around. Lederer is not a happy choice for the role, for he has little conception of light comedy. Madeleine Carroll is both attractive and competent as Linda, but it's Mischa Auer who gives the picture most of its charm. In the role of the chorus girl, there's a surprisingly good comedy performance by Grace Bradley, who sounds as though she's been studying voice with Jean Arthur. Directed by Elliott Nugent.—Columbia.

★★ Hopalong Rides Again

Here is a rip-snortin' horse opera which has more than its share of hard riding, gun play and good clean western love. It is easily the best of the Hopalong Cassidy series, and will be enjoyed by sophisticated audiences as well as its regular clientele. Bill Boyd has made a swell cowboy character of Hopalong Cassidy, and in this one he continues to see that wrongs are righted and rustlers get their just dues from his trusty six-shooters. The story follows the accepted pattern, the only deviation being that the villain is a guy given to dynamiting cattle—as mean a trick as ever hit the plains. The villain, incidentally, is the heroine's brother, but it is to her eternal credit that she is unaware of his nefarious doings.

The picture even devotes a little time to romance, although that sort of thing is generally considered sissy stuff by the open-throated western heroes. Boyd, however, never lets his love-making interfere with his shooting and his endless pursuits of the villain.

Excellent in the supporting cast are Nora Lane, Russell Hayden, George Hayes, Lois Wilde, Billy King and Harry Worth. Directed by Lesley Selander.—Paramount.

Give This Flour A New Name!

$300 in Cash for Best 15 Names

$50 Check Each Month for Rest of This Year— Extra Promptness Prize

Here is an amazing offer! One that should tax the imagination of every man, woman and child. You have an equal opportunity to win a big cash prize and receive a $50 check regularly each month for the three remaining months of 1937. In order to get a new name for flour, we are passing on to the readers of this magazine the opportunity of selecting a new name and winning cash prizes for their efforts. There are a lot of good names being used now, such as Big Four, Golden Harvest, Queen's Best, Lily White, Kansas Pride, and others. We want a new name, and for the best fifteen sent in, we will award $300 in cash prizes, plus a $50 check each month for the three remaining months of 1937 as a promptness prize.

The First Name You Think of May Be a Winner

Think of the many names that are now being used and suggest a new name for flour—one that you feel will appeal to the housewife. The name you send in may be of one, two or three words, separate or combined. It will cost you nothing to send in a name. You may win one of the fifteen prizes.

15 Cash Prizes Totaling $300.00

Write your name for this flour on a penny post card or sheet of paper, sign your own name and address, and mail within three days from the time you read this announcement. It will pay you to be prompt. Your name for this flour must be mailed before Dec. 18, 1937. Fifteen cash prizes will be awarded. If the name you send in is selected as First Prize winner, you will receive $100 in cash, and as an extra prize for promptness you will receive a check for $50 each month for the three remaining months of 1937. Second Prize will be $50; Third Prize $25; Fourth Prize $15; and eleven prizes of $10 each. These fifteen prizes are in addition to the extra prize of $50 a month which is offered to the first prize winner for promptness in sending in the winning name. Duplicate prizes will be awarded in the event of a tie.

Right now you may be thinking of just the name we are looking for—the name that will win First Prize! Sometimes the first name you think of is the best name to send in. Send only one name to Claudette Colbert wasn't speaking to the Warner Brothers for a few days, all because the studio announced she was wearing a red wig for her role in "Tonight's Our Night." Claudette wants it known that the story, and not her hair, is false. She had her own hair dyed red for the picture.

Would it interest you to know that in "The Awful Truth" Irene Dunne had stand-ins for her gowns? Robert Kalloch, who designed them, made three copies of each gown worn by Irene in the picture. The first gown was for actual filming, and the second was for the stand-in, in case of wear and tear on the original. The third copy went to Irene's stand-in. Generally the stand-in's costume only approximates the one worn by the star, but several of Irene's gowns in this picture are of shimmering metal cloth and bead work, and since this material produces unusual highlights when photographed, it was necessary for the stand-in's costume to be an exact copy of Miss Dunne's.

Whatever goes on at the Troc to make Phyllis Brooks laugh so heartily, doesn't seem to strike Cary Grant as funny at all.

And just look who's here! Miriam Hopkins and Anton Litvak go stepping. He seems to be head man with La Hopkins.

Here comes the bride! And, incidentally, the groom. Anne Shirley proudly displays hubby, John Howard Payne.

Two kids, one from Shreveport, Louisiana, and the other from Abilene, Texas, got off a freight train in Los Angeles. They were headed for Hollywood—to see Gene Autry. They wound up at the Travelers' Aid Society. When Autry heard about it, he dropped over and paid a personal visit to his two young fans. Now they're back home, but they've seen their idol and have pictures to prove it.

Most amusing—spelled a-m-a-z-i-n-g—scene in "High, Wide and Handsome" is the sequence in which Irene Dunne is called upon to instruct Dorothy Lamour in the art of singing a hot song. Miss D. sings well, but she never has been classified as a hot-cha kid, while Dorothy Lamour got into pictures because she sang the blues and served them hot. Both of the gals must have felt pretty silly.

You should have seen the mob at the preview of "Vogues of 1938." Both the inside and the forecourt of Grauman's Chinese were packed, and they didn't all come to see the picture, either. The word was around that Garbo would be there. Result was the biggest crowd of the year. Practically everyone in Hollywood was there—everyone but Garbo.

Henry Fonda is one of the actors in Hollywood who's given to sculpturing in his spare time. He has been interested in sculpture for some time, and just completed a fine head of his wife. He exhibits his work only to his friends, and they all insist he's a first-rate chiseler—in the finer sense of the word of course. The Fondas have just bought a house next door to their old pal, Jimmy Stewart.

Bob Taylor sang a song in "Broadway Melody," but you won't see or hear it in the picture. Seems they held a sneak preview in San Diego—with the Taylor singing sequence. But the audience laughed when Bob sat down at the piano. When you see the picture, notice a scene on a train, with Bob seated at a piano playing "Yours and Mine." Eleanor Powell asks him to sing it. "I can't sing," replies Bob. "You try it." And she does.
